The Literary Week.

THE flood of war books is rising. Four volumes describing the actual fighting are already in circulation—Mr. G. W. Steevens's From Capetown to Ladysmith, Mr. Bennet Burleigh's The Natal Campaign, Mr. Julian Ralph's Towards Pretoria, and Mr. A. Kinnear's To Modder River with Methuen. Mr. Winston Churchill's book carries yet a little. Most of the war books are merely newspaper articles strung together and characterised by that oracular method of utterance which the modern special correspondent has adopted. That note is less conspicuous in the letters that Mr. Charles E. Hands is contributing to the Daily Mail. His account of "The Fight for the Convoy," in last Tuesday's issue, had a humour and a detachment that made it delightful reading. If Mr. Hands cared to do so, we can well believe that he could write one of the few war books that will outlive the war.

"PERHAPS," remarks a contemporary, at the close of a two-column review of Ibsen's "Dramatic Epilogue" in three acts, "When We Dead Awaken"—"perhaps when the play is acted in England, much that is now dark may be made clear." That may be so, but it will require nothing less than the stage of Drury Lane Theatre to give the concluding episode its proper effect. Here are the directions:

[Suddenly a sound like thunder is heard from high up on the snow-field, which glides and whirls downwards with rushing speed. PROFESSOR RUBEK and IRENE can be dimly discerned as they are whirled along with the masses of snow and buried in them.]

THE SISTER OF MERCY.

[Giv's a shriek, stretches out her arms towards them and cries] Irene!

[Stands silent a moment, then makes the sign of the cross before her in the air, and says]

Pax vobiscum!

[MAIA's triumphant song sounds from still further down below.]

THE Poet Laureate, being a Court official, has characteristically chosen Spring and Autumn in Ireland as the title for his new volume of poems.

APROPPOS the failure of Messrs. Appleton of New York, the British Weekly understands that all royalties to English authors will be paid, including arrears, and that all contracts will be kept. Messrs. Appleton were the publishers of David Harum. It is said they cleared £40,000 on that transaction.

Two hundred pounds is still required to cover the estimate for the memorial to William Black, which will take the form of a lighthouse on Duart Point in the Sound of Mull. Contributions may be sent to the Hon. Treasurer, care of Messrs. Coutts, 59, Strand.

MR. THOMAS HARDY's grave Muse finds a sombre and sympathetic theme in the poem of sixteen stanzas, "The Souls of the Slain," that begins the April issue of the Cornhill Magazine. It is hardly poetry; it is the utterance rather of a reflective nature, expressing itself uneasily and with effort in lyrical language. Like all Mr. Hardy's verse, it has a symbolistic undercurrent, haunting, and not soon forgotten. He imagines himself at the Bill of Portland, "which stands, roughly, on a line drawn from South Africa to the middle of the United Kingdom—in other words, the flight of a bird along 'a great circle' of the earth, cutting through South Africa and the British Isles, might land him at Portland Bill":

And with darkness and silence the spirit came on me
To brood and be still.

Thither flew the souls of those who have fallen in Africa,
"and I heard them say, 'Home!'"

Then, it seemed, there approached from the northward
A senior soul-flame
Of the like filmy hue:

And he met them, and spake: "Is it you,
O my men?" Said they, "Aye! We bear homeward and hearthward
To list to our fame!"

But they are told that, now they are dead, it is not of their "glory and war-mightiness" that the bereaved at home think. It is on the little unhistoric acts of the beloved dead that they dwell, "deeds of fondness or fret, ancient words that were kindly expressed or unkindly."

Then bitterly some: "Was it wise now
To raise the tomb-door
For such knowledge? Away!" . . .

But the rest: "Fame we prized till to-day;
Yet that hearts keep us green for old kindness we prize now
A thousand times more!"

Thus speaking, the trooped apparitions
Began to disband
And resolve them in two;

Those whose record was lovely and true
Bore to northward for home: those of bitter traditions
Again left the land.

And the spirits of those who were homing
Passed on, rushing,
Like the Pentecost Wind;

And the whirr of their wayfaring thinned,
And surceased on the sky, and but left in the gloaming
Sea-mutterings and me.

To the same number of the Cornhill Mr. Stuart J. Reid contributes a valedictory appreciation of his friend the author of The Maid of Sker, the book by which Mr. Blackmore chose to be known rather than by Lorna Doone. Mr. Reid gives a touching account of the old man's last days:

He said that he often sat half the night with a book over the fire in despair of sleep. I asked him what kind of book had power of solace, and I was not surprised to find that the old fastidious scholar was living in fancy in the world's youth, as became a man who in boyhood had seen the glory of life in the enchanted pages of Homer. To the last he knew the secret of eternal youth, and was never a pessimist, either in regard to himself or the world.

THE sale of the late Mr. Augustin Daly's books in New York last week was a peculiar affair. Great pressure had been used to have it transferred to London, but without success; and while Americans gloried in the most important sale of literary property ever held in the United States, English collectors may be said to have aulked and stayed away. Mr. Daly's collection was simply magnificent, and one's heart aches at the distribution of treasures so essentially English. Milton's own copy of Paradise Lost, scores of letters of Charles Lamb to his friends, the original draft of Dr. Johnson's letter to Lord Chesterfield, the original MS. of "The School for Scandal," and copies of the four folio Shakespeares were among the five thousand "lots." It is contended that better prices would have been realised in London, and the American catalogue of the sale is derided by English booksellers as a thoroughly unskilled piece of work.

THE fascinating, if murderous, process known as "grangerising" was never carried out more magnificently than by Mr. Daly. His masterpiece in this line was the Dublin (1792) edition of the Douai Bible, which in its natural state is a single quarto volume. Mr. Daly distended it to forty-two volumes royal folio by the addition of over 8,000 illustrations, which included original drawings by Raphael, Cipriani, Paul Veronese, and others. Croker's edition of Boswell's Life was enlarged by Mr. Daly from two volumes to ten by the insertion of over 2,000 portraits, views, and MSS.; while Cunningham's Life of Nell Gwyn was enriched by 800 portraits, autographs, and even the tradesmen's bills presented to the Merry Monarch's favourite.

THE new Carlyle letters, published in Chambers' Journal for April, show the shaggy sage in a kindly light. Therein he appears as a subscription-raiser on behalf of Burns's sister, Mrs. Begg, who in 1842 was helped by a small Government pension and a private fund, instituted by Robert Chambers, to supplement it. To Dr. Chambers Carlyle writes as follows (the phrase, "Worship of Heroes," is explained by the fact that in the previous year Carlyle had published his lectures on Hero Worship):

Templand, Thornhill, Dumfries,
3 April, 1842.

MY DEAR SIR,—Your Samaritan endeavour on behalf of Burns's sister is worthy of all praise. It strikes one as a most tragical fact, this that you announce. How many tavern dinners are eaten yearly in all quarters of the globe, and froth-speeches delivered, in elegiac commemoration of the broken-hearted Robert Burns, with "Ah, the barbarously-entreated Poet; ah, if we had him here now!"—and his own sister is yet here, and one of those tavern dinner bills would be a benefit to her; and froth-speech is still all that results! "Be ye warmed, be ye fed,"—our pockets remain buttoned, only our foolish mouths are open, to eat and to jabber. It is damnable. Such "Wership of Heroes" is like much else that it holds of—a thing requiring peremptorily to be altered. I for one thank you that you have stirred to act in this matter, instead of dining and talking.

The remaining letters show how thoroughly Carlyle pursued his object, that of rendering substantial help to Mrs. Begg and her two daughters. In the end the pension was fully secured to the three women, and £400 or so besides. Finally Carlyle wrote to Dr. Chambers in these terms of satisfaction and good-hearted interest:

Your project for these young women and their mother meets, in every feature of it, my entire approbation. They will do better in Ayrshire every way, since they themselves wish to go thither. The scene is, at any rate, more genial, as I suppose, for representatives of Burns; by removal from Tranent, where they have from poor become "rich," they escape a multitude of mean village envious, and other impediments; they have free scope to begin on new ground a new course of activities. Being, to all appearance, sensible young women, I think there is no danger but they will do well. Their sixty pounds a-year is perhaps after all just about the happiest sum for them. Work is still useful, necessary; but no longer tyrannous tread-mill necessity; they are not dangerously lifted into a new sphere of existence, but rendered easy in the old one. We may hope, a blessing will be on that poor good household, and better outlooks on all sides are opening for them.

COLONEL PRIDEAUX continues his very full "Notes for a Bibliography of Edward FitzGerald" in Notes and Queries. Last week's instalment included notes on the three editions of the "Rubáiyát." Two hundred and fifty copies only were printed of the first edition, of which two hundred were made a present to the publisher. February 15, 1859, was the precise date of publication. From Col. Prideaux's notes the following facts may be gleaned:

The first edition of the "Rubáiyát" (1859) contained seventy-five quatrains. An Indian reprint of this edition, privately printed at Adiyár, Madras, with no indications of editorship, contained some critical matter and a few additional quatrains.

The second edition (1868) contained 110 quatrains.

The third edition had nine quatrains cancelled, leaving only a hundred and one.

The fourth edition (1879) shows little variation on the third.

CONSIDERING what has already been done by zealous Omarians (that is the word), no one need be surprised to hear of the existence of a Concordance to their gospel—a thing lovely in white vellum and crimson ribbons, ten and three-quarter pages of which—beautiful pages too, exquisitely printed—are taken up in informing the student in how many places in the four versions the article "the" occurs. We have nothing to say about the book except that it is; that it costs six shillings more than the poem itself; and that we wish we had as much time on our hands as its author, Mr. J. R. Tutin, must have had.

SOME of our poets have written war poems, but Canon Rawnsley has already written and published a whole volume of such verses. His Ballads of the War (Dent) contains fifty-three poems, dealing in poetic-journalistic, or journalistic-poetic, strain with events and incidents as they have risen. The inspiration of many of the pieces is found in the newspaper extracts appended to them. Mr. Winston Churchill's armour train exploit, the burial of General Wauchope, Lord Roberts's departure, the C.I.V. at St. Paul's, and a dozen individual heroisms receive their mead of patriotic rhyme. Bugler Dunn is not forgotten, though in this case the transition from the paragraph to the poem is hardly perceptible:

"What shall we give to you, bugler boy,
For the bugle they lost in Tugela's wave
The day you fell on Colenso plain?"
And the bugler-laddie he answered brave,
"Give?—give me leave, in the Queen's employ,
To go to the Front with my bugle again!"

Even the Queen's visit to Netley has received its sonnet.

MR. LIANG'S "Sign of the Ship" this month is sad, gay, and acute by turns. He has tender words for Frederick Tait, of the Black Watch—a champion golfer:

His prowess at his favourite game was merely the cause that made him so widely known, and, where known, he was beloved by old and young; by everybody, from the boys who carried his clubs, to the men, women, and children that liked to follow him, and watch his smiling strength and honest, open face. He brought sunshine where he came, and his mere presence added zest to life. . . . Wounded in his first fight, slain in his second, he passes into the world of those whom the Gods loved. In the words which Tennyson unconsciously borrowed from a magnificent speech of Claverh: use in Old Mortality:

His memory long shall live alone,
In all our hearts, like mournful light,
That broods above the fallen sun
And dwells in heaven half the night.

Passing on to the War, Mr. Lang protests against lies, false rumours, and premature statements, all calling for suspended judgment; and then comes a page about Mr. Traill. Concerning Paolo and Francesca, Mr. Lang has much to say in praise and blame. He doubts the acting qualities of the drama:

Lucrezia's speech on her want of progeny is merely excellent, and the second-sighted old woman is capital. But does not the most rudimentary sense of humour suggest that the business with the papers, and the eternal interruptions about not having any children, are grotesque, and, on the stage, must inevitably stir the merriment of any but the most friendly and desperately serious audience? Risum Teneatis? "D——n them, they have found it out," said Fielding, when the audience hit the blot which he had hoped they were too stupid to notice. You never can be sure that an audience will be too stupid to hit the blot.

FROM time to time we receive copies of school magazines. Three lie before us now. No. 1, The Gryphon, is the journal of the Yorkshire College, and is a well-produced monthly. In "Hints to Young Authors" one of its writers indulges in three columns of school-boy satire; but we look in vain for something to quote. More interesting are the reports of meetings of the College "Literary and Historical Society." Stevenson's philosophy was thus summed up by the writer of the paper on which the debate was founded:

HIS is a voice crying in the wilderness, not "Repent ye," but "Get pleasure!" Life is great fun if you have only brains enough to make a fool of yourself. Choose that vocation in life which will give you the worthiest pleasures. An artist's is the best life, for in the life of the artist there need be no hour without its pleasure; and if you cannot be an artist, see the artistic side of things. The really great and admirable, according to Stevenson, is the man who, whatever misfortune may come, keeps his lip stiff, and makes a happy fireside, and carries a pleasant face about to his friends and neighbours.

SCHOOL magazine No. 2 is the Ulula of the Manchester Grammar School. Here, too, we have reports of an active Debating Society. On February 28 it was moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, the influence of the Press is injurious to the true interests of the country." The remarks of one speaker were "wound up by a quotation from Cowper, which evoked some laughter." Another debate started from the motion, "That much of the criticism directed against the modern Shakespearean revival is misplaced." One boy "drew an ingenious comparison between a play marred by the splendour of its scenery and a jewel flouted by the brilliance of its setting." The same speaker, who evidently has his eye on a bishopric, "objected to the representation of religious processions upon the stage accompanied by torchlight, this promoting, as he believed, ritualistic tendencies in the more susceptible of the audience." Prodigious!

SCHOOL magazine No. 3 is entitled Past and Present, and it differs from the others in being the organ of a group of schools. Published at the Friends' School, Botham, York, it is the receptacle of news gathered from other Quaker schools, such as Ackworth, Leighton Park, Saffron Walden, Sibford, &c. It is a newsy little print, and must be enjoyed by its subscribers. The sympathies of the Ackworth scholars for the sufferers in the Indian Famine have been aroused by the reading of Mr. Kipling's story,

"William the Conqueror"; while a new and broader Quakerism is suggested by the description of "a choir song, with full band accompaniment—'See the Conquering Hero Comes.'" It was not ever thus; but if George Fox's leather breeches are getting a little worn, a khaki patch will do no harm at the present moment.

THOSE of our readers who attempted, in last week's competition, to elucidate the fragment of conversation which passed between two elderly ladies in an omnibus will be interested in the following letter which we received on Monday morning:

March 24, 1900.

SIR,—My sister and I have been much amused by your competitors' attempts to unravel our little conversation. Now that the prize is adjudicated, it may interest them to learn the true solution of the mystery.

We were discussing my step-mother's intention of dismissing an aged, intemperate, but lovable old gardener, Peter—a serious matter for him, as he is too old to get a fresh place; and his paralysed daughter Margaret, his motherless grandson Henry (aged five), and a decrepit spaniel are dependent on him. Also, his soldier son John, who has been wounded in the War, is expected home daily. John is very fond of loafing round the Hall, doing odd jobs and generally identifying himself with the family.

Hoping this explanation may be of interest,—I am, &c.,
ONE OF THE OLD LADIES IN THE OMNIBUS.

BRITISH book production in its present state will be represented at the Paris Exhibition by a collection of 267 volumes, exclusive of Bibles and Prayer-books, especially selected by the Publishers' Association. A beautifully printed catalogue of these books has been issued, and the selections seem to have been made with much discrimination. It may be interesting to indicate their character by the following specimens taken at random:

- Encyclopædia Biblica*. Edited by the Rev. T. K. Cheyne M.A., D.D., and J. Sutherland Black, M.A., LL.D.
- The Plays of W. E. Henley and R. L. Stevenson*.
- A Study in Temptations*. By John Oliver Hobbes.
- From the Hills of Dream*. By Fiona Macleod.
- Gainsborough and his Place in English Art*. By Walter Armstrong.
- London Impressions*. Etchings and Pictures in Photogravure by William Hyde, and Essays by Alice Meynell.
- The Tidal Thames*. Illustrations by W. L. Wyllie, A.R.A., and Descriptive Letterpress by Grant Allen.
- The Art of William Morris*. By Aymer Vallance.
- Don Quixote de la Mancha*. By Miguel de Cervantes. With Introduction by J. Fitzmaurice-Kelly and John Ormsby.
- Pen Drawing and Pen Draughtsmen*. By Joseph Pennell.
- The Works of Lord Byron*. Edited by E. H. Coleridge, M.A.
- Sense and Sensibility*. By Jane Austen. The Winchester Edition.
- The Happy Prince and Other Tales*. By Oscar Wilde. Illustrated by Walter Crane and Jacobus Hood.
- The Life and Letters of John Donne, Dean of St. Paul's*. Revised and Collected by Edmund Gosse.
- The Poems of Shakespeare*. Edited by George Wyndham.
- The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire*. By Edward Gibbon. Edited by J. B. Bury, M.A.
- Huon of Bordeaux*. Done into English by Sir John Bourchier, Lord Berners; and now Retold by Robert Steele. Illustrated by F. Mason.
- English Illustration: "The Sixties," 1855-1870*. By Gleeson White.
- The Nature Poems of George Meredith*. Illustrated by William Hyde.
- The Life of William Morris*. By J. W. Mackail. With Six Photogravure Portraits, and Sixteen Illustrations by E. H. New.
- Children's Singing Games*. Collected and Edited by Alice B. Gomme. Illustrations by Winifred Smith.

THE book of the hour, in a literal sense, is undoubtedly Mr. Wadham Peacock's Story of the Inter-University Boat Race. It is a compact account of every Oxford and Cambridge boat-race from the first in 1829 down to last year. The 1829 race was held on June 10, at Henley, and Oxford's victory was celebrated with fireworks. The great race did not exclude a minor one between wherries. "The actual founder of the race," says Mr. Peacock, "will probably never be discovered," so quickly does doubt enshroud history; but, "in all likelihood, Charles Wordsworth, of Christ Church, Oxford, deserves as much of the credit as anyone." It was only after thirteen races that the rowing colours light and dark blue were adopted. Mr. Peacock devotes a chapter to "The Making of a Blue," and another to the Start and general conditions of the race as it is now rowed. It is hoped to issue the book yearly, with new information, and with any revision which further inquiry and long memories may render needful.

"To Tennyson," said the Daily News the other day, "belongs the distinction of having first given voice to our latter-day Imperialism." And our contemporary proceeded to quote some lines from his poem on the opening of the Indian and Colonial Exhibition. But Tennyson had shown his Imperialist leanings long before that. When, in 1872, he published the completed Idylls of the King in sequence, he added an epilogue, addressed to the Queen, in the course of which he referred to the current proposal to let our Colonies shift for themselves, saying:

Is this the tone of empire? here the faith
That made us rulers? this, indeed, the voice
And meaning, whom the roar of Hougoumont
Left mightiest of all peoples under heaven?
    . . . The loyal to their Crown
Are loyal to their own far sons, who love
Our Ocean Empire with her boundless homes
For ever-broadening England, and her throne
In our vast Orient, and one isle, one isle,
That knows not her own greatness.

It is worth noting, further, that the notion of a practical alliance between the English-speaking peoples on both sides of the Atlantic had occurred to Tennyson so long ago as 1852, when he contributed to the Examiner a song entitled "Hands all Round." Thirty years later he reprinted the first stanza of this poem, but he did not reprint the following lines, which may, however, be found in the Memoir by his son (vol. i., p. 346):

Gigantic daughter of the West,
We drink to thee across the flood,
We know thee and we love thee best,
For art thou not of British blood?
Should War's mad blast again be blown,
Permit not thou the tyrant powers
To fight thy mother here alone,
But let thy broadsides roar with ours.

In the same year (1852), and in the same periodical, Tennyson, in "Britons, Guard Your Own," curiously anticipated a recent phase of the "Volunteer" movement:

We were the best of marksmen long ago,
We won old battles with our strength, the bow.
Now practice, yeomen,
Like those bow-men,
Till your balls fly as their shafts have flown.

Some of the stanzas of "Britons, Guard Your Own," were republished some years ago with a musical setting by Lady Tennyson. They have since been reproduced in the Memoir (vol. i., p. 344). But the whole song is worth remembering.

It is rather singular that Mr. F. W. Hayes should have based a work of fiction (A Kent Squire) on the story of Ambrose Gwynnett (the man who was saved from hanging, even as he swung on the gallows), for it is not so very long—about two years—since Miss Elsa d'Esterre-Keeling made the same story the basis of a prose romance, to which she gave the title of The Queen's Serf: Adventures of Ambrose Gwynnett in England and Spanish America. But Miss Keeling had herself been anticipated by no less a personage than Douglas Jerrold, who dramatised the leading incident in Gwynnett's career in a play produced at the Coburg Theatre about seventy years ago, and afterwards very popular in America.

I read in Bishop Walsham How's Lighter Moments this little story: "A certain rector, who was not a lively preacher, always closed his eyes when saying the Prayers. His curate wrote the following epigram:

I never see my rector's eyes;
He hides their light divine;
For when he prays he shuts his own,
And when he preaches mine."

This struck me as somewhat familiar. I turned, therefore, to George Outram's Lyrics, Legal and Miscellaneous, and therein I found the following, "On Hearing a Lady Praise a Certain Rev. Doctor's Eyes":

I cannot praise the doctor's eyes;
I never saw his glance divine;
He always shuts them when he prays,
And when he preaches he shuts mine.

This is the better version, and, I take it, the original.

Tales from Tennyson—at first sight this does not seem to be a very promising adventure. Tennyson was not great in the invention of fable. His largest work was based upon Malory. His plays, save "The Falcon" and "The Promise of May," are historical in basis; of "The Falcon" he borrowed the story, and that of "The Promise of May" is hardly worth the telling. There is, of course, the story of "The Princess" and of "Enoch Arden" and of the English "idylls," such as "Dora"; but, on the whole, the prospect is not inspiring. We shall see, in due time, what the Tennyson tale-teller makes out of his subject.

The new head of the Subscription Library at Hull—Mr. William Andrews—should find a good many of his own publications in the collection over which he is to preside. He has been an industrious compiler. Here are a few of the volumes that he has put together: A Book of Oddities, Curious Epitaphs, Historical Romance, Modern Yorkshire Poets, Famous Frosts and Frost Fairs, Curiosities of the Church, Yorkshire in Olden Times, Old-Time Punishments, Old Church Lore, The Doctor in History, &c., Curious Church Gleanings, The Lawyer in History, &c., Legal Lore, England in the Days of Old, Bygone England, and a series on the "bygones" of English counties.

They say that the version of "Pericles" which is to be performed at the Stratford-on-Avon Shakespeare Festival is to be that which Mr. John Coleman constructed a good many years ago, and which has never yet been produced. For that version Mr. Herman Merivale wrote five lyrics for musical treatment—an invocation to Ceres, a march and bacchanal, a dirge, a hymn to Neptune, and a thanksgiving ode. It will be interesting to note whether these are used at Stratford or not. Those who are curious in regard to them may read them in Mr. Merivale's volume, entitled Florien, which appeared in 1884.

Russian Literature.

A History of Russian Literature. By K. Waliszewski. (Heinemann. 6s.)

Littérature Russe. Par K. Waliszewski. (Paris: Colin et Cie.)

How difficult it is for the people of one nation to enter sympathetically into the national spirit of another people we all know, and a fresh illustration of this truth is afforded us by M. Waliszewski's History of Russian Literature. Somebody has remarked that German and Russian novelists have never been able to draw a sympathetic picture of a Frenchwoman; the fine shades and touches are always wanting, and the portrait becomes a caricature. Well, we fear that Russian literature stands to M. Waliszewski in the relation that a true Frenchwoman stands to the conscientious German novelist. Always he misconceives and misinterprets her, though he labours hard to make his picture accurate, complete, and enlightening. M. Waliszewski is both learned and vivacious, he has numerous credentials, he has followed up his subject with zeal, he is bold in theory, and has mastery over detail, but—he is notably deficient in sympathy and in intuition, and his own attitude, that of a French Pole, is half-antagonistic throughout to the Russian spirit he is seeking to unveil to the English reader.

He is unsympathetic to the Russian genius, because, for one thing, he attaches an extreme importance to the origin of the ideas of the chief Russian writers; and having (as he thinks) triumphantly traced Tolstoy to Buddha and Christ, Dostoevski to Rousseau, and every other Russian of note to some other European of note, he succeeds in falsifying his estimates of each writer's significance by using academical valuations. It matters very little where ideas come from, but it matters everything what use they are put to; and we ourselves would advance the theory that nine-tenths of the great authors of every country are great through being the warm and fertile seed-beds, as it were, in which their nation's genius, its inherited tendencies, and its potentialities fructify and come into bearing, under the special stimulus of each generation's particular outlook. The richer each individual's seed-bed, the more does he bring to flower in the light of day all the dormant inheritance of the nation's life. And in this respect Tolstoy's gospel of passivity and self-renunciation is a most valuable "find" to the critic, for it presents to us in the most emphatic way the Russian's tendency to mysticism and his devotion to an overpowering idea. Yet M. Waliszewski finds it necessary to argue with Tolstoy for twenty pages, and to criticise and refute his philosophy, whereas Tolstoy's philosophy of life is to his genius what the yolk is to the egg—i.e., the fecund principle of life! The only rational manner of criticising Tolstoy is to analyse the nature of his genius, as it manifested itself in his early work, from Childhood, Boyhood, and Youth onward, and to show that when he looks at the world it is with the piercing eyes of a great moralist in whose brain is always lurking the moral idea, "What is the nature of this man before me? Is his life good or bad?" And, further, it is the critic's duty to trace how Tolstoy's intense preoccupation with moral problems smothered his subsidiary artistic pleasure in the examination of life's problems, how the artist in him protested and broke away from time to time, and was finally silenced and held in bondage by the moralist. The whole world regrets Tolstoy's long silence in art, but it is for the critic to show how inevitably Tolstoy should develop into Tolstoyism.

We have said that M. Waliszewski is out of sympathy with the Russian mind, and our reason for asserting this is that throughout his volume he seems averse, disinclined, and indeed resolutely determined not to take the verdict that the great Russian works of art pronounce on Russian life, civilisation and character, but to saddle them all with a side European verdict of his own making. Thus Turgenev's verdict on Bazarov, no! Gogol on Tchitchikov, no! Ostrovski on the old Muscovite civilisation, no! Dostoevski on Raskolnikov, no! On Sonia, no! Tolstoy on Resurrection, no! Tchehov on The Peasants, no! Dobrolioubov on Ostrovski, no! In dozens of cases M. Waliszewski advances ingenious or learned or brilliant reasons to show us why we should discount the beliefs and judgments of Russian literature itself. Now this extremely critical attitude of mind, however stimulating it may be to literary students, is out of place when you seek to introduce one people into the mind, the genius, the national spirit of another people. The first object the literary critic should set himself, in dealing with a foreign literature, is to explain this strange people's life, their conception of life, the spirit of each age, the inevitability of the intellectual movements of the various generations, and he will look round in the literature for the chief types, among authors great or obscure, whose work best reflects all that is a national revelation and fundamentally significant of the people's life and their mental characteristics.

The critic will seek to criticise very sparingly the conceptions and ideas of the great authors in particular, because by doing so he gets himself between the literature he is explaining and the reader he is seeking to reach. The reader does not want him the critic except as a far-sighted introducer, he wants to understand, to penetrate, to realise fully how this foreign nation feels and thinks and acts, and why it is these people have thoughts and feelings so different from his own. Each literature is valuable because it gives the clue to a new world of interest, beauty or strangeness, and the critic who would guide us there must be a sympathetic interpreter, he must not set himself above the literature he is criticising.

But M. Waliszewski too often does set himself above the work of the author he is examining. Let us take his treatment of Turgenev. He gives Turgenev high praise, glowing praise, for one half of his work, for his poetic idyllic power in A Sportsman's Sketches, and for some of his portraits of women, but he condemns unsparingly the "portraits of the men of his time"—such as Roudine and Bazarov—as "not being true." Now it is quite obvious that M. Waliszewski is in line here with the average commonplace man who does not understand that Turgenev, being the supreme artist, went in search of and found the essential, the underlying idea in men and movements, and because he did not draw the surface photographic truth of the movement round him, his portraits were voted untrue. To say that "there is nothing or hardly anything in Bazarov of the terrible revolutionary whom we have since learnt to look for under this figure," is absurd. Bazarov is the revolution, the revolution that science, applying itself to politics, evoked in the mind of the whole younger generation. Bazarov is Backunin, Karl Marx, the Terrorists, the Anarchists in their whole attitude to life. But, of course, the average man never fathomed this, and M. Waliszewski comes too airily and positively with his verdict, "No, Turgenev the great artist was wrong!" And here we think that one lays one finger on M. Waliszewski's chief defect; for the accomplishment of his critical task he has very little artistic feeling, though he shows much aptitude for, and great responsiveness to, philosophic and critical investigations. Accordingly he is apt to underrate the Russian genius, which he rightly defines as resting "in certain methods of feeling," the while he is apt to overdo his "literary parallels" and derive Russian nature from Western ideas, and not the ideas enough from the Russian nature. To say of Turgenev, "his work as an artist is founded as a rule on that of the great English novelists, Thackeray and Dickens. His humanitarian and democratic leanings mark him the pupil of George Sand and Victor Hugo, and his philosophical views betray the influence of Schopenhauer. The Russian does not possess the intellectual solidity and the virile strength of the Anglo-Saxon; to say this, and to succumb to the mania for drawing "literary parallels," is to get all criticism of Turgenev out of focus. Turgenev's art was innate, his philosophy was innate, his humanitarianism and his pessimism were innate, and though the information that M. Waliszewski conveys to us in the above-quoted sentence is not literally incorrect, it deserves no more than a footnote to be added to the main disquisition on Turgenev's genius.

We have not space here to combat M. Waliszewski's judgments on other Russian authors, or on Russian literature generally, and we by no means wish to imply by this that we are ungrateful for the whole body of M. Waliszewski's learned and often brilliant commentary. His pages on Nekrasov, Lermontov, Stchedrin, Garchine, and many of his remarks on Dostoevski, strike us as being as just and sympathetic as his pages on Dobrolioubov, Turgenev, Pouchikine, and Tchekhov strike us as being arbitrary and inadequate. He may be more sympathetic to Russia and the Russian mind than we have gathered from his chapters; but if this be so we may point out to him that by carrying on in his volume half-hidden warfare with the two most striking movements nineteenth-century Russia has evolved—viz., the Slavophile movement and the Nihilist movement—he has at one blow placed in opposition to himself the most Russian of the Russian writers. Nowhere does M. Waliszewski condescend to draw a picture of the constant warfare the Autocracy has carried on against the Intelligenti; yet if he had once stated fairly and squarely the oppressive conditions under which the Russian author can alone make himself heard, the English would understand the course that Russian literature has inevitably undertaken and its own sombre character as well. M. Waliszewski has, however, kept a profound silence on this head, and perhaps this action of his is not so out of place in the French edition of his work as in the English translation.

South Africa and the War.—IV.

The Natal Campaign. By Bennet Burleigh. (Chapman & Hall. 6s. net.)

Towards Pretoria. By Julian Ralph. (Pearson, Ltd. 6s.)

Queen or President? An Indictment of Paul Kruger. By S. M. Gluckstein. (Grant Richards. 2s. 6d.)

War with the Boers. By Harold Brown. (Virtue & Co.)

The Transvaal in War and Peace. By Neville Edwards. (Virtue & Co.)

MR. BENNET BURLEIGH'S book may be named as the latest type of war literature. Consisting of 400 pages, every word of it has been written in unavoidable haste. It is the telegraphed record of battle and bivouac, lifted from the newspaper and put into cloth covers. It must be taken for what it is—a rough description of the war. Any comments or conclusions which it contains must be regarded as the comments and conclusions of the moment—needing ratification and subject to change. Mr. Burleigh will no doubt write another book describing the second half of the war, and write it under the same hard and hasty conditions. A third book, sifting both its predecessors, would doubtless be needed to give us Mr. Burleigh's final and mature account of the Boer War. These things being so, we have only to remark that this book is very readable in the ordinary newspaper sense. Mr. Burleigh is a thoroughly experienced and very hard-working war correspondent, and if his descriptions do not fire and freshen the imagination like those of Mr. Steevens, they are always intelligible and packed with genuinely observed detail. They are printed almost exactly as they have appeared in the Daily Telegraph. Here is an anecdote in which some curious amenities of the battle-field are revealed. At Colenso Colonel Thackeray found himself in a dangerous corner to which he had advanced with a mixed lot of Dublins, Connaughts, and Borderers. This is what happened:

Some of the Boers pushed south, whilst Colonel Thackeray and his men were moving towards the rear. Having learned that a general retirement had been ordered, the Boer leader called to Colonel Thackeray that he was a prisoner, with the rest of the soldiers. "Oh no," said Colonel Thackeray, "we were firing all the time. You advanced under the Red Cross, as if it were a flag of truce, and we let you." "Well, now, you must lay down your arms," said the Boer Commandant. "No; why should we?" asked Colonel Thackeray; "let us go back and begin again." Then the gallant Inniskilling started to argue the point. Strange to say he almost convinced, and, at any rate, gained the respect of the Boer, who said at last, bluntly, "Well, I have no orders. Perhaps you are right. I'll turn my back and won't see you. So you can clear off with all your men." Colonel Thackeray did so with promptitude.

If Mr. Burleigh's narratives are told in the English of the morning paper, they often haunt the reader as mere statements of fact. It was Mr. Burleigh who told England of that superb incident in the battle of Colenso, when the gunners would not leave their guns. At the last, four men persisted in serving two guns and remaining beside their cannon. One of either pair carried the shell; the others laid and fired their beloved 15-pounders. But two men were left. They continued the unequal battle. They exhausted the ordinary ammunition, and finally drew upon and fired the emergency rounds of case—their last shot. Then they stood to "Attention" beside the gun, and an instant later fell pierced through and through by Boer bullets.

Such deaths make life seem rich.

Mr. Julian Ralph brings less experience, but more literary resource, to his narrative of the operations under Lord Methuen. His chapters are in the main identical with his despatches to the Daily Mail. The battles of Belmont, Graspan, Modder River, and Magersfontein were witnessed by Mr. Ralph, and he gives a description of each which may fairly be called vivid and stirring. It is the fact, however, that in the multitude of narratives there is an inevitable loss of effect; the reader looks instinctively for what is fresh or different in the work of any single war correspondent. Mr. Ralph's fresh note is his descriptions of camp amenities, the feelings of battle, the life of the camps when no shots were being fired. He describes a modern battle as a singularly sober affair. The immense distances involved thin out the dramatic effects wonderfully. Sounds are many, but they are too far separated to mingle; the "roar of battle" is not often heard:

You may hear one of our big guns loosed three miles over on the right, and another two miles on the left. If you are near they make a tremendous noise, yet I have not heard any explosion so loud as a good strong clap of thunder. The guns of the enemy cough far in front of you, and their shells burst within your lines with a louder sound—but with no real crash or deafening roar. . . .

The scene of battle—the general view—is exceedingly orderly. There may be a desperate scrimmage where a company or two are storming a kopje, but level your glass on yonder hill, and what do you see—a fringe of tiny jets of fire from the top where the Boers are, and our men in khaki rising, and reclining, and occasionally firing, as they win their way upward. The general view displays an arrangement as methodical as a chess-board.

Then as to the "writhing and groans of the wounded." There is no writhing, and the groans are few and faint. Nor are men made profane by their wounds—the exact contrary, Mr. Ralph says, is the truth. To receive a wound feels "exactly as if you had received a powerful shock from an electric battery, and then comes a blow as if your foot (or arm, or whatever part it might be) was crushed by a stroke with a tremendous mallet. . . . The relief that is given by the dressing of a wound must be exquisite, for you hear next to no groans or moans after a doctor has given this first attention." The title, Towards Pretoria, could more properly be given to Mr. Ralph's next volume, already promised; this one should have been, Towards Bloemfontein.

The question in Mr. Gluckstein's title has been answered in few words by Lord Salisbury, and we confess that we have no great mind to read Mr. Gluckstein's extended echo of the only answer which commends itself to the nation. Mr. Gluckstein is patriotic, and we share his main conclusions; but his style does not attract. He deals in metaphors. The Boers are "biting the hand that fed them." We are "grappling" with a "crux." "The cataract before their eyes" (the eyes of the British masses) "is removed," and in their hearts is planted "the bulb of a new patriotism." What argumentative value can there be in this contemptuous statement about the Boers: "The Bible formed the alpha and omega of their education; an ancient and broken-down harmonium sufficed to gratify their musical instincts"? Mr. Kruger is by turns a "senile despot," a "polished conspirator," and "a haughty autocrat"; his fellow Boers are "mental pigmies." Since we are going to be flooded with war books, let it be asked of each: is it necessary? and is it well written? We are afraid that Mr. Gluckstein's is neither.

Although Mr. Harold Brown's book is obviously a product of the hour, it exhibits much painstaking inquiry into the deep-seated causes of the War. In its fifteen chapters only historical and preliminary events and conditions are discussed. Mr. Brown gives in popular form the varied information which Prof. Keane has already collected for a somewhat higher class of readers in his recent Boer States, Land, and People. The illustrations, which are many and excellent, aid the reader materially in forming a conception of the Boer race in its developments from the days of the Dutch East India Company downwards. Judged by its first volume, this work promises to be a stirring yet temperate record of a great racial struggle.

Mr. Neville Edwards supplies pointed, interesting notes to what is virtually a big photograph album of the life of South Africa. In these heterogeneous photographs of soldiers, guns, gold-fields, Boer homesteads, black miners, Transvaal market-places, level miles of veldt, and rugged passes of the frontier mountains, one realises bit by bit the bigness and complexity of the South African problem; and as the photographs are all good, one can examine with interest a pass in the Drakensbergs or General Buller's private saloon on the Dunnottar Castle. As a book of miscellaneous South African pictures and facts, The Transvaal in War and Peace is excellent handling.

An Untrained Bard.

Collected Writings of Samuel Laycock. (Simpkin, Marshall.)

THESE are the selected, rather than "collected," writings—almost wholly verse—of a Lancashire man born at Marsden, among the Lancashire moors, in 1826, who was placed in a Staleybridge cotton-mill when he was a boy, and spent the seventeen best years of his life as a weaver in that town. For six years he was librarian and hall-keeper in the same place, finally ending his days at the unpoetic seaside town of Blackpool. His verse is written in the Lancashire dialect, for the working-men of whom he was and among whom he lived. No one who is acquainted with the "self-taught genius," the "poet of the working classes," as he exists outside of romance, will expect high accomplishment from verse so conditioned. Burns was far from being "self-taught," and inherited a tongue which had been made the vehicle of a veritable literature by a succession of singers, named and nameless. The truly "untrained bard" has seldom that originality which is looked for at his hands. It is a futile and ill-considered expectation—for this reason, if no other: that he has not the knowledge what to avoid. Much of a poet's force is absorbed in the preliminary exclusion of what is used and has lost its virtue—as the stomach excludes what is improper for nutrition—before he can proceed to the production of truly fresh work. But the untrained poet fails in this all-necessary elimination, because he is ignorant of what he should eliminate. He has not the width of reading which would inform him that this phrase, that idea, was hackneyed. And he uses with innocent complacency images and phrases juiceless as a sucked orange.

Nor has the Lancashire Doric any of the imaginative strength which often transfigures the homespun weeds of her Scottish cousin. She is a sturdy, clean-shaped lass, but unnourished by any breath of the heights. It is much then, above all in these modern days, if we get work which is simple, direct, and attempts no hackneyed graces. Laycock's work is at least this, and it is creditable that Lancashire operatives should be fed on such wholesome and genuine food. It is utterly above the stuff on which the London operative is fed. Here is Laycock's best known and perhaps best poem, "Bonny Brid," written during the hard days of the Lancashire cotton famine:

Tha'rt welcome, little bonny brid,
But shouldn't ha' come when just tha did;
Toimes are bad.
We're short of pobbies for eawr Joe,
But that, of course, tha didn't know,
Did ta, lad?

Aw've often yeard mi feyther tell,
'At when aw coom i' th' world misel'
Trade wur slack;
And neaw its hard wark pooiu' throo—
But aw munno fear thee,—iv aw do
Tha'll go back.

Cheer up! these toimes 'll awter soon;
Aw'm beawn to beigh another spoon—
One for thee;—
An', as tha's such a pratty face,
Aw'll let thi have eawr Charlie's place,
On mi knee.

Come, come, tha needn't look so shy,
Aw am no blamin' thee, not I;
Settle deawn,
An' tak' this haupney for thisel.'
Ther's lots of sugar-sticks to sell
Deawn i' th' tawn.

Aw know when first aw coom to th' leet,
Aw're fond o' owt 'at tasted sweet;
Tha'll be th' same.
But coom, tha's never tow'd thi dad
What he's to co thi yet, mi lad,
What's thi name?

Hush! hush! tha mustn't cry this way,
But get this sope o' cinder-tay
While it's warm;
Mi mother used to give it me,
When aw wur sich a lad as thee,
In her arm.

Thi feyther's noan been wed so lung,
An' yet tha sees he's middlin' thrung
Wi' yo' o.
Besides thi little brother Ted,
We've one upsteers, asleep i' bed,
Wi' eawr Joe.

But tho' we've childer two or three,
We'll mak' a bit o' reawm for thee,
Bless thee, lad!
Tha'rt th' prattiest brid we have i' th' nest.
So hutch up closer to mi breast;
Aw'm thi dad.

This poem, which we have quoted almost entire, was, of course, hailed as worthy of Burns at his best. It is far from that; the diction is not only homely, but pobleian; there is no magic in its simplicity. But it is heartfelt; mars itself by no unhappy ambitions; and has a household appeal which no man, untrained in the higher walks of song, need be ashamed of feeling. It discovers a heart of soundness in a people when they can put forth from their own ranks such truthful writers of verse, and relish their productions.

Omar the Manichee.

Solomon and Solomonic Literature. By Moncure D. Conway. (Kegan Paul.)

"SOLOMON is alive"—that is Mr. Moncure Conway's message to his brother Omarians, to whom he dedicates this book. For, essentially, Solomon is the genius of Free Thought.

The home of the wise king—for his existence as an actual person is not denied, though it may be held doubtful—cannot be certainly determined; for to the folklore of which he is the hero Palestine, Persia, Arabia, and India contribute. Thus the famous judgment was anticipated by the wise lady Visākhā. When a similar case had perplexed the wise men of an Indian court, Visākhā said:

Speak to the two women thus: "As we do not know to which of you two the boy belongs, let her who is the strongest take the boy." When each of them has taken hold of one of the boy's hands, and he begins to cry out on account of the pain, the real mother will let go . . . but the other, who has no compassion for him, will not let go. Then beat her with a switch, and she will thereupon confess the truth of the whole matter.

The visit of the Queen of Sheba finds many parallels in Oriental legend, but is not therefore necessarily deprived of its historical character. And she has the credit of contributing elements to the final personification of Wisdom. In literature the true Solomon has been garbled and glozed by insolent Jahvist editors, who made it their business to reconcile with what the Jewish Church taught as to the character of the national deity the traditional sayings of the Wise King—since they dared not altogether suppress them.

The orthodox legend being that the Lord had put supernatural wisdom into Solomon's heart and never revoked it, in spite of his "idolatry" and secularism, it followed that the naughty man could not help continuing to be a medium of this divine person, Wisdom, and that it might be a dangerous thing to suppress any utterance of hers through Solomon—unwitting blasphemy. However profane or worldly the writings might appear to the Jahvist mind, there was no knowing what occult influence there might be in them, and the only thing editors could venture was to sprinkle through them plenteous disinfectants in the way of "Fear-of-the-Lord" wisdom.

In Jesus of Nazareth the Solomonic spirit was manifested once more, manifested most admirably, to the world. He was nurtured upon the Solomonic literature, and in His public teaching, as Mr. Conway by an array of parallel passages endeavours to show, reproduced it freely for the instruction of His contemporaries. His original contribution to human thought was, says our author, the idea of a good God—"a unique God in Judæa, and almost in modern Christendom." This idea could be reached only by a process of dichotomy, deriving evil and good from several sources. "Deliver us from the evil one" is the only original clause of the Lord's prayer. As to this aspect of the teaching of Jesus, Mr. Conway writes:

We live in an age whose clergy deal apologetically with the prominence of the Adversary of Man in the teachings of Jesus. For this fundamental principle of Jesus, Jewish monotheism has been substituted. But there are many records to attest that the moral perfection and benevolence of the Deity, which is certainly inconsistent with His omnipotence or His "permission" of the tares in nature, was the only new principle of religion affirmed. . . .

But the Master of Christendom also has suffered at the hands of "Jahvist commentators"; for He likewise, when He took up the burden of Wisdom, and rebuked the Jahvist superstition that those on whom a tower fell were subjects of a judgment, must have his stupid corrector to add: "Except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish."

We have attempted no more than to give a general notion of an interesting book. It will be seen that Mr. Conway's philosophy is simply Manichæism; and into that old, old controversy we have not the slightest inclination to follow him. Nor can it be said that his curious research into the sources and significance of the Solomonic literature, incidentally interesting as are its results, makes any conclusion sure. But it provides him plentifully with illustration, and it is always refreshing to watch how the discarded heresy of a past age is new furbished to serve as a novelty for the passing moment.

Ending Drake's Work.

The Downfall of Spain: Naval History of the Spanish-American War. By H. W. Wilson, Author of "Ironclads in Action." (Sampson Low & Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

THE smoke of those battlefields has hardly cleared, the wounds yet ache which were got in them, yet their history is here before us. We do such things now, and greater things—as the rising flood of Boer War books shows—and we do not know that it is less reliable than the older and slower way. Such productions are not histories, properly speaking, of course: they are mémoires pour servir; and such is the light in which we must regard Mr. Wilson's history of the recent Spanish-American war. But though it makes no claim to the wholeness and artistic quality of history proper, in point of careful accuracy it might compare favourably with many a narrative produced on the old tardy and solid methods. Of that the name of the author of Ironclads in Action is alone sufficient guarantee. No man was more technically competent to write the story of a war mainly naval, and he has done his work well, clearly, with the most conscientious reference to first-hand authorities wherever it was possible. He apologises, indeed, for giving the ipsissima verba of important orders, and so forth; but if it irritate the facile reader, it is none the less a fault on the right side in a work meant to have value for the reference of future writers.

The war, too, was worth doing, though not, as regards scale, of first-rate importance. It was none the less an historically memorable war: at the end of three centuries it completed the work which the ruin of the Armada began. Over two centuries after Drake was in his grave the great struggle against the Spanish colonial power reached its sorry last. And the coup de grâce was administered, not by England, which commenced the struggle, but by England's revolted colonies, by a Saxon race beyond the seas, not yet planted when the Armada sailed to its doom. And when the dust of Spain's aged colonial empire rolled away, Europe beheld in its stead the apparition of America in the Eastern hemisphere. Wherefrom what consequences shall come may no man say.

As a war it was curious to a point almost of burlesque from some aspects. For it was the strife of two nations neither ready to fight, and with great difficulty in getting at each other. As of two men, we will say, abusing each other across a high wall, while each strains violently to get on his misfitting boots. But unreadiness was the one point the strong new country and the weak old country had in common. Spain's councils were incompetent, her navies and armies misdirected by the politicians at home. Having a fleet none too strong, she divided it—as England did her armies at the beginning of the present war. The American fleet, on the other hand, seems to have been ably handled by the naval department of the Government. They had one object, and they kept steadily to it. Spain was to be beaten at Cuba, and beaten by blockade. Bar up the two chief ports—Havana and Cienfuegos—and either Cuba must be starved into surrender or the Spanish fleet must cross the seas and fight America in her own waters. So America girdled in the ports, and waited. It was a misfortune for her that her long and undefended coast-line obliged her—in order to quiet popular fear—to keep half her battle fleet inactive at Hampton Roads, when it was badly needed to complete the blockade of Cienfuegos. But it was kept ready to join the other half, under Sampson, as soon as the position of the Spanish fleet should be known.

The game succeeded. Spain had to send her fleet across the ocean; but, most foolishly, she sent only part of it. The other part, under Camara, never took part in the war at all. Cervera did what he could, with his inadequate squadron. He could only dodge for a while, and as soon as his whereabouts was known all was over. Telegraphs and swift cruisers brought the two American fleets, Sampson's and Schley's, into junction before either could be attacked separately, and set them across the mouth of Santiago, "bottling" the unhappy Cervera.

The true hero of the war was not the popular Dewey, but the abused Sampson. Dewey occupies the frontispiece of Mr. Wilson's book—in deference, we presume, to the public; for his opinion seems to be very much ours. Manila made a brilliant noise, but the war could neither be won nor lost in the Philippines. It was Sampson's patience, precision, and skill in the operations that led up to the "bottling" of Cervera, and ultimately the battle of Santiago, which decided the war.

His blockade of Cervera in Santiago was not only extremely skilful, but daring, and daring with knowledge. One device is thus described by Mr. Wilson:

On nights when there was no moon a battleship was stationed from one to two miles off the entrance to the harbour, and was ordered to throw a search-light beam up the channel and keep it there. "This," says the Admiral in his report, "lightened up the entire breadth of the channel for half a mile inside of the entrance so brilliantly that the movement of small boats could be detected. Why the batteries never opened fire upon the search-light ship was always a matter of surprise to me; but they never did."

Even riflemen firing on the search-lights might have caused serious loss and annoyance; but the Spaniards remained inactive. "What damned impudence!" said the British naval attaché, when he watched the blockaders' proceedings—and impudence it was, but of the coolest and most calculating kind.

"Fighting Bob" Evans, of the Iowa, gives a detailed account of his own share in this "damned impudence," which is eminently worth quoting:

"Admiral Sampson signalled me to take the Iowa up the harbour-mouth. 'How far must I go?' I signalled back, I confess with considerable anxiety, as, besides Cervera's fleet, the forts, and batteries, there were doubtless countless torpedoes in there. 'Go in until you can distinguish the movements of a small rowing-boat in the harbour,' came back the answer. 'How long must I stay?' I again anxiously signalled. 'All night,' was the answer. I went up that harbour until I could not only plainly follow the movements of any small boat ahead of me with my glass, but could notice the blinking eyes of the Spanish sentries as the search-light struck them. For thirty-nine nights we kept that kind of watch on Cervera."

Such men were the worthy descendants of Drake; fit to figure in bolder enterprises than it has now become to "sing the beard of the King of Spain." The war, in such hands, was a foregone conclusion.

Other New Books.

THE FIRST DUTCH WAR, 1652-1654. VOL. II.

ED. BY S. R. GARDINER.

This, the second volume of this very interesting work, compiled under the auspices of the Navy Records Society, carries the story down to October, 1652, by means of a variety of documents: instructions to Sir George Ayscue, despatches from General Blake, Vice-Admiral Penn, Captain John Mildmay, Commodore De Ruyter, Vice-Admiral De With, and many letters from men with the respective fleets. On looking through these old papers one meets, on the English side, with something of the same strain of fervid piety and confident belief in particular protection by God, which characterises the other side's descendants in the Transvaal to-day. Captain Mildmay notes that, in a late encounter with the Dutch fleet, "God did much appear, in many circumstances very evidently checking the pride and arrogance of that insulting Enemy"; again, on the same occasion, "the Lord of Hosts appeared in His power, putting terror in the hearts of our enemy, and a spirit of great cheerfulness and courage in our own; wherefore let His great name have all the honour and praise, yea, magnified be His glorious name who hath owned our cause in this great dispute, and quelled the pride and arrogancy of that insulting enemy." This brief praise of the Sovereign's performance in the battle of the Kentish Knock is memorable: "The Sovereign—that great ship, a delicate frigate (I think the whole world hath not her like)—did her part; she sailed through and through the Holland fleet, and played hard upon them." (Navy Records Society.)

RHYMES OLD AND NEW.

BY M. E. S. WRIGHT.

The author of this collection of folk rhymes, weather couplets, and old-fashioned scraps of verse, was inspired, she tells us, to bring them together by the circumstance that many of them have not been included in other volumes for children. This is true; but it is not unlikely that quite a large proportion were deliberately rejected by other editors, on account of their extreme paucity of interest. It is not enough for a rhyme to exist to justify its inclusion in a book for children. Children want more than mere jingle and assonance and rustic sapience. Such sentiments as these are not really interesting:

'Tis time to cock your hay and corn
When the old donkey blows his horn.

'Tween Martinmas and Yule
Water's wine in every pool.

The wanton boy that kills the fly
Shall feel the spider's enmity.

Five score to the hundred of men, money, and pins,
Six score to the hundred of all other things.

And so forth. Now and then we come to something simple and good, as

A robin redbreast in a cage
Puts all heaven in a rage;

but for the most part the couplets are rather cryptic and not very musical. In one case, at any rate, Miss Wright's taste is to seek. This piece of verse would be funny in Out of the Hurly-Burly, or the Detroit Free Press, or "The Belle of New York," but in a book for children it is out of place:

Little Willie from his mirror
Sucked the mercury all off,
Thinking, in his childish error,
It would cure his whooping-cough.

At the funeral Willie's mother
Smartly said to Mrs. Brown:
"Twas a chilly day for William
When the mercury went down."

And to put the trumpery version of "Mary had a Little Lamb" (on page 51) next Blake's beautiful lines, "Little Lamb, who made thee?" is another unhappy lapse. Among the country rhymes are two that we do not remember to have seen before—this from Leicestershire:

If all the waters was wan sea,
And all the trees was wan tree,
And this here tree should fall into that there sea.
Moy, sirs! what a splash-splash there'd be!

and this Somersetshire charm for tooth-ache (to be written and worn):

Peter sat on a marble stone,
When by here Jesus came aloan.
"Peter, what is it makes you for to quake?"
"Lord Jesus, it is the toothache."
"Rise, Peter, and be healed."

If Miss Wright had lost sight of the children fetish altogether, and collected her rhymes with a view to supplementing Halliwell, and added a few notes, she would have made a good book. We recommend her to consider this volume so much apprentice work and take up the greater task in earnest. (Unwin. 3s. 6d. net.)

AN AMERICAN GENERAL.

By JOHN A. WYETH.

This book is published at a fortunate moment, for cavalry leaders are to the fore just now, and General N. B. Forrest, the Confederate soldier, was a born cavalry general. He was a wonderful man, and his troopers were devoted to him, though his very name is almost unknown in England. He was a planter when the war broke out, and had no training in military matters; but had his genius for war been reinforced by a proper education and a systematic military training he would, probably, have been the central figure of the American Civil War. Forrest's great principle in war was "to get there first with the most men"; and one of his favourite maxims was: "War means fighting and fighting means killing." He carried this out in practice, and is known to have placed hors de combat thirty Federal officers and soldiers, fighting hand to hand. General Taylor said of him: "I doubt if any commander since the days of the lion-hearted Richard killed as many enemies with his own hand as Forrest." He spared neither himself nor his men, and the one thing he would not endure was slackness or cowardice.

Every soldier under him knew it was expected that he would fight to the death if it became necessary, and he knew, moreover, that Forrest had no respect or mercy for a coward. It was his order to his officers to shoot any man who flickered, and he emphasised this order by his own conduct. There was no false sentiment in the mind of Forrest connected with war. There was an end to be reached—the independence of the Southern confederation. To that consummation everything must be subordinated. To his mind the killing of one of his own soldiers now and then, as an example of what a coward might expect, was a proper means to the end. At Murfreesborough, in 1864, he shot the colour-bearer of one of the infantry regiments which stampeded, and then succeeded in rallying the men to their duty. . . . In the fight near West Point, General Chalmers relates how Forrest leaped from his horse, and seized one of his troops who was running to the rear, and thrashed him soundly with a stick, forcing him to go back in line.

Being a genius, he learned his profession as he went on, and his favourite method was to attack the flank and rear, taking advantage of every scrap of cover. To anyone interested in cavalry and mounted infantry this life of the Confederate leader will be of great value. (Harper's. $4.)

BOOKS ABOUT PLACES.

THE Northumberland County History Committee has issued the fifth volume of its great History of Northumberland (Andrew Reid & Co., Newcastle-on-Tyne). This deals with the two parishes of Warkworth and Shilbottle, and with their outlying chapelries of Chevington and Brainshaugh. As in the previous volumes, the geology, architecture, and dialect of the Coquet valley are committed to special hands. No more romantic piece of England exists than this valley of the Coquet, a stream whose name is music to the angler as its shores are a land of promise to the antiquary. The crown of the district is Warkworth, with its castle, hermitage, and church. The account of the Hermitage has been written by Mr. Cadwallader Bates, who has also told in no iconoclastic strain the story of St. Henry of Coquet Island, who died there on January 16, 1126-1127. On that day "a man on the island thought he heard two choir of angels in the air chanting alternate verses of the Te Deum. The hymn ceased, the hermit's bell rang; the monk of the island hastened to the cell and found St. Henry seated on a stone holding the bell-rope, in all the calm of sleep—life had passed away, a mortuary candle that the saint had had no means of lighting was burning at his side." The only buildings on the island now consist of a lighthouse and its attendant cottages, lamp-stores, &c.; but these have been built upon, or adapted from ancient work. The seal, the eider-duck, and the tern have been banished from this little island of fourteen acres, within living memory; but the traditions of Saxon monks and kings, of Cuthbert and of St. Henry, will cling to it always. Under its editor, Mr. John Crawford Hodgson, this magnificent county history is making good progress, and a word of highest praise is due to the Newcastle publishers for their part in this undertaking.—In Nooks and Corners of Shropshire, by Mr. H. Thornhill Timmins (Elliot Stock), we have one more proof—a very interesting proof—of the fact that every patch and scrap of England is a mine of historical and human lore. Many of us will never see Stretton Dale, the Clee Hills, Bridgnorth, or Mitchell's Fold—to say nothing of the villages that dot the highways of southern Shropshire—and yet Mr. Timmins's book reflects hours of rich and happy inquiry among these quiet spots. His book is all his own, for he has illustrated it himself; and we could wish for no more pleasant and gossiping guidance than he offers. Mr. Timmins is already known by his "Nooks and Corners" of Herefordshire and Pembrokeshire, and he has the real topographical flair.—Haunts and Homes of the Pilgrim Fathers, by Dr. Alexander Mackennal (Religious Tract Society), is a handsome picture book, in which, however, the literary matter maintains its importance among a crowd of beautiful illustrations. The book is a topographical history of the home-leaving of the Pilgrim Fathers. We visit the places to which the hearts of the Pilgrims went back when they founded a new Boston, a new Plymouth, and a new Cambridge on the other side of the Atlantic, and each spot on which they set foot in their journey thither—Amsterdam, Leyden, Delfshaven, Southampton, and finally Plymouth, whence, in the Mayflower, the homeless saints sailed for their New Plymouth.—Scotland's Ruined Abbeys, by Mr. Howard Crosby Butler (The Macmillan Company), is an American architect's discriminating treatment of a subject which needed a book less formidable than the existing standard works. Mr. Butler's book is of considerable interest to the general reader and of distinct value to the tourist. Mr. Butler is his own illustrator.

Fiction.

Scruples. By Thomas Cobb.
(Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.)

INTO a little pool of London society drop a beautiful girl of sentiment, conscience, and no sense of humour; what sort of a splash will occur? That is Mr. Thomas Cobb's problem, if so serious a word may be used in connexion with so light-hearted a story. And Mr. Cobb has cast his pebble with unerring aim, and caught the bubbles deftly. In Carpet Courtship and in Mr. Passingham he sported pleasingly upon the surface of life, but he has done nothing so deft as the present work. It is not a novel; it is a short story; there is no development of character, only a swift play of characters already formed; and the time is limited by days. The cleverness of the thing lies in the conflict of emotions felt by quite ordinary people under perfectly ordinary conditions. Of leading characters we have six: Strachan, a good and simple baronet; Venables, a young British officer with nothing of the man of the world about him but his clothes; and Wray Waterhouse, a modern pocket edition of Don Quixote. Then we have Joan Venables, the pretty aunt of the officer; Amabel Cathcart, a bit of a minx who makes things hum; and Pauline Cathcart. The question that will agitate the reader is who shall marry whom; for they are all in love in quite a gentlemanly and ladylike manner; and with Mr. Cobb's skilful stirring of the social pool, and Pauline's scruples, and Waterhouse's Quixotism, and Joan's innocent intrigues, and Amabel's flirting, one is apprehensive of mésalliance to the end. It is impossible to avoid "casting" Mr. Cobb's story, since his method lies by way of dialogue—swift, easy, apposite dialogue—which never turns aside to say a good thing because the author had jotted it down in his commonplace book, but carries the story forward with each sentence. The story is dramatic, because Mr. Cobb has learned that the art of writing drama is the art of throwing good things into the waste-paper basket. Therefore, without detailing the development of the plot, it is impossible to give an example of the adequacy of the dialogue. However, take this as instance of its easy naturalness: Joan Venables, the pretty aunt, is talking to Bernard Venables, the youthful officer, about Amabel the minx; says the youthful officer:

"I can't stand her going on as she did last night. Everyone noticed it. I'm not going to put up with it. It's just a little too thick."

"You have only yourself to please, my dear boy."

"I don't please myself," he muttered.

"Have you asked Amabel?"

"I haven't exactly asked her," said Bernard.

"Wouldn't it be as well before your final renunciation?" Joan suggested. "Take my advice: ask her plainly whether she will be your wife."

"You see, I've tried ever so many times," he answered ruefully.

"Tried?"

"She won't let me get it out, you know."

"How can she prevent you?" asked Joan.

"Sometimes she begins to play the piano. Last time she put her hand over my lips."

"What a curious method!" said Joan, very solemnly.

"I can't make Amabel out," he exclaimed. "She's immensely nice to me one hour, and she treats me like a criminal the next. Besides, she's just as nice to other fellows."

"It is to be hoped she doesn't silence them all the same way," Joan retorted.

The Engraffed Rose. By Emma Brooke.
(Hutchinson. 6s.)

HERE is a good novel, at once strong and sound. Says the author in a passage dealing with the principal heroine, Rosamunda Thoresbye: "To be a genuine artist is to view all the parts of existence with a special temperament, it is to possess a clue to the meaning of things which others are unaware of; to have an unwritten law of one's own by which to test all the manifestations of life and conduct. The power of the artist is a light cast everywhere." It is this "light cast everywhere," this continual poetising of reality without distorting its truth, which makes The Engraffed Rose notable among the fiction of the day. Mrs. Brooke's somewhat melodramatic theme turns upon the fortunes of the old aristocratic-barbarian family of Clarels, who had lived for centuries at a seat called Marske. (All the place-names and surnames in this novel have a fine northern sound—Clarel, Marske, Hawmonde, Liedes, Thirntoft, Twelves, Brackenholme, Ronaldsbigin.) We see the working of the Clarel blood in three people: Clement Clarel, who sold his happiness and that of others to enable him to transmit the family traditions unimpaired; Bryan Hawmonde, a distant cousin, whose existence is a prolonged defence of his own individuality against the "herd of ancestors" within him; and Rosamunda Thoresbye, who, changed at birth by an unscrupulous midwife, lived for twenty years under the impression that she was the daughter of eminently just and respectable mill-owning parents.

Mrs. Brooke succeeds better with her women and older men than with her young men. Bryan Hawmonde, meant to be an elaborate figure, is analysed before he has been constructed, and his friend Earnshaw, who marries Rosamunda, scarcely seems alive.

The chief blot on the book lies, not in the theatrical prologue, which is managed with all necessary skill, but in the chapter recording Rosamunda's gipsy-like adventures after she has learnt the secret of her birth. These adventures never occurred, they are utterly wrong—a trick played upon the author by an imagination which, approaching the end of a heavy task, had become slightly hysteric and unstable; but whatever the faults of The Engraffed Rose, impotence is not among them; even its crudities—and they are not few—have interest.

The Cambric Mask. By R. W. Chambers.
(Macmillan & Co., Ltd. 6s.)

SINCE Mr. Chambers has produced a considerable quantity of serious and excellent fiction, we must regard this somewhat exiguous and crudely-tinted "romance" as the product of his lighter hours. The tale tells how a company of lawless night-riders (who rode their horses swathed in sheets) tried to frighten a determined man out of a remote part of a remote county of the "Empire State"; how, incensed by his obstinacy, they nearly murdered him; and how in the end, aided by the lovely daughter of one of their number, the determined man, Sark by name, won his immunity and a wife. The local colour is consistently well done. Several chapters are thrilling, and we do not object to these. We do object, however, to the facetious and sentimental chapters, which predominate. They are unworthy of the author of The King in Yellow.

The book is a quaint mixture of good and bad writing. We find, for instance, a sentence like this: "He rolled up his pajamas [sic], stepped out of his crash bath-slippers, and stole to the front door, upon cavorting bent, beaming bucolic beatitude." And a little further on, some admirable bits of landscape painting; as thus: "Out of the splendid azure of the west great white clouds crowded, squadron on squadron, standing gallantly on their course before the wind; and silvery flaws swept the water where the wind's wing-tips, trailing, brushed the blue surface of the lake."

The Cambric Mask is far too faulty to have any real value, but we should imagine that the history of its composition might be interesting.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

ARDEN MASSITER.

BY DR. WILLIAM BARRY.

In this novel, by the learned author of The New Antigone and The Two Standards, we have a gorgeous arrangement of motives and colour—Socialism, Catholicism, love, asceticism, and Italian skies and ruins, all ending in a quotation from Sophocles in Greek. (Unwin. 6s.)

THE KINGS OF THE EAST.

BY SYDNEY C. GRIER.

A clever "romance of the near future," by the author of Like Another Helen. The motive is the re-peopling of Palestine, and in the opening chapters we see a syndicate forming for that purpose under the masterful "Count Mortimer"—an Englishman and a Gentile. His diplomacies make the story, which develops all kinds of interests, and is pervaded by an amusing cynicism. (Blackwood & Sons. 6s.)

BREAKING THE SHACKLES.

BY FRANK BARRETT.

A story of an innocent man—Dr. Munro—condemned to penal servitude for life, and the sleepless efforts of his friend, Captain Tom Vernon, to prove his innocence. A detective story, worthy of its author's reputation. (Macqueen. 6s.)

THE GREEN FLAG, AND OTHER STORIES OF WAR AND SPORT.

BY A. CONAN DOYLE.

These thirteen stories are sufficiently described by their title. In "Captain Sharkey," a story of privateering in the years following the Peace of Utrecht, we have some snatches of verse.

So it's up and it's over to Stornoway Bay,
Pack it on! Crack it on! Try her with the stun-sails!
It's off on a bowline to Stornoway Bay,
Where the liquor is good and the lasses are gay,
Waiting for their bully Jack,
Watching for him sailing back,
Right across the Lowland Sea.

(Smith, Elder &amp; Co. 6s.)

THE SON OF THE HOUSE.

BY BERTHA THOMAS.

This novel, by the author of The Violin Player, deals with Mammon. A vulgar glove-maker's fortune is the rock on which a family of three splits up. The son of the house is relied on by his mother to complete those social ambitions which her vulgar husband had only partially gratified, but Oswald develops views about the responsibilities of wealth which unite his mother and his brother Ralph in opposition to him. Ralph steals his sweetheart, and his mother puts him into a lunatic asylum. But Oswald is reserved for better things. An interesting story with a variety of character. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

FORTUNE'S YELLOW.

BY ELLA MACMAHON.

Another novel with Mammon-service for its basic passion. The reader's interest should be aroused by the meeting of Bernard Lake with his old fiancée, Louise Headingham, who arrives at his Italian hotel after twenty-one years' separation—a rich widow, with children, governesses, maids, and trunks. Louise's eldest daughter, Nora, is now a finely-grown young creature, and Bernard is still feeling young. Complications! (Hutchinson. 6s.)

A FAIR BRIGAND.

BY GEORGE HORTON.

"I tell you, we're going to climb Mount Olympus. We are going to hobnob with the immortal gods! We start to-morrow morning for Volo, by boat, thence to Larissa, and from there on foot." Thus Anderson of the fiery whiskers to John Chandler Brown, expert in Argive bronzes. Already one sees the "fair brigand" ahead. A good story of its type, capitally illustrated by Mr. Edmund J. Sullivan. (Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.)

THE RHYMER.

BY ALLAN M'LAULAY.

The "rhymer" is Robert Burns, whose loves pervade the story—particularly his marriage with Jean Armour, and his affair with "Clarinda." Two sets of critics are challenged by such a story, but Mr. M'Aulay has obviously taken pains to satisfy both. (Unwin. 6s.)

A SISTER TO EVANGELINE.

BY CHARLES G. D. ROBERTS.

The Evangeline is Longfellow's Evangeline, and the story is laid in Longfellow's Grand Pré, and it tells how Yvonne de Lamourie suffered exile with the rest of the villagers. The Acadian apple-orchards and linen caps of the girls give charm to the background of the story, while the rivalry of England and France occupies, so to speak, the middle distance of the drama. (Lane. 6s.)

THE ADVENTURE OF

PRINCESS SYLVIA.

BY MRS. C. N. WILLIAMSON.

The fictional-monarchical vein once more. Sylvia is wooed at Richmond by Maximilian, Emperor of Rhaetia, and to Rhaetia the story quickly moves. There are baronesses, and burgomasters, and chamois and chancellors; also telephones. (Methuen. 6d.)

THE ACCUSED PRINCESS.

BY ALLEN UPWARD.

Yet another unmapped monarchy, that of Rumelia, with its king, court, ministers, and sentinels. Throw in the "ruby of Bhuráni," and the British Government, and you have Mr. Upward's latest recipe for an evening's beguilement. (Pearson Ltd. 6s.)

A LOYAL LOVER.

BY MRS. LOVETT CAMERON.

Two sisters engage the reader's attention—Elsie, the flighty and selfish, and Venetia, the wise and good. Venetia's effort to save her sister from the effects of a past scandal, by marrying the man who had it in his power to betray Elsie, is the "vain sacrifice"; but there is more in the story, which is a readable library novel. (Pearson Ltd. 6s.)

ALL FOOLS.

BY MARMADUKE PICKTHALL.

Some readers may find the London adventures of Mr. Lee-Stretton, his fellow-students, and their miscellaneous sweethearts, entertaining; others will yawn over such outworn, boisterous humour. Perhaps the whole book may be allusively described by the heading of Chapter XXXI.: "Of the Moon and others, with a full account of the circumstances attending the Breakage of a Suburban Hall Lamp." (Sonnenschein. 6s.)

THE BISHOP'S SECRET.

BY FERGUS HUME.

More criminal mystery and melodrama by the author of The Mystery of a Hansom Cab, who has dared to make a Bishop's palace the centre of a murder case, and has found a supernaturally clever detective in the Bishop's chaplain. The broader humours of cathedral town life are not missed. (John Long. 6s.)

THE DISENCHANTMENT OF NURSE DOROTHY.

BY FLORENCE BAXENDALE.

"A worm eats at the root of the common hospital system, and causes suffering to patients and nurses alike . . . the microbe of over-work." The story seems to be written to establish this proposition, but Dorothy suffered more from a house-surgeon's love than from a matron's tyranny. (Skeffington. 3s. 6d.)

The Craze for Historical Fiction in America.

An Enquiry.

THE historical novel is not at present flourishing in this country. It enjoyed a renewal some few years ago, when A Gentleman of France flashed sword in every face; but the brief force of that movement seems already to be expended. There can be little doubt, indeed, that the art of historical fiction is dead in England, and that he who would succeed in raising it must first create for it a new form, a governing convention more in accord with naturalistic tendencies than that which has miraculously survived all the artistic upheavals of ninety years. Matters are otherwise in America and France, the two countries nearest to us in art as in life. France is witnessing, or about to witness, a real renaissance of the historical novel—a renaissance which M. Emile Faguet, employing a theory more creditable to his ingenuity than to his sagacity, explains on the singular assumption that realism has exhausted the material offered by modern existence. In America the historical novel overtops every other sort: it is making authors rich and turning publishers into millionaires; the circulation of it counts not by thousands, but by hundreds of thousands, and the man or woman who, having omitted to peruse it, cannot discuss it with fluency, is thereby rendered an outcast. The two most notorious and amazing examples of its success (at the moment of writing), Mr. Winston Churchill's Richard Carvel and Mr. Paul Leicester Ford's Janice Meredith, although neither is a year old, have between them already reached a sale of nearly three quarters of a million copies in the United States.

These two long novels—they total over a thousand pages—both deal with the period of the American Revolution; they both include the figure of George Washington; and in other respects of tone, colour, sentiment, and incident they are remarkably alike. The chief thing to be noted of them is their perfect lack of originality; they are not the fruit of any inspiration, but a dish meticulously concocted upon a recipe; and the recipe is by no means a new one. Conceive a musical composer who at this date should capture the ear of the populace by an exact, but lifeless, imitation of Mendelssohn. It is such a feat in literature that these authors have performed. To read their amiable stories is to wonder whether the art of fiction has not stood still for fifty years, whether the discoveries and the struggles of a dozen writers in France, England, and America since 1850 are after all in vain. Esmond is a great book, but no man of a later period could possibly produce a great, or even a fine, book that resembled it; for time breaks every mould. Richard Carvel is by far the better of the two American novels which I have mentioned; and what one feels about Richard Carvel is that it is the work of a man who kept a bust of Thackeray over a bookcase crowded with eighteenth century literature, and wrote with one eye on this and the other (perhaps unconsciously) on that airy, fairy creature known in the States as “the matinée girl,” forgetting that he, even he, ought to have a personality. Mr. Churchill has learned everything about his craft, except the two things which cannot be taught—the art of seeing and the art of being one's self. He looks only at pictures, and then, piecing this with that and that with another, confects an enormous canvas without once leaving the gallery. He is not himself—artistically he has no self—but rather the impersonal automatic result of a century of gradual decadence from one supreme exemplar. In Richard Carvel every primary tint is lost, every sharp relief smoothed down. The conventions which formerly had a significance and an aim properly related to the stage of art which evolved them, have been narrowed instead of widened, until they are become meaningless, arbitrary, and tiresome. The heroine with her peerless beauty, her royal tantrums, her feminine absolutism, her secret, her hidden devotion, her ultimate surrender; the hero of six-foot-three, with his physical supremacy, his impetuosities, his careful impromptus of wit, his amazing combinations of Machiavellian skill with asinine fatuity, his habit of looking foolish in the presence of the proud fair, and his sickening false modesty in relating his own wondrous exploits; the secondary heroine, pretty, too, but with a lowlier charm, meek, steadfast, with a mission “to fatten household sinners”; the transparent villain who could not deceive a sheep, but who deceives all save the hero; the “first old gentleman”; the faithful friend; the boon companions; the body servant: all these types, dressed with archaeological accuracy, perform at Mr. Churchill's prompting all the usual manoeuvres with all the usual phrases and gestures. Who does not know that speech of the heroine's ending: “And so, sir, you are very tiresome,” to which the hero must perforce reply “ruefully”; or that critical moment, half-way through the narrative, when a few words which if spoken would end the story on the next page, are interrupted in the nick of time—“Alas, for the exits and entrances of life! Here comes the footman”; or that astronomical phenomenon—“The light had gone out of the sky”; or that solitary wild outburst of my lady—“Her breath came fast, and mine, as she laid a hand upon my arm, ‘Richard, I do not care whether you are poor. What am I saying?’ she cried wildly. ‘Am I false to my own father?’”

Let it not be thought, however, that there is no merit in Richard Carvel, or in the more saucy Janice Meredith. What these authors, neither of them apparently with any strictly literary culture, could do that they have done. In the case of Mr. Churchill particularly, one cannot fail to perceive laborious care, a certain moral elevation, and an admirable sense of dignity. He has been satisfied with nothing less than his best. His style may be a beach pebble among gems, but it is polished. He may not be a student of character, but he knows his eighteenth century; he is a giant of documentation, and the mere factual basis of his descriptions of eighteenth century life in America and England is almost incredibly elaborate, and decidedly effective; whether he is giving you the interior of Brooks's or a naval battle with Paul Jones in it, he reconstructs the scene to the last limit of research. His historical portraits, including those of Fox, Walpole, Garrick and Washington, are as brilliant and hard and exact as the exercises of a court painter. He can plan out a work, arranging the disposition of its parts, and handling vast masses of detail with the manipulative skill of a transport officer. He knows when dialogue should be used, and when narration; how to give substance to a chapter, and theatrical ornament to an episode; when the reader will best appreciate a diversion from the main theme, and when the device of monotony will build up a pleasing tension. He is the type of artist who takes the Prix de Rome by dint of sheer mathematical calculation. And withal, there is no breadth of imaginative life in him. He could no more avoid being tedious, profoundly and entirely tedious, than he could add a cubit to his stature.

America is a land of sentimentalism. It is this deep-seated quality which, perhaps, accounts for the vogue of history in American fiction. The themes of the historical novel are so remote, ideas about them exist so nebulously in the mind, that a writer may safely use the most barefaced distortions to pamper the fancy without offending that natural and racial shrewdness which would bestir itself if a means of verification were at hand. The extraordinary notion still obtains that human nature was different "in those days"; that the good old times were, somehow, "pretty," and governed by fates poetically just. Enquiry would of course dissipate this notion, but no one wants to dissipate it; so long as it remains, there is at any rate some excuse for those excesses of prettiness, that luxuriant sentimentality, that persistent statement of life in terms of the Christmas number, which are the fundamental secret of the success of novels like Richard Carvel and Janice Meredith. There are, of course, other factors special to America which have their share in the dazzling result. One is the pride of the nation in its brief traditions. Shall not he who ministers to this pride be rewarded? It would be strange, indeed, if he were not. When a man hears that his name is in the newspaper he buys the newspaper, and a long time will elapse before he loses the habit. So it is with America. We, with a thousand thrilling years behind us, can scarcely understand the preoccupation of America with her Revolution and her Civil War. But why not? I say that the trail is as charming as the disturbance of a young girl after her first ball.

Another factor is the unique position and influence of young women in the United States. We are told that it is the women who rule the libraries in England; much more so is it the women who rule the libraries in America. And if you would know what sort of an intellectual creature the American woman is, what a curious mixture of earnest and gay, ardent and frivolous, splendid and absurd, read her especial organ, The Ladies' Home Journal of Philadelphia, which is one of the most brilliantly-edited papers in the world, and has a circulation of over eight hundred thousand copies a month. Here, in this glowing and piquant miscellany, where religion runs column by column with modes and etiquette, and the most famous English-writing authors are elbowed by the Tupper and Friswells of New England, you will discern at large the true nature of Mr. C. D. Gibson's girl—the width of her curiosity, the consuming fire of her energy, her strange knowledge and her stranger ignorances, her fineness and crudity, her imperial mien and her simple adorations. It is fitting to remark of the American woman that she has a magnificent future. In the meantime she cannot gainsay her Ladies' Home Journal, which stands as absolutely irrefutable evidence both for and against her. She is there in its pages, utterly revealed—the woman of the culture clubs, the woman who wistfully admires the profiles of star-actors at matinées, the woman from whom Paderewski, at the Chicago Auditorium, has to be rescued by the police, the Madonna of the home, the cherisher of aspirations, the desire of men. It is she who reads and propagates Richard Carvel and Janice Meredith, artlessly enjoying the sugar of them, made oblivious of their tedium by her sincere eagerness to "get instruction" from them, to treat them as "serious" works—not as "ordinary novels."

An explanatory word. There are far better historical novels in America than the two mentioned. The best taste in America esteems Richard Carvel and Janice Meredith as the best taste esteems them here. The interest of these novels lies in their marvellous success, and the clue which they afford to the secrets of a whole people's individuality. For it is not those who read but those who (speaking broadly) do not read that make a book popular. The former are few, the latter a multitude. The former we know familiarly; the ways of the latter are as fascinating, as mystifying, as the ways of children. E. A. B.

Things Seen.

Augury.

FROM the hateful offices we emerged into the fog once more and the dull rain and the unhomely activity of the crowded city streets. The rude failure of our errand left nothing to stand between my companion and all the ugliness that was piling itself up to stare him in the face. I had wished to save Delaunay, where I could, from the England he hated, with no mean or little bitterness, as he saw us from his distant Paris. I would have kept him at home, in the unoffending West, and surrounded him, during the three short days of this rare visit, not with my countrymen in the mass, but with the charming individuals. A pious duty, however, drew him to the City, and the kindly thought of seeing again his father's ward, now some six months in London, learning English business ways, had lightened our journey up. But the young man (there was no hinting that English life, obviously, was not all to blame) had no welcome for the simple and warm gaiety with which the elder brother came ready. It was a shyness, a stupid boyish shame of his countryman in the office. I saw it directly he entered, awkward and flushing, the outer room where we stood; the beard Delaunay wore and his square felt hat—one hardly needed to look further for a reason. . . .

In the lack of converse, a silence that meant no separation between us, a swe walked side by side, but rather an anxious and fruitless sympathy, I might acknowledge that the disappointment was a chance, and no more significant of our influence than the unfortunate fog and damp of this April day was fair to our climate; yet I could not help meeting with his eyes the oppressive stream of occupied men, I found myself seeking I know not what sign of grace in the drab crowd. In the doorways of the offices I read long names that covered schemes of plunder, and, as if to support their uttermost claims, newspaper boys thrust in our faces posters swelling with the name that on the Continent stood most for England's policy. We slipped into the comparative peace of a side street—would the spare church above the long wall pass unnoticed, or perhaps only add for him the missing touch of hypocrisy? As I stared helplessly at the brown wall, feeling that no human argument could persuade my companion that he was not in a heaven-forsaken city, the brownness seemed to lighten—surely a gleam lay on it—yes it was so, and, of a sudden, with the last drop that fell, the fog was a golden glow, intense blue in the shadows, the chestnut glistened in a mist from the churchyard, and at that moment there sang out from its branches, penetrating sweet, yet loud and authoritative, four notes of a blackbird. Arrested, we stood still for the bird to speak again, and, as fortune would have it, two workmen who were behind us halted also. The phrase came, longer, more elaborate, more daring and supreme than the first. Delaunay turned his clear brown eyes, smiling in the sudden sunlight, to mine, and laid his hand upon my sleeve—

"Tenez, le bon Dieu n'est pas de mon avis."

Relief.

In the silent village the windows were all veiled; but as I passed down the little street one of the doors opened, and a woman came out of its shade. A young woman, hurried and anxious—scared at the unexpected sight of my figure, yet glad of the protection of my company. She was slight and frail-looking, and in her arms she carried a heavy child wrapped in a trailing white quilt. I raised the corner, which was dragging on the road, and asked if the baby was not too heavy for her. She poured out her heart in little gasping sentences: "Oh, no! she's not a baby; she's a big girl—four years old—but I couldn't stay in the house any longer, and I couldn't leave her, so I took her out of bed and brought her along. You see, my husband's never come home,—I'm afraid there's an accident, and I can't rest in the house. I've walked up and down, and I can't stay in the room. Yes, ma'am; my husband's the baker at the shop. They're busy now, and it's terrible long hours for him to work, from half-past four in the morning till eleven or twelve o'clock at night—it's too much for him. He was bit by a dog about a fortnight ago, and it upset him; he's not been very well since, and—oh!—I'm afraid." She clutched the sleepy child tighter, and staggered on breathlessly.

At the gate of the little bakehouse yard the dog which had bitten her husband—chained now, but jealously watchful—barked furiously. She shrank along the further side of the yard to the bakehouse door, where she stood with her white burden in the yellow glare of the fire, while the moon shed its radiance over all. "Jim!"—a hurried, anxious whisper—"Jim! Jim!"—this last a sharp, terrified appeal to the silence—and then, as a dusky, wondering figure filled the doorway, a quick sob and an indescribable quiver of relief—"Ah, Jim! Thank you, ma'am; he's here!"

A Literary Lent.

WE read, but we do not read again. How long is it since you read Milton? We run about, crying lo here, and lo there—and all the cool wisdom and unworn majesty of Comus is but a memory of one's youth. We bolt new novels as though Don Quixote had never been written. Time was when people did not find re-perusal hard. Byron read the Waverley novels "fifty times." Scott read Ariosto's Orlando once every year, and Macaulay was as loyal to Gil Blas. Father Prout found in Horace the joy of his youth and the consolation of his age. Goethe read the Vicar of Wakefield at twenty and at eighty-one, and several times between. Huet, the Bishop of Avranches, used to read through Theocritus every spring, a practice which St. Beuve quotes with approval.

Huet (l'Évêque d'Avranches) nous dit qu'il avait coutume, chaque printemps, de relire Théocrite sous l'ombrage renaissant des bois, au bord d'un ruisseau et au chant du rossignol. Il me semble que les Mémoires de M<sup>me</sup>. de Staël pourraient se relire à l'entrée de chaque hiver, à l'extrême fin d'automne, sous les arbres de Novembre, au bruit des feuilles déjà séchées.

Is there one of us whose life would not be enriched by such rules and prescriptions? Consider Edward FitzGerald—than whom a mightier re-peruser before the Lord never lived. His Letters are an education in the joys of re-perusal. The true Critic on the Hearth is he, with his "dear Sevigné"; and his "Great Gun," Crabbe; and Sophocles, "Oh, how immeasurably superior!"—to Euripides; and Montaigne, blessed cargo of his lugger at Lowestoft. He re-perused them all; and there is a whole philosophy of re-perusal, and of independent fireside reading, in a letter to his old schoolfellow, W. B. Donne, about Montaigne. Its dry good sense and secreted irony are delightful. Here is its salient passage:

When your letter was put into my hands I happened to be reading Montaigne, L. III., Ch. 8, "De l'Art de Conferer," where at the end he refers to Tacitus, the only Book, he says, he had read consecutively for an hour together for ten years. He does not say very much; but the Remarks of such a Man are worth many Cartloads of German Theory of Character, I think: their Philology I don't meddle with. I know that Cowell has discovered they are all wrong in their Sanskrit. Montaigne never doubts Tacitus' facts, but doubts his Inferences; well, if I were sure of his Facts, I would leave others to draw their Inferences. I mean if I were Commentator, certainly: and I think if I were Historian too. Nothing is more wonderful to me than seeing such men as Spedding, Carlyle, and I suppose Froude, straining Fact to Theory as they do, while a scatter-brained Paddy like myself can keep clear. But then so does the Mob of Readers. Well, but I believe in the Vox Populi of two hundred Years: still more, of two thousand. And, whether we be right or wrong, we prevail: so, however much wiser are the Builders of Theory, their Labour is but lost who build: they can't reason away Richard's Hump, nor Cromwell's Ambition, nor Henry's Love of a new Wife, nor Tiberius' beastliness. Of course they had all their Gleams of Goodness; but we of the Mob, if we have any Theory at all, have that which all Mankind have seen and felt, and know as surely as Day-light; that Power will tempt and spoil the Best.

FitzGerald, to be sure, lived a recluse, and had time on his hands. Time to be the apostle of sound reading, which is re-reading; and such he became and remains. Let us confess it, we do not read again as we ought. We need a literary Lent. Think of it—once a year—a time of re-perusal.

Correspondence.

Maeterlinck and the "Contemporary Review."

SIR,—All lovers of M. Maeterlinck's work must have read with mingled wrath and laughter Mr. Ropes's article in the March Contemporary Review, professing to give a full and unbiassed estimate of Maeterlinck's genius and intention. He deliberately passes over much of his best work and submits the remainder to the most cursory examination. For "Serres Chaudes" quotations from two rather obscure poems are considered sufficient; "La Princesse Maleine" is criticised by a comic song, and the old, old charge of repetitions brought up against it. The well-known parallel with Hamlet is again brought forward, but any discussion of the symbolism is carefully avoided. "Pelleas et Mélisande" is patronisingly approved; but we are told that it is unreal, remote from life. Did Mr. Ropes never see the intense and haunting acting of Martin Harvey and Mrs. Patrick Campbell? "Interieur" and "L'Intruse" are treated with something like fairness, but the mocking analysis of "Les Sept Princesses" is hard reading for the earnest disciple. In all these plays Mr. Ropes, while denying Maeterlinck the dramatic gift, allows his power over the chords of pity and dread—but rather thinks Mr. Kipling does it better. He entirely misses the note of Greek tragedy which Maeterlinck strikes; the inevitableness of the action; the chorus, generally supplied by an old man or woman; the strange stillness of the soul which is felt through his work. Finally, he attempts to assess Maeterlinck as poet, dramatist, and mystic, while considering no more than the bare plot of "Aglavaine et Selysette," and without mention of the essays, in which the whole of Maeterlinck's artistic creed may be found.

The Maeterlinck controversy, like the Browning quarrels of the past, seems destruction to all fairness and literary courtesy. We still await a cool and judicial critic whom symbolism affrights not, and mystics do not annoy.

"Disappearing" Lever.

SIR,—We observe in your notes a list of "Disappearing Authors" [from Mr. Justin McCarthy's North American Review article], among whom Charles Lever has a place.

During the last few years the public has paid for editions of Lever's novels issued by us about £9,000. Considering that several of his books are out of copy—right, and that there are numerous editions of these non-copyright books in the market, we should be inclined to regard Charles Lever as an author who was "disappearing" with a flourish.

In a series of sixpenny out-of-copyright novels issued by us, extending to nearly fifty volumes, the first three books in point of sales are written by Thackeray, Wilkie Collins, and Lever. The series referred to contains novels by Scott, Dickens, Marryat, and various other masters.—We are, &c.,

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

A HISTORY OF SCOTLAND FROM THE ROMAN OCCUPATION. VOL. I. BY ANDREW LANG.

The revival of Scottish literature, particularly History, is one of the marked features of the time, and Mr. Lang's work has long been expected with interest. It will be complete in two volumes. Mr. Lang dedicates the work to Sir Herbert Maxwell in these terms: "In studying the records of our past, your name has come under my eyes many hundreds of times since the days of MACCHUS, ARCHIMIRATA, and never without pleasantly reminding me of you, and of hours among books, or by the banks of Test and Lea. You will oblige me by accepting this work, that, some day, may remind you of me." Of the present volume Mr. Lang says that it is "an attempt to examine the elements and forces which went to the making of the Scottish people, and to record the more important events which occurred between the Roman occupation and the death of Cardinal Beaton in 1546." (Blackwood & Sons. 15s. net.)

THE TRIALS OF THE BANTOCKS. BY G. S. STREET.

Here we have Mr. Street quizzing a social type, as he did in the Autobiography of a Boy. The Bantocks were perfect in their way, "admirably correct"; their town house and their country house were each admirably situated and appointed. "Mr. and Mrs. Bantock alike had a large and unwavering dignity. . . . Russell Bantock, my contemporary, was a notable personage at school, and in all the best clubs of 'the House,' in my unpretentious days at Oxford." Yet the Bantocks had their trials, and what these were, and how they bore them, is the matter of this volume. (Lane. 3s. 6d.)

THE LOVE OF AN UNCROWNED QUEEN. BY W. H. WILKINS.

The romantic and clouded life of Sophia Dorothea, consort of George I. Mr. Wilkins has found new material for his life of a "Queen" whose fate rivalled that of Mary Stuart's in sadness; and with a view to doing the work thoroughly he has visited "Celle where she was born; Hanover, where she lived during her unhappy married life; and Ahlden, where, for more than thirty years, she was consigned to a living tomb." These handsome illustrated volumes will be welcome to all readers who like such lives of queens as were written by Agnes Strickland. (Hutchinson & Co.)

LETTERS TO MADAME HANSKA. BY HONORÉ DE BALZAC.

This is the translation of a volume recently published in France, entitled H. de Balzac Œuvres Posthumes. Lettres à l'Étrangère, 1833-1842, purporting to contain letters, written by Balzac to the lady who afterwards became his wife, which were not included in the definitive edition of Balzac's work published by Calmann-Lévy in 1876. The translator, Miss Wormeley, throws considerable doubt on the genuineness of many of these new letters. Others she accepts as Balzac's. We are afraid that many readers will be put off the volume by the complicated statements and arguments—necessary though they be—in Miss Wormeley's preface. (Hardy, Pratt & Co.)

Our Weekly Prize Competitions.

Result of No. 27 (New Series).

JUDGING by the number of replies we have received to the Book-Tea competition, this mild and pleasant form of amusement is still popular. A few competitors accompanied their examples with drawings. Certain books, illustrated by practically the same symbol, were submitted from several sources. Among those thus favoured, were: Nicholas Nickleby, In Varying Moods, Red Pottage, Middlemarch, and We Two. We have decided to award the prize of one guinea to Miss H. B. Stephen, Queen Mary's House, Inverness, for the following:—

A sketch of two unmistakable angels in conflict.—Natural Law in the Spiritual World.

We print below a selection of other attempts:—

An ingenious lady went to a book-tea with a card, on which was inscribed the name "Godiva," pinned to her dress. The title of the book represented was Tom Sawyer. [G. C. P., Chelsea.]

Competition No. 28 (New Series).

THIS week we offer a prize of one guinea for the best suggestion, within the limit of 200 words, of a subject for an historical novel. The central interest of the story and its literary possibilities should be indicated.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43 Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, April 3. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the first column of p. 280, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

A WORK OF EXCEPTIONAL INTEREST.

PIONEERING on the CONGO.

By the Rev. W. HOLMAN BENTLEY.

Chevalier de l'Ordre Royal du Lion; Author of "The Dictionary and Grammar of the Kongo Language," "Life on the Congo," and Translator of the New Testament into Kongo.

These volumes narrate the Author's Twenty-one Years' Experience of Life along the Shores of the great Congo River, and the Congo Tribes which inhabit them.

Mr. Bentley was one of the first missionaries sent to the Congo. He visited the Congo tribes while they were practically untouched by any foreign influence. He has lived in close contact with the people. He has reduced the Kongo language to writing; is the well-known author of the Dictionary and Grammar of the Kongo language, and has translated into it the New Testament.

The work is very fully illustrated from Photographs and Sketches, and will be found rich in matters that should appeal to all who take an interest in the geography and ethnology of Western Africa, and in the progress and development of barbarous people and wild countries.

THE RIGHT to BEAR ARMS.

By "X," the Writer of the Series of Articles which appeared in the Saturday Review over that signature

"We cordially recommend this little book to those who are ignorant of such matters, and are not above learning something of the elementary rules of heraldry, even though they may be certain of their own right to use arms. The book is forcibly and clearly written, the arguments are unanswerable and supported by extracts from ancient documents, and many common de-lusions about arms are exposed."—Spectator.

IN MODERN SPAIN: Some

Sketches and Impressions. By REGINALD
ST. BARBE, Author of "Francesca Halstead; a Tale of San Rocco." Illustrated by A. J. WALL.

"To pick out the salient features of a race, and present them in a manner which shall be at once charming and instructive, requires judgment, discrimination, and tact; and that Mr.
Reginald St. Barbe possesses these qualities there can be no doubt. It is quite apparent that he does love the country he has chosen, and in 'In Modern Spain' he brings to his readers some of that romance and charm which has won for sunny Spain the reputation of being the most romantic country in the world."—Black and White.

OUTLINES OF THE HISTORY OF RELIGION.

By JOHN K. INGRAM, LL.D.

Author of "A History of Political Economy," "A History of Slavery," &c.

"While there have been many books written in English to propagate Positivism, few are more clear, more readable, or more instructive than this; and,
whether it bring over converts or not, the work cannot but be read with interest and advantage by thinking men to whom the more recondite literature of this doctrine is inaccessible."—The Scotsman.

A TREATISE ON ZOOLOGY.

By E. RAY LANKESTER, M.A., LL.D., F.R.S., Hon. Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford, Director of the Natural History Departments of the British Museum, Fullerian Professor of Physiology and Comparative Anatomy in the Royal Institution of London. Profusely Illustrated. To be completed in 10 Parts. NOW READY, Part III. THE ECHINODERMA. By F. A. BATHER, M.A.,
Assisted by J. W. GREGORY, D.Sc., and E. S.
GOODRICH, M.A. Demy 8vo, in paper covers, price 12s. 8d. net; or in cloth, 15s. net.

"It is marked by three characteristics, which, indeed, may be regarded as now indispensable to any scientific work of value—perfect lucidity in the illustrations, which are numerous and, of course, especially drawn by, or under the direction of, the author; a careful exposition of the historical development of life-forms; and complete bibliographies on each branch of the subject."—Literature.

NOW READY.—Demy 8vo, cloth, price 12s. 6d. net.

SEXUAL DIMORPHISM IN THE ANIMAL KINGDOM.

A Theory of the Evolution of Secondary Sexual Characters.

By J. T. CUNNINGHAM, M.A.

Containing 32 Illustrations.

"Mr. Cunningham has elaborated a theory of evolution in answer to the problem: What are the causes which have produced the three kinds of structural difference in animals? He supports his theory by facts and illustrations drawn mainly from the works of others. A book of distinct scientific importance. The present volume is well printed, and profusely illustrated with carefully executed figures."—The Outlook.

NOW READY.—Demy 8vo, cloth, price 7s. 6d. net.

THE GRAMMAR OF SCIENCE.

By KARL PEARSON, M.A., F.R.S.,
Professor of Applied Mathematics and Mechanics in University College, London.

Second Edition, thoroughly Revised and much Enlarged.

Contains Two entirely New Chapters on Natural Selection and Heredity, embracing a Popular Account of Prof. Pearson's own more recent work in this direction.

Containing 33 Illustrations in the Text.

"There is a peculiar opportuneness about the appearance of a new edition of this clear exposition of the scientific method and the claims of science to be regarded as the educational instrument, par excellence, for a training in citizenship. We have been again and again impressed in examining 'The Grammar' with the remarkable lucidity of Prof. Pearson's explanations."—Knowledge.

NOW READY, SECOND EDITION.

ALGEBRA.

An Elementary Text-Book for the Higher Classes of Secondary Schools and Colleges. Part II.

By Prof. GEORGE CHRYSTAL, M.A., LL.D.

"Since its publication eleven years ago Professor Chrystal's text-book of algebra has been widely used, and its value has been thoroughly recognised."

The Scotsman.

NOW READY.—Crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

INTRODUCTION to STRUCTURAL BOTANY.

Part II. Flowerless Plants.

Third Edition.

By D. H. SCOTT, M.A., Ph.D., F.R.S., Honorary Keeper of the Jodrell Laboratory, Royal Gardens, Kew.

"It stands out from the ever-increasing crowd of guides, text-books, and manuals, in virtue not only of originality of design, but also of the fact that the subjects treated have been specially investigated for the purpose of the book, so that we have not the mere compilation of a book-man, but an account based on the results of the author's own observation."

The Literary Week.

Our Special Competition closed on March 31, and the judging is now proceeding. The results will be published, and, if space permits, the Prize Competition in each section printed, in our issue of April 28. The largest number of replies were received from poets.

MR. RUDYARD KIPLING telegraphed to the Times a poem of twelve lines on the death of General Joubert. We quote the first stanza :

With those that bred, with those that loosed, the strife
He had no part whose hands were clean of gain;
But, subtle, strong and stubborn, gave his life
To a lost cause and knew the gift was vain.

In A Kipling Primer, the author, Mr. Knowles, remarks that the lines addressed to Wolcott Balestier beginning—

Beyond the path of the outmost sun, through utter darkness hurled—“touch almost the high-water mark of Kipling’s work.” Mr. Knowles does not seem to be aware that the poem in question is but an adaptation, shorn and changed, of a longer poem called “The Blind Bug,” contributed some years before by Mr. Kipling to the National Observer. There’s husbandry in poets.

THE Publishers’ Circular understands that for the serial rights of his new novel Mr. Rudyard Kipling is receiving the highest price ever paid to an English writer of fiction. The sum is said to be equal to the annual salary of a Cabinet Minister.

MR. JOHN GLYDE, the author of the Life of Edward FitzGerald, published last week, is an Ipswich bookseller, whose business was established more than half a century ago in that town. Mr. Glyde is also the author of Suffolk in the Nineteenth Century.

APROPPOS of the Boat Race, the Daily Mail published the following tables of “odds” showing what are the chances of the individual Blue’s choice of a profession :

OXFORD.

11 to 8 on the Church.
5 to 2 against the Law.
10 to 1 against the Army.
20 to 1 against Medicine.

CAMBRIDGE.

5 to 4 on the Church.
11 to 8 against the Law.
33 to 1 against Medicine.
33 to 1 against the Army.

A NEW accession to the ranks of London publishers is Mr. R. Brimley Johnson, whose name has hitherto been associated with the editing of English reprints. Mr. Johnson, who has been appointed the London representative of the Century Company, New York, will shortly bring out a second series of Essays in Liberalism by a group of Oxford men who represent the advanced, though not the collectivist, wing of the party.

At the head of each chapter of Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler’s new novel, The Faringdons, stands a snatch of verse, and, as the verses bear no quotation marks, it is to be presumed they are the author’s composition. It should not be difficult for the reader to construct the chapters from their preliminary verses. Chapter V., for example, to which this is allotted :

You thought you knew me in and out,
And yet you never knew
That all I ever thought about Was You.

THE Sphere, in its issue of April 21, will publish a story by Mr. Thomas Hardy.

MR. RIDER HAGGARD, it is announced, will act in South Africa as one of the correspondents for Messrs. Pearson’s new paper, the Daily Express. Taking advantage of the lull in the operations, some of the correspondents are returning to England for a short while. Mr. Frederic Villiers, the war artist of the Illustrated London News, is among these. During his brief stay Mr. Villiers will lecture on his experiences.

MR. W. ALGERNON LOCKER, late editor of the Morning Post and of the London Letter, has been appointed editor of the Irish Times.

IN 1877 Lady Dorothy Neville sent Mr. Mallock’s New Republic to Lord Beaconsfield, who read it and replied : “It is a capital performance, and the writer will, I think, take an eminent position in our future literature.” Mr. Mallock has written much prose and verse since then, but it would be too much to say that he has repeated the success of The New Republic. However, he has now offered for criticism a distinctly ambitious work dealing more or less with that very conflict between science and religion which has recently been dramatised, so to speak, in the last controversy, and death of Dr. St. George Mivart. We need not remind our readers that the aim of Mr. Mallock’s philosophical writings has always been to show that science, taken by itself, can supply man with no basis for religion. In his present work, which is addressed to those who identify Christianity with doctrine, Mr. Mallock seeks to show how the existence of religion is bound up in formal doctrine as human life is inseparable from a physical frame, and he affirms that “the only possible authority for supernatural Christian doctrine is a Church which is an inspired and developed organism. Such a Church cannot dispose of the cosmic arguments, which tell against all religions equally : but these being set aside, and the need for doctrinal Christianity being granted, Rome appeals to the world, as a living personal witness, a belief in whose veracity will carry a reasonable acceptance of the whole doctrinal system with it.” Mr. Mallock tells his readers in a foot-note that he suspended this work for a month or two in order to make that rendering, in English verse, of the moral philosophy of Lucretius, to which we drew attention when it appeared in the Anglo-Saxon.

THE unexpected death of Dr. St. George Mivart has a dramatic interest which will be felt by everyone who followed his recent remarkable controversy with Cardinal Vaughan. Great as were Dr. Mivart's scientific attainments and career, we think that he will be remembered—and that for a long time—for his strenuous, pathetic, illogical, yet noble attempt to reconcile the authority of his Church with the conclusions of his scientific conscience. Writing to a friend a few weeks ago, Dr. Mivart said:

The various articles and few books I have written have always represented my convictions at the time as accurately as I could represent them. My last work, The Ground-work of Science (John Murray), has undergone no ecclesiastical supervision, my convictions when I wrote it being almost fully what they now are. I have no more leaning to atheism or agnosticism now than I ever had; but the inscrutable, incomprehensible energy pervading the universe and (as it seems to me) disclosed by science, differs profoundly, as I read nature, from the God worshipped by Christians.

There is something tragically memorable in Dr. Mivart's long suppression of his doubts, their final outburst, his terrible break with his Church, and his death without sacrament, though assuredly not without honour.

AFTER the fiery sunset, a little breeze. Ten years ago Dr. Mivart wrote a "simple tale of our time." It now appears in regular novel form under the title of Castle and Manor. Although high matters of faith are discussed by the characters, the story was written "without any didactic or controversial intention whatever, but was merely suggested by personal, social, and local experiences by the author." To which is added: "One or two persons who suggested certain characters therein depicted are no longer living, but as nothing has been said to their discredit, it has not been thought necessary to suppress them."

THE doctrine of perpetual copyright was felicitously upheld on Thursday by Mr. Samuel Clemens (Mark Twain) before the Royal Commission on Copyright, Lord Monkswell presiding. Mr. Clemens maintained that cheap editions of deathless books would be ensured, not extinguished, by perpetual copyright. Only one book in the world, he thought, had been fairly treated since the days of Queen Anne, and that was the English Bible. It enjoyed perpetual copyright, and this had not deprived the people of cheap editions. Mr. Clemens also pointed out that the number of books which would be affected by the extension of the forty-two years' limit to perpetuity would be very few—only sixty-five books in each year's output. Of these very few would survive a century—say, 650 volumes in half a million. "In America," said the witness (we quote the report of the Daily News), "when the number of slaves subject to the lash equalled the population of London to-day, a woman wrote a book which aroused humanity, swept slavery out of existence, and purged the fair name of America from reproach. The author is now dead; the copyright is dead; the children live and the book lives; but the profits go to the publishers." In the course of his remarks, Mr. Clemens told the Commission that his MS. was once taxed as "gas works"—"that hurt me, that did."

THE first number of the Ruskin Union Journal gives evidence that the Ruskin Union, formed on February 8 at St. Martin's Town Hall, is already at work. Most people, we fancy, will think that this ambitious Union, which, we see, already claims to be a "national organisation," has been too hastily formed. We are quite doubtful whether it has in it the seeds of success. There seems no reason why the Union should not have been formed ten years ago, instead of springing to life in the mind of the Rev. J. B. Booth "after returning from the Memorial Service held in the Abbey on the day of Ruskin's funeral." The present number of the Journal contains the correspondence read at the Inaugural Meeting, the address of the Rev. J. B. Booth, and some flowers of Ruskin's prose.

The Book of Book-Plates (Williams & Norgate), a new quarterly, in a brown paper cover, has just made its bow to artists and bookmen. The purely artistic book-plate, as distinct from the heraldic, is to be studied; and in the first number we have six designs by Mr. James Guthrie and others by Mr. R. Anning Bell, Mr. Edmund H. New, and others. The magazine will satisfy enthusiasts, to whom alone, indeed, it appeals.

THAT famous aphorism in David Harum—"A reasonable amount of fleas is good for a dog—they keep him f'm broodin' on bein' a dog"—is not without a good scientific basis, as a correspondent of the New York Nation points out. In his Inquiry into the Human Faculty, Mr. Francis Galton says:

The stimuli may be of any description; the only important matter is that all the faculties should be kept working to prevent their perishing by disuse. If the faculties are few, very simple stimuli will suffice. Even that of fleas will go a long way. A dog is continually scratching himself, and a bird pluming itself, whenever they are not occupied with food, hunting, fighting, or love. In those blank times there is very little for them to attend to beside their varied cutaneous irritations. It is a matter of observation that well washed and combed domestic pets grow dull; they miss the stimulus of fleas. If animals did not prosper through the agency of their insect plagues, it seems probable that their races would long since have been so modified that their bodies should have ceased to afford a pasture-ground for parasites.

That reasonable pain and discomfort stimulate thought is, of course, within most people's experience.

In the Anglo-Saxon Review Mr. Howard Paul has a vigorous defence of Macaulay against his harsher critics. Here is a salient passage:

The despairing editor of a serious journal once said that the world was divided into people who knew what they were writing about but could not write, and people who could write but did not know what they were writing about. Macaulay combined knowledge with the literary faculty, and to Dryasdust the combination has always been an offence. . . . Apart from detailed criticism, some of which is exceedingly interesting and important, the general accusation against Macaulay really resolves itself into this, that he overstated his case, and was too much of his own opinion. I do not think it altogether wise to deny that there is some truth in this charge. The proper answer is that the vehemence of Macaulay's Whiggery and the unqualified manner in which he condemns Marlborough and Penn are incidental defects of a very noble quality, the quality of moral indignation. . . . He had an almost passionate belief in the progress of society and in the greatness of England. For the opponents of the one and the enemies of the other he had neither toleration nor forbearance.

Mr. Paul's argument, which is well sustained, is not of course to be judged by a single extract. Speaking of the charge brought against Macaulay by Miss Martineau, that he had no heart, Mr. Paul quotes his description of St. Peter's Chapel in the Tower, where Monmouth was buried, as an example of Macaulay's perception of the tears in things. Here it is:

In truth there is no sadder spot on the earth than that little cemetery. Death is there associated not, as in Westminster Abbey and St. Paul's, with genius and virtue, with public veneration and imperishable renown; not, as in our humblest churches and churchyards, with everything that is most endearing in social and domestic charities; but with whatever is darkest in human nature and in human destiny; with the savage triumph of implacable enemies; with the inconstancy, the ingratitude, the cowardice of friends; with all the miseries of fallen greatness and of blighted fame.

When it comes to answering Matthew Arnold's well-known criticism of Macaulay's style, Mr. Paul is more personal than convincing:

To say with Matthew Arnold that it has the perpetual semblance of hitting the right nail on the head without the reality, is in my judgment absurd. Macaulay habitually hit the right nail on the head, and he did not, as Mr. Arnold sometimes did, knock out two tacks in the process.

In another part of the Anglo-Saxon, we find Lady Dorothy Neville giving reminiscences or letters of Lord Beaconsfield, Cobden, Thackeray, and Dickens.

THE six best selling book in America, as reported in the New York Bookman, are, with one exception, historical romances, and they are popular in the following order:

To Have and to Hold.
Red Pottage.
Janice Meredith.
Richard Carvel.
Via Crucis.
When Knighthood was in Flower.

A MONKEY story from over the water: a pet monkey belonging to a son of the Rev. W. G. Herbert, pastor of the Caroline Street Methodist Church, of Baltimore, got into the study of the clergyman the other evening, opened a volume of the Encyclopædia Britannica, and tore out sixteen pages of the article on Darwin's Origin of Species. Then it turned to Butler's Analogy, and it was examining it with great apparent delight when the clergyman returned and put a stop to the proceedings.

LITERATURE as She is Pushed may be studied to advantage in American bookselling organs. There is a hustling directness about their paragraphs which is not unamusing in its place. We read:

SETON THOMPSON'S BOOKS

Seton Thompson's books are on the boom. In New York his lectures are the fad, and his books are in great demand. To date he has written:

Animals I Have Known.
Autobiography of a Grizzly.

It is not true that Mr. Thompson was once a circus man.

Here is a searching query:

Why does Munsey publish the Argosy? An examination will prove that it is not made to sell. No illustrations, the cheapest kind of paper, and no writers of merit contribute to its pages.

Here a piece of literary biography:

STEDMAN.—Edmund Clarence Stedman, the "banker-poet," has sold his seat on the New York Stock Exchange for 39,500 dols., but will not retire altogether from business life. He will retain offices at No. 16, Broad-street. Mr. Stedman will thus have much more leisure than formerly, which he will devote to literature. He has nearly completed his American Anthology, a large volume upon which he has been engaged with a corps of assistants for nearly three years. This he regards as a rounding out of his critical works on poetry. Mr. Stedman has been active in "the street" for thirty-six years.

And here is an obituary notice which somehow recalls certain examples in Elbow-Room:

I miss my dear old friend Chrysostom P. Donahoe very much. His father, Patrick Donahoe, is still vigorous and bright, and gives evidence of many years' health. Chris.

Donahoe was ill only a short while, but none of his friends expected death would result. The Pilot is in good hands, and will be maintained under the able editorship of James Jeffery Roach as the leading Irish-American periodical in this country. Chris. had all the best qualities of an Irish gentleman. To illustrate a point, a friend remarked that if St. Peter likes a good story and Chris. Donahoe gets within ear-shot, he will have no trouble about his future occupation. Another addition to the host of good fellows who have gone before.

A more sober paper than the above is Personal Impressions, a little budget of book-talk, issued by a San Francisco firm of booksellers. Apart from literary matters this paper is concerned for the preservation of certain noble groves of the biggest of trees, the Sequoia gigantea, which are now threatened by the lumber merchants.

THE question of the Housing of the Poor in crowded towns is one of rapidly increasing importance. Mr. George Haw has devoted much attention to the subject, and the series of papers contributed by him to the Daily News, under the title of "No Room to Live," will be published immediately by Messrs. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co., in book form, with revision and additions by the author.

NON-COPYRIGHT books go cheap in England now; you can have all Shakespeare, or all Byron, for sixpence. But an American publisher would be shocked at such niggardliness. Here is a price-list from the New York Herald:

MR. STEPHEN PHILLIPS's semi-public reading of Paolo and Francesca last week, at the residence of Canon and Mrs. Wilberforce is thus described by a writer in the Pall Mall Gazette:

Mr. Stephen Phillips had everything to fight against. A sunny afternoon set jaded Londoners, like the dying Falstaff, "a babbling of green fields," inviting them rather to the freedom of the open road than to the closeness of a drawing-room in Dean's-yard; nor are the "rustle of lace, the purr of pretty women," however delectable in themselves, anything but a jarring accompaniment to poetry. Add to these the fact that every one checked the reader from the printed page, the turning of leaves punctuating the cadences; and that the author, discarding any tricks of elocution or gesture he may have acquired as an actor, was almost austere in his methods, and it will be realised how severe was the handicap. Yet the effect on the crowded room was thrilling in its intensity. As the speaker's voice rolled easily on with just the ebb and flow of the verse periods, the jangling of ornaments and frou-frou of skirts gave place to the hush of expectation. The very simplicity of Mr. Phillips's reading provoked thought, and thought unlocked the door of imagination.

THE Daily News is entitled to acclaim the late Mr. Archibald Forbes as "the ideal war correspondent." Later men have written as brilliantly, and have even struck new notes; but reporting a war is, after all, technical work, and Forbes combined technique with literary ability. He had been a soldier, and was always a student of military science; he was the master of a pithy, glowing, and tender style of narrative, and he could write with the speed of a whirlwind.

MOREOVER, Forbes was a commercial success. He knew, as the Daily News points out, that a war correspondent's duty is to be the first to see the fighting and the first to leave the field. Many good stories have been told of his devices for getting first to the nearest telegraph office. One told by Forbes himself was this:

Here is a little scene: Time, near midnight, after a hard day's work; everybody done up. "Hullo, Jones," says Smith, "there's Forbes already asleep, like brass." "By Jove, yes," quoth Jones (incipient snore from Forbes); "it would take ten horses to wake him up. I'll turn in," says Jones; "time enough to get our stuff off to-morrow, eh?" "Right you are," responds Smith. In ten minutes the wearied warrior-scribes are dead asleep. Forbes rises cautiously, passing out like a ghost; sits him down in a hidden corner with the stump of a tallow candle; writes like a whirlwind for a couple of hours; finishes with the last flicker of his dip; saddles a horse; off he goes, helter skelter, across country; gallops for an hour; delivers his letter; gallops back; is in bed by four; sleeps, this time, "like brass," and no mistake. "Hullo, lazy-bones," exclaims Smith at 7 a.m., shaking the sleeper. "Time to be up, old man," adds Jones. "What are you up to?" quoth Forbes, drowsily. "We are thinking of getting our stuff off." "The devil you are. Why hurry? Let's have another snooze." At last Smith and Jones get their stuff off; and in three days discover, to their bewilderment, that they were twenty-four hours behindhand. Very provoking to Smith and Jones. But if Forbes had been the victim of the little ruse, he would have been the first to laugh over it and to congratulate his successful competitor.

Mr. Forbes died at his residence, near Regent's Park, where in his last days he had followed the struggle in South Africa with the keenest interest.

Bibliographical.

THE appearance of the First and Last Poems of Miss Arabella Shore forms, I suppose, the finale to an interesting little chapter in the by-ways of literary history. Miss Arabella and Miss Louisa Shore, the able and accomplished daughters of a divine and scholar, began to publish verse in 1855, when they issued a little book of War Lyrics under the pen-name of "A. and L."—initials which also appeared on the title-pages of Gemma of the Isles (1859) and Fra Dolcino (1870). Then came an interval of twenty years, at the end of which "A. and L." put forward a volume of Elegies and Memorials, followed, in 1897, by Poems by A. and L. In the last-named year the anonymity of the sisters was discarded. Miss Louisa Shore had died, and a selection from her Poems was now brought out, with a memoir, by Miss Arabella Shore, and an "appreciation" by Mr. Frederic Harrison. In the following year came a new edition of Miss Louisa Shore's dramatic poem, Hannibal, with a preface by her sister. Now Miss Arabella Shore has made a selection from her own poems, and lovers of verse can pronounce upon the poetic outcome of both ladies. Miss Arabella Shore, I may mention, has already been before the public as the author of a book on Dante for Beginners (1886).

The correspondent of the ACADEMY who in last week's number protested against Mr. A. R. Ropes's estimate of Maeterlinck's genius and work is not aware, perhaps, that Mr. Ropes, under the nom-de-guerre of "Adrian Ross," is in the habit of writing comic songs for modern "musical comedies." It is true that, sixteen years ago, Mr. Ropes published, with his real name, a little volume of serious Poems, in which (besides translations from Gautier, Baudelaire, and De Banville) there were evidences of freshness of thought and fancy. Of late, however, Mr. Ropes would appear to have confined his rhythmic gift to the production of "lyrics" for such theatrical entertainments as "Go-Bang," "The Ballet Girl," "Morocco Bound," and other effusions of our lighter stage—a class of literary product which can hardly help its producer to an appreciation of the powers and performances of Maeterlinck. Mr. Ropes has, in his time, edited several French classics for the Pitt Press, but even those labours, apparently, have left him unprepared to recognise the fascinating qualities of "The Princess Maleine" and its fellows.

In the introductory note to Mr. John Glyde's Life of Edward FitzGerald, Mr. Edward Clodd says of Mr. Glyde that he "has not only spent his life among books, but has added to their number in treatises of value for knowledge of the history of his native country." Surely for "country" we ought to read "county"? I can find no trace of any contribution by Mr. Glyde to the literature of English history. On the other hand, he seems to have issued several publications concerning the county of Suffolk—such as The New Suffolk Garland (a collection of anecdotes, ballads, songs, and so forth), Glyde's Guide to Ipswich, and Illustrations of Old Ipswich. He appears also to be responsible for The Norfolk Garland. Two books, one on Ipswich and another on Suffolk in the Nineteenth Century, were issued in 1850 and 1856 respectively, and these, I take it, were by an elder John Glyde than FitzGerald's biographer.

With reference to the epigram I quoted last week from Bishop How's Lighter Moments, Mr. J. G. Alger writes from Paris: "On the death, nearly twenty years ago, of James Crossley, of Manchester, my friend John Eglington Bailey credited him with the lines:

You say your curate has fine eyes;
How should I this divine?
He always shuts them when he prays,
And when he preaches closes mine.

Wit, antiquary, and bibliophil, Crossley was not likely to be a plagiarist, especially as he wrote other epigrams, one of them on Dr. Fraser [Bishop of Manchester], beginning:

Pray where did Mr. Gladstone pick up
This great steam-engine of a bishop?"

The fact that Mr. J. E. Bailey "credited" Mr. J. Crossley with the above quatrain is not quite to the point. The question rather is, Did Mr. Crossley himself ever claim to be its author? It would have been singular had he done so, for the epigram, as quoted by me last week, is included in the Lyrics, Legal and Miscellaneous of George Outram, the Scottish journalist, who died in 1856.

Some of my readers may find it useful to have a list of the chief publications of the late Mr. Archibald Forbes:—Glimpses through the Cannon Smoke (1882), Chinese Gordon (1884), Souvenirs of Some Continents (1885), Afghan Wars, 1839-42 and 1878-80 (1891), Barracks, Bivouacs, and Battles (1891), Czar and Sultan: a British Lad in the Russo-Turkish War, 1877-8 (1894), Colin Campbell, Lord Clyde (1895), Memories and Studies of War and Peace (1895), Camps, Quarters, and Casual Places (1896), "The Black Watch" (1896), The Life of Napoleon III. (1898).

I see that some of the newspapers have been gravely ascribing the new book on Mrs. Delany to "Mr. George Paston," though it is a matter of common, if not universal, knowledge that "George Paston" is the nom-de-guerre of a lady. A writer's desire to be known only by a pseudonym should, I think, always be respected; and the book in question, therefore, would be properly described as by "George Paston," but, I would suggest, without the "Mr." No one ever talked or wrote about "Mr." George Eliot.

The promised Random Recollections of Mr. William Tinsley will, no doubt, comprise a good deal of interesting matter. Publishers usually have something piquant to tell about the authors with whom they have been associated—and vice versa. If I am not mistaken, Mr. Tinsley has already published some Reminiscences in the pages of the magazine to which he gave his name, but which, I believe, is no longer in existence.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

An Inexhaustible Book.

Lavengro. By George Borrow. (Murray. 6s.)

"So, sir, I am told by your friend there, that you are fond of the humanities."

"Yes," said I; "I am very fond of humanity."

THE inch of dialogue goes to the heart of Borrow's personality. He is a scholar by accident, and by a certain waywardness of the intellect which takes delight in the wilder philological surmises, the crack-brained philosophies, the obscure by-ways of history. But by instinct he is the student and lover of man. His book is a singular picture-gallery of human types, observed with a catholic imagination, which turns the most unpromising material, not, indeed, "to favour and to prettiness," but to wholesome and whimsical humour. How they live, drawn with what few and broad strokes, ineffaceable from the memory!—the Flaming Tinman and Isopel Berners; Jasper Petulengro, the gipsy; Peter, the Preacher, who had committed "the sin against the Holy Ghost"; the fat landlord and the maid Jenny; Francis Ardry and the "small, beautiful female with flashing eyes"; the Armenian merchant; the apple-woman, who sat on London Bridge receiving faked clies, and absorbed in The Life of Blessed Mary Flanders; the publisher who sweated Borrow to compile The Chronicles of Newgate, and to review and translate into German his own cosmic philosophy, destined to prove that the world was not round, but pear-shaped. What delicious fooling he evokes!

I at first felt much inclined to be of the publisher's opinion with respect to the theory of the pear. After all, why should the earth be shaped like an apple, and not like a pear?—it would certainly gain in appearance by being shaped like a pear. A pear being a handsomer fruit than an apple, the publisher is probably right, thought I; and I will say that he is right on this point in the notice which I am about to write of his publication for the Review. And yet I don't know, said I, after a long fit of musing—I don't know but what there is more to be said for the Oxford theory. The world may be shaped like a pear, but I don't know that it is; but one thing I know, which is, that it does not taste like a pear; I have always liked pears, but I don't like the world. The world to me tastes more like an apple, and I have never liked apples. I will uphold the Oxford theory; besides, I am writing in an Oxford Review, and am in duty bound to uphold the Oxford theory. So in my notice I asserted that the world was round; I quoted Scripture, and endeavoured to prove that the world was typified by the apple in Scripture, both as to shape and properties. "An apple is round," said I, "and the world is round; the apple is a sour, disagreeable fruit, and who has tasted much of the world without having his teeth set on edge?" I, however, treated the publisher, upon the whole, in the most urbane and Oxford-like manner, complimenting him upon his style, acknowledging the general soundness of his views, and only differing with him in the affair of the apple and pear.

Borrow's sympathies are limited only by Protestantism, and his prejudices against the Church of Rome, "vile Rome, crumbling Rome, Batuscha's town," best set them off. He is not, however, at home in cities, happiest when he doffs civilisation and gets down to the elemental, the naked buff of man. He is untamed. His is no God who "taketh no pleasure in the strength of a horse, neither delighteth He in any man's legs." He "questions whether philology, or the passion for languages, requires so little apology as the love for horsea." His description of the old stallion at the fair is classic:

An old man draws nigh, he is mounted on a lean pony, and he leads by the bridle one of these animals; nothing very remarkable about the creature, unless in being smaller than the rest and gentle, which they are not; he is not of the slightest look; he is almost dun, and over one eye a thick film has gat'ered. But stay! there is something remarkable about that horse, there is something in his action in which he differs from the rest. As he advances the clamour is hushed! all eyes are turned upon him—what looks of interest—of respect—and, what is this? people are taking off their hats—surely not to that steed! Yes, verily! men, especially old men, are taking off their hats to that one-eyed steed, and I hear more than one deep-drawn ah!

"What horse is that?" said I to a very old fellow, the counterpart of the old man on the pony, save that the last wore a faded suit of velveteen, and this one was dressed in a white frock.

"The best in mother England," said the very old man, taking a knobbed stick from his mouth, and looking me in the face, at first carelessly, but presently with something like interest; "he is old like myself, but can still trot his twenty miles an hour. You won't live long, my swain; tall and overgrown ones like thee never does; yet, if you should chance to reach my years, you may boast to thy great grand-boys. Thou hast seen Marshland Shales."

Classic, too, is the chapter on the "Bruisers of England," with many another passage in which the red blood is manfully drawn. Borrow's own pugilistic career was not, indeed, fortunate. His father made a match of it with Big Ben Brain, but Mr. Petulengro found him "less apt with the morleys than the stuffed gloves"; and it would have gone hard with him at the hands of the Flaming Tinman, in spite of Belle's help, had not that redoubtable ruffian brought his fist against a tree. The fact is, that, like most who write about blood, Borrow is himself a dreamer and not a doer of deeds. What delights him in the pugilists, as in the gipsies, is their closeness to mother earth. He has the passion of earth, and the intimate charm of Lavengro is its out-of-dooriness. It is the epic of vagrancy. Borrow and Stevenson are the born vagrants: with them—and with how few?—you might safely trust yourself upon a pilgrimage. Out of doors, Borrow catches the note of essential poetry.

"Life is sweet, brother."

"Do you think so?"

"Think so! There's night and day, brother, both sweet things; sun, moon, and stars, brother, all sweet things; there's likewise the wind on the heath. Life is very sweet, brother; who would wish to die?"

Consider, too, the visit to Stonehenge, seen dimly in the dew and haze of morning, like "a small grove of blighted trunks of oaks, barked and grey." And the Sunday morning beneath the red oaks, while Peter and Winifred were at worship.

After a time I sat me down at the foot of the oak with my face turned towards the water, and, folding my hands, I fell into deep meditation. I thought on the early Sabbaths of my life, and the manner in which I was wont to pass them. How carefully I said my prayers when I got up on the Sabbath morn, and how carefully I combed my hair and brushed my clothes in order that I might do credit to the Sabbath day. I thought of the old church at pretty D—, the dignified rector, and yet more dignified clerk. I thought of England's grand Liturgy, and Tate and Brady's sonorous minstrelsy. I thought of the Holy Book, portions of which I was in the habit of reading between service. I thought, too, of the evening walk which I sometimes took in fine weather like the present, with my mother and brother—a quiet, sober walk, during the which I would not break into a run, even to chase a butterfly, or yet more a honey-bee, being fully convinced of the dread importance of the day which God had hallowed. And how glad I was when I had got over the Sabbath day without having done anything to profane it. And how soundly I slept on the Sabbath night after the toil of being very good throughout the day.

And, finally, the idyll in "Mumper's Dingle," with its wonderful realisation of night and silence, with the invasion of the Flaming Tinman and his "mort," and the pathetic story of Isopel Berners.

It is an inexhaustible book; and the episodes omitted when it was first printed, and now by Prof. Knapp's care restored to the present edition, are quite on the level of the rest. There may once have been reason for suppressing them, but neither Charles I. nor Byron are any longer sacred, and Borrow's criticisms upon one and the other are not likely to impair the popularity of Lavengro to-day. The bit on Byron, indeed, written before 1851, is singularly interesting as an early voice in the reaction against his fame :

"I saw the living man at Venice—ah, a great poet."
 "I don't think so," said I.
 "Hey!" said Francis Ardry.
 "A perfumed lordling."
 "Ah!"
 "With a white hand loaded with gawds."
 "Ah!"
 "Who wrote verses."
 "Ah!"
 "Replete with malignity and sensualism."
 "Yes!"
 "Not half so great a poet as Milton."
 "No?"
 "Nor Butler."
 "No?"
 "Nor Otway."
 "No?"
 "Nor that poor boy Chatterton, who, maddened by rascally patrons and publishers, took poison at last."
 "No?" said Francis Ardry.

We have already described the general features of Prof. Knapp's editorship of the volume, which is as modest as it is thorough. "Borrowians" have every reason to rejoice that Borrow's novels are to be given to them, one by one, under these auspices.

The Passion-Play.

The Passion-Play of Ober-Ammergau. Complete Text. Translated from the German by Mary Frances Drew. (Burns & Oates.)

The Passion-Play. By the late Lady Isabel Burton. Edited, with Preface, by W. H. Wilkins, M.A. (Hutchinson & Co.)

THE Passion-Play of Ober-Ammergau is once more with us, after revolving through its decennial cycle. Thousands will crowd to the little German village to witness this year's representation, reinforced by the overflow of American tourists from the Paris Exhibition. For them come forth these two books. The one is a translation of the complete German text of the play, by Mary Frances Drew. The dramatic portion was issued in 1881, the translation of the choral portions in 1891; but the two are now for the first time published in a combined form, so as to present English readers with a version of the complete play. The other book is an account of the Passion-Play written by the late Lady Burton in 1880, after she had witnessed it together with her husband. He wrote his own impressions of the performance, which were published at the time; but his wife's book is now first issued, with a preface by her biographer, Mr. W. H. Wilkins.

The preface reminds us that this year will witness several changes in the cast. Most important of all, Joseph Mayer will no more play Christus. The famous peasant-actor, of whom all spoke with such enthusiasm in 1880 and 1890, suffered a severe accident in woodcutting among the hills, and relinquishes the part to Anton Lang, whom he has himself trained in its representation. Lady Burton writes with vivid impulse, and her book is full of interest, but she has not the gift of recording visual impressions. We learn what she felt, we do not see what she saw. A passage quoted in the preface from Sir Richard Burton's companion volume sets the great Crucifixion scene before us with a force that she has not the art to achieve. We must quote it :

Two crosses are seen at the Podium as the curtain rises; the thieves, with bare heads and wild hair, hang on by their arms being passed over the cross-piece. The central cross, slowly raised from the ground by the hangman, drops into its socket, and the tall white figure, apparently only nailed on, hangs before us. The idea is new—a live crucifix. We have seen them in thousands, artistic and inartistic; but we never yet felt the reality of a man upon a cross. The glamour of the legend is over us, and we look upon, for the first time, what we shall not forget to the last.

Miss Drew's translation of the play shows it to be a remarkable achievement from a structural, no less than a scenic, standpoint. The Four Gospels are gathered into a dramatic whole with conspicuous architectonic skill. And the book of the play is an able, if not exactly a literary, performance. There is more than one conceivable way in which a dramatist might have confronted the difficulty of adapting the severe speech of the Gospels. He might have "reformed it altogether," as unsuitable for stage purposes, substituting speech of his own. He might have amplified it. He might have poetised it, perhaps, after the example of skilful fidelity with which Shakespeare has poetised the orations of Coriolanus in Plutarch—which, with such scant matter, would have involved also amplification. He might have overlaid it with decorative luxuriance and florid Corellinthian adornments. The Ober-Ammergau adapters have followed none of these methods. Their reverence has spared us the first, their judgment has spared us the last. Possibly Barrabas has not penetrated the mountain-girdle of the German village. They have chosen, we think, the most excellent way that could have been devised. The words of the New Testament are preserved in their primitive dignified simplicity. But since some addition must needs be, they have introduced just what was requisite, not for amplification, but for connexion—dramatic or merely explanatory. The Gospel sentences are the nodal points, about which these additions are but reticulated. It is done with exceeding care and no little skill, such as a professional dramatist, more self-conscious or eager to show forth his own power, might have lacked the detachment to imitate. Only here or there is there amplification of the evangelistic speeches, where it is clearly demanded by dramatic exigency. Even the inartificiality (in a literary sense) of these additions favours their unobtrusiveness. It must be added, on the other hand, that in the translation their style does not always lend itself to this laudable self-effacement, or subserve the callida junctura with such aptness as the substance. It lapses sometimes into conventional degenerations of language, or again runs frequently into slipshod colloquialities, which refuse to amalgamate with the clean sincerities of Biblical diction. We trust this may be as un-German as it is un-Scriptural. Returning, however, to the qualities inherent in the original, these complementary speeches of the adapters elucidate with remarkable clearness and economy of means the concatenation and significance of the New Testament narrative. In this aspect it would be hard to better them. Perhaps we can best illustrate this, and the judicious process of dove-tailing, by going through a typical act of the drama, which will also exhibit defects and qualities, on some of which we may afterwards comment.

Let us take the first bringing of Christ before Pilate. It opens with an allegorical tableau of Daniel impeached before Darius the King. The Chorus expound the tableau, and the scene shifts to the front of Pilate's house. The High Council, the Temple tradesmen, and the witnesses appear, with the Saviour encompassed by the rabble. After a brief and needful introductory scene between Caiaphas and his followers, Pilate emerges on the balcony of his house. He asks the accusation against Christ, and receives the Scriptural answer: "If this man were not an evil-doer we should not have delivered Him unto thee." The Biblical recommendation follows, that they should judge Him according to their law, with the Biblical answer, that they are not suffered to inflict death; and Annas interpolates the required explanation that the Sanhedrim has found Christ worthy of death (not furnished in Scripture). Pilate refuses to condemn Him without knowledge of His crimes, while Caiaphas persuades the Governor to accept the examination of the Jewish High Council as sufficient. Pilate refuses. "I must know under what law and in what way He has transgressed." For the sake of dramatic clearness, Caiaphas is made to anticipate a subsequent answer in St. John: "We have a law, and by that law He ought to die, because He made Himself the Son of God." It is a very rare liberty. "In such a speech, which is at most but the fruit of a vain imagination, a Roman can find nothing worthy of death," replies Pilate. "Besides, how can I know whether He be the son of a god, or no?" The indifference and the superstition are both characteristically heathen, and good dramatic touches. Caiaphas declares Christ "a rebel and a seducer of the people." The Governor doubts whether He could have excited sedition without the knowledge of Roman officials, and asks where or when? They recall Christ's crowded entry into Jerusalem. "I know this, but no rebellion has arisen from it," rejoins Pilate. Following the hint of Scripture, Caiaphas charges Christ with forbidding tribute to Cæsar, and, asked for proof, replies: "Proof enough, since He has given Himself out as the Messiah, the King of Israel! Is not that a challenge to the rule of the Emperor?" "I admire," ironically says Pilate, "your suddenly awakened zeal for the Emperor"; and asks Jesus, almost in the words of Matthew: "Hearest Thou what heavy charges they are bringing against Thee? What answerest Thou?" Receiving no answer, he supposes Christ bewildered by the fury of His accusers, and orders Him to be brought within the palace. The private interview follows Scripture with scarce a break, including the explanation that Christ's kingdom is a spiritual one, and ending with the famous "What is truth?" But dramatic exigency forbids the repetition of the interview; and—by a very bold departure—the words of the second interview are interpolated in the middle of the first. Immediately after follows the message from Pilate's wife; he promises her to work for Christ's deliverance, and is confirmed by a brief scene with his courtiers (perhaps not quite necessary). He returns Jesus to the priests as guiltless. They renew the cry that He has outraged Jewish law, and Caiaphas adds: "Is he not also guilty before the Emperor who has outraged the law which his will has guaranteed?" We may quote to the finish.

PILATE. This is just as I have said. Had He sinned against our law, He would have been punished according to our law, so far as you have a right to it. I cannot pronounce the death sentence over Him, while I do not find that He has deserved death according to the law in which I am His judge.

CAIAPHAS. If He set Himself up as a king, would not that be rebellion? Would He not deserve punishment for high treason—the punishment of death?

PILATE. If this Man has given Himself out as a king, I should not judge these ambiguous words cause enough for me to sentence Him. With us it is openly taught that every philosopher is a king. You have not made it evident to me that He has arrogated to Himself kingly power.

NATHANIEL. Is there not evidence enough when through Him the whole people were in a tumult, when the whole of Judæa was filled with His teaching, from Galilee, where His first disciples assembled, even to Jerusalem?

PILATE. Comes He out of Galilee?

ALL. Yes, He is a Galilæan!

RABBLE. His home is at Nazareth, in the dominion of King Herod.

PILATE. If this be so, then I am spared the duty of judging over Him. Herod, the King of Galilee, is come here to the Feast. He can now judge over His subjects. Take Him then and bring Him to His king. He shall be conducted thither by my bodyguard.

Amid the cries of the rabble, dragging Christ away to Herod, the act closes. Of course, there is no literary grip in this dialogue (at least in the English version), nor can we expect skill in characterisation. Pilate is conventionally self-consequent, Herod's easy-going nature is indicated with rather puerile touches in the succeeding act. But the nature of Pilate's difficulty, the course of his successive attempts to shirk it, is shown with a minimum of addition to or alteration of the Gospel details and speeches. This is in its way a triumph, and the whole play is in its way a triumph. For, in the judgment of assembled Europe, it acts.

In High Latitudes.

Modern Philosophy in France. By Lucien Levy Bruhl. (Kegan Paul. 12s. net.)

Darwin and Darwinism. By Dr. P. Y. Alexander. (J. Bale, Sons & Danielsson. 7s. 6d. net.)

The Advance of Knowledge. By Lieut.-Col. Sedgwick, late of the Royal Engineers. (George Allen.)

MR. HERBERT SPENCER's staunch friend and profound expositor, John Fiske, is responsible for an amusing story about Hegel—a story which, though probably mythical, is significant of the value to be attached to those "cloud-capped towers and gorgeous palaces," which are dissolved by science and common sense and "leave not a rack behind." On being asked to explain a difficult passage, written many years before, the great German metaphysician gave it up in despair, frankly declaring, according to Fiske: "When I wrote that passage there were two who understood it—God and myself. Now, alas! God alone understands it." The story, if not true, is typical of the dense clouds which are certain to envelop those who deal in "fog and fustian," and who construct the universe on unverified and unverifiable a priori assumptions. Propositions built up of empty verbal symbols, and the fatal vice of playing with high-sounding but vague words, cannot permanently satisfy humanity; and, indeed, it is marvellous that the old metaphysics have held sway so long. But the tide is turning at last. Philosophy is now being revised under scientific conclusions, and a large number of the inquiries with which philosophy habitually concerned itself are being abandoned as incompatible with well-grounded scientific truth, and consequently utterly useless. From time to time, however, efforts are made in our universities to stem the tide, and now and again a man like Prof. Ward, of Cambridge, cries in the wilderness, and essays the Quixotic task of restoring philosophy to its former position in the clouds. But these efforts are unavailing, for an immense body of established scientific truth now checks the extravagance of the intellect left to itself.

Books dealing with the subject-matter of philosophy or with the history of philosophy must therefore be leavened with the historical and evolutionary tendencies of the age; otherwise they will not find favour with many readers. M. Lucien Levy Bruhl's History of Modern Philosophy in France is, however, conceived in the right spirit, is built up in the right way, and an English version of it can scarcely fail to meet with a cordial reception. The author makes his book cover a wide canvas, for, in addition to recognised philosophers like Descartes, Malebranche, Cousin, and Comte, he includes thinkers such as Voltaire, Rousseau, Renan, and Laine, who are not usually grouped with the philosophers "by profession." His critical summaries of the teaching of his great countrymen are brilliantly executed, for, being deeply imbued with the modern comparative method, and thoroughly acquainted with English philosophy and English evolutionary thought, he separates the wheat from the chaff, disengages what is permanently true from what is doubtful and erroneous, and enables his readers to trace step by step the evolution of philosophic thought. All this is excellent; surprisingly so. For M. Levy Bruhl is a French professor, and M. Gustave Le Bon has lately been writing in disparaging terms about French professors. We are glad, therefore, to find that there is at least one writer who does not come within the scope of Le Bon's sweeping indictment. The book is well translated, is illustrated with portraits of the leading French philosophers, and is enriched with an exhaustive bibliography of modern French philosophy.

To pass from a book on French philosophy to a volume on Darwin and Darwinism, Pure and Mixed, may at first sight appear somewhat insane; but in reality there is method and purpose in such apparent madness. For just as the general doctrine of evolution at large has revolutionised philosophy, so one domain of phenomena—the biological—has important bearings on the general doctrine. And at the present day organic evolution, with which Darwin was solely concerned, is passing through an acute crisis, the gravity of which is fully recognised both by scientists and philosophers. The fact of evolution is universally admitted, but scientists are divided into two hostile camps upon the question of the process of evolution. One party, called the neo-Darwinian, is championed by Weismann, and holds to natural selection as the only factor required; while another party, called the neo-Lamarckian, is championed by Mr. Herbert Spencer, and holds that other factors must be taken into account, and particularly the transmission of acquired characters. Good books on this important controversy are much wanted; but unfortunately Dr. Alexander has not produced a good book. We say "unfortunately" because, from his wide reading and careful study of plant and animal life, he, as a pronounced neo-Lamarckian, was capable of doing signal service to the side of the controversy which at the moment most needs the support of powerful advocates. But Dr. Alexander has simply thrown his chance away. He does not explain, as he ought to have done, the "little rift within the evolutionary lute," and then proceed to calmly marshal the facts and arguments which demonstrate the inadequacy of natural selection, as Mr. Herbert Spencer did in his rejoinders to Weismann. On the contrary, his book is one long, bitter, and at times almost absurd, attack against Darwin and Darwin's chief adherents and expounders. According to Dr. Alexander, Darwin was a poor thinker, who ought to have revised his books, but did not because "the books went on selling—as they were, as they were"; while his friends—men like Huxley, Ray Lankester, Russell Wallace, and Grant Allen—are "all so logical, these fine fellows, so philosophical, deeply philosophical and scientific, as well as see so far—so very, very far!" Even those who are influenced by Darwinian literature are abused, for they are described as "people who swallow what they read from those who have gained authority by the false and bad process of booming or of being boomed, and who can no more compare, analyse, and think for themselves than can the pump-handle." All this is simply atrocious, and no Spencerian evolutionist (and the present writer is one) will have anything to do with an author who soils his pages with such palpable absurdities. But Dr. Alexander is an enigma—a crux criticorum—and when he leaves off drivelling about Darwin and Darwinians, and takes to launching forth into bitter invectives against Lord Rosebery and the individualistic régime, we simply gave him up in despair.

In The Advance of Knowledge we are transported into the lofty regions occupied by Mr. Herbert Spencer, albeit that we are regaled with arguments, inferences, and theories that must greatly astonish that eminent philosopher, unless, as seems likely, he has long ago ceased to be surprised at anything that emanates from critics and apologists. Colonel Sedgwick's aim is to reconcile religion and science, and this can, he assures us, be satisfactorily accomplished by what he calls the principle of antagonism. He details Mr. Spencer's teaching about antagonistic forces, and the alternate play of evolution and dissolution, progress and retrogression; but whereas Mr. Spencer holds that every form of phenomena is a manifestation of a Power utterly beyond us, Colonel Sedgwick believes that in evolution and dissolution we have proof of the existence of two "antagonist Powers which severally work good and evil in the world, and thus operate personally within us and about us, as religion teaches." One Power is said to be all for law and order and the side of Good, and the other Power is all for lawlessness and disorder and the side of Evil. These opposing Powers are said to represent the working of two Unknowables, if they represent the working of any Unknowable at all, and our author contends that even some of Mr. Spencer's writing points to the same conclusion. "Lawlessness" in phenomena and "two Unknowables" are utterly beyond us; but then we do not hold a brief to bring back the good old gods of the race, and are therefore thoroughly uninspired. But once the author works out the two powers of Good and Evil, all the rest follows in succession, and science is said to agree with the scene of man's development as given in the Bible, the experimenting in the eating of forbidden fruit, and the expulsion from Eden; while science is even stated to have shown that the Day of Judgment must come, and may even come now at any time. Though the author usually gives references, he does not mention scientific authorities for any of these particular statements. We must, however, add that throughout the entire volume there is an utter absence of misrepresentation, ridicule, and abuse; and the author is so calm and dignified towards opponents that we hope his example will be followed by other writers of the same school.

Southern Arabia.

Southern Arabia. By Theodore Bent and Mrs. Theodore Bent. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

THERE is so much that is excellent and informing in this book that we can only wish that it were better compiled; and that the matter which, however interesting to travellers, is purely irrelevant in a serious book of travel had been omitted. The general reader, looking at the sketch-map at the commencement, will be astonished that so stout a volume should be justified by the few red lines which mark the routes of Mr. and Mrs. Bent round about Arabia. The places visited were the Bahrein Islands, Muscat, the Hadramut (where the longest journey into the interior of Arabia was taken), Dhofar and the Gara Mountains, the littoral of the Eastern Soudan (where, strange as it sounds now, the authority of the Khalifa was a source of dread, if not of fear), the island of Sokotra, and Beled Fadhli and Beled Yafei.

The mounds of Ali, Bahrein, were examined by Mr. Bent, and in one of them were found ivories bearing a close and unmistakable resemblance to ivories found in Phœnician tombs on the shores of the Mediterranean, and to the ivories in the British Museum from Nimrod, in Assyria, universally accepted as having been executed by Phœnician artists. The result of the work left no doubt in Mr. Bent's mind that the mounds are of Phœnician origin, and that they were a vast necropolis of that mercantile race. The islands, Mrs. Bent holds, are, then, either the land of Punt, from which the Puni got their name, or a sacred spot for the burial of their dead. She inclines to the former supposition, judging from the mercantile importance of the Bahrein Islands, and the excellent school they must have been for a race which was to penetrate to all the other known corners of the globe.

The most interesting part of the journey down the western shores of the Red Sea was the expedition into the interior from Mahomed Gol to a very ancient gold mine in the Wadi Gabeit. There is an ancient Egyptian plan of a gold mine on a papyrus in the museum of Turin of the time of Seti I., which M. Chabas considers to represent an auriferous vein in a desert mountain situated to the east of higher Egypt and very near the Red Sea. Mrs. Bent observes: "There seems every probability that the mine discovered by my husband was the one illustrated by the most ancient plan in the world, and, curiously enough, the fresh inscription we found seems to give a combination of vowels closely resembling the name given on the plan." It is improbable that the ancients, with their limited knowledge of mining, can have exhausted the place, and though the absence of labour and water seem against working, the mine is situated so conveniently near the sea, with comparatively easy road access, that labour might be imported, and artesian wells might possibly do away with the water difficulty.

In the account of the visit to Dhofar there is a characteristic little piece of eastern colour. Sultan Hussein told Mr. Bent on February 1 that a consul had been murdered at Jeddah; but on reaching Aden they learned that no murder had taken place, nor did the murder occur till May, when several consuls were, it will be remembered, set upon by the natives. Here is a parallel case. The present writer landed in Turkey after the Berlin Conference on September 1, 1878, and was told by the Turkish major in charge of the detachment of troops on the beach that Mehemet Ali Pasha had been murdered at Ipek by the Albanians, whereas, as a matter of fact, the Pasha was not murdered till a day or two afterwards. This shows that these murders are generally part of a long pre-arranged plan, well known to everyone except, perhaps, the victim, although he, too, is often aware of the fate which is awaiting him.

The book is well illustrated with photographs and elucidated by some useful maps of the routes travelled. In the appendices will be found a list of plants from the Dhofar Mountains communicated to Kew Gardens in 1895, and a list of the land and freshwater shells collected by Mr. and Mrs. Bent in Sokotra. There is also a most valuable list of Sokoteri and Makri words, collected by Mr. Bent in the island of Sokotra, with the English and Arabic equivalents.

Fiction.

The Novel of Action.

The Rebel, being a Memoir of Anthony, Fourth Earl of Cherwell. By H. B. Marriott Watson. (Heinemann. 6s.)

Maitland of Cortezia. By Francis Lavallin Puxley. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

It is to be confessed that the novel of action, so-called, furnishes a peculiar pitfall for the critic. He is but human, after all, and he has, in common with the average man, the power of visualising incidents that never occurred and becoming excited over them. The factitious hurry of the novel of action makes him "breathless," and this he often counts to the glory of the book. In short, when he is through with his reading he would as soon think, in nine cases out of ten, of criticising the artistic value of a real conflagration or a real shipwreck as of coldly dissecting the fiction that has "winded" him. And it is a fact none the less strange than true that the most intelligent commentary on the novel of action is supplied by ladies of middle life who have no notion of Art with a capital A, but a considerable liking for the probability, for what we may be permitted to call the tidiness, of plot. These cold-blooded madams will sit down to The Rebel, for instance, and, while the assassin Harrington is crying "Stab him!" (p. 193), quietly put a strip of perforated card "in the place," rise from their tea and wait till the recurrence of that meal before finding out if the rebellious Earl of Cherwell left the room alive. For these elderly ladies, topography—and there is a plague of topography in most novels of action—is in no wise negligible; a too speedy recovery from a wound is an occasion for a sniff, and a too expansive heroine is as likely as not to be entitled a hussy or a minx. They will have you know that the laws of nature persist even amid battle and murder and sudden death, and that they mean to protest against their violation in the pages of fiction. They are very sane are these elderly ladies, and we may, perhaps, do worse than look at the novels of action before us with some regard to their point of view.

Mr. Watson presents us with a seventeenth century narrative written, we are to imagine, by a minor participant in the events which it records. The theme is the defence by the Earl of Cherwell (the Rebel) of a woman's honour against the machinations of the august inventor of the Boot. The character of the Earl is a clever conception. He has moments of clairvoyance and moments of crass stupidity. He is mixed up in treasons and uses men of the kind that fought at Sedgemoor for his private ends in the name of the public good. Yet affronted honour becomes in him a madness. His heroisms smack of the stage, but on these the book will sell. Mr. Watson's style, or rather that of the putative writer, is characterised by a precision of balance, a literary primness which is in striking contrast to the incessant commotion of the plot which it develops.

Another anomaly is afforded by the fact that the witty artist who delights in barbing the satirical tongue of Charles II. should betray such a weakness for posturing. Listen to this; it is the narrator talking to the heroine:

Look you, madam, there lies a watch-dog whom no threats can avert, and no prayers melt. For good or ill there is he set, with his eyes upon your door. And when you are retired into your chamber upon your Tower, and are crept in terror to your bed, with but your thin white veil and fallen hair to shield this delicate body, yonder, you shall remember, rest those eyes that watch and guard you.

This is caricature, you say. Not a bit of it; it is simply romance finding itself out, finding out its own incurable hollowness and trick of the tom-tom. Needless to say Mr. Watson is too clever to commit himself more than once or twice in this particular way. In the matter of incident—"action," by your leave—his book makes lavish demand on our credulity. Take, for instance, the passage (pp. 267-8) where Cherwell, on his way to London as a prisoner, manages to get out of his carriage while it is in motion, spring upon a mounted trooper riding by its side, gag him, and with a highwayman's assistance stuff him along with another trooper into the vehicle without attracting the attention of the rest of the escort! What is best in Mr. Watson is a native delicacy and poetry in the delineation of women. The Countess of Cherwell is a figure of much allurements; and we can call to mind few scenes where the pathos is at once so keen and so restrained as that in which she is suddenly confronted with a woman who was or wished to be her husband's mistress. As to the immorality of fastening fictitious crimes on historical characters, however bad, the elderly ladies whose assistance we invoked are, we think, agreed.

Maitland of Cortezia is a different type from the rebel earl. He is a glorification of the English administrator, and represents therefore Authority upholding the Standard. Perfect self-composure in the most trying situations is the nineteenth century ideal offered by Mr. Puxley. "One unmoved Englishman against an infuriated people"—that is the spectacle, and who will refuse to cheer it? Cortezia belongs to the geography of fiction; but, though you will not find a British dependency on the Pacific coast of South America, it is plain that it may stand for either Chilo or Peru. On the whole, the romance is successful in preserving its actuality, yet we cannot imagine an Englishman's sister even under strong emotion addressing her brother in the words of Ruth: "Whither thou goest I will go, and where thou lodgest I will lodge." The sentimental motif—a girl falling in love with a man whom she is sworn to oppose—is a cliché, and in these pages she will not live for seasoned old ladies, but only for ingénues. The sketches of official types are admirably done, however, and although we have deprecated one of her utterances, the Administrator's sister is a real live woman. The book ends, as all elderly ladies will agree, tantalisingly. It withholds information which only the artistic sense can supply, and that is a pity, for after all Maitland of Cortezia is simply a yarn. Mr. Puxley's Cortezian patriots, it must be added, are of the rankest, although, "whatever else he might be, Fernan Mareiner was a gentleman" (p. 189). There is something wrong here, for this is what we learn of him: "What are you doing, Don Fernan?" asks the heroine. "I am about to execute a malefactor," he replies. "You are not going to kill him in cold blood?" she insists. "No, Señorita," he retorts, "it will not be cold, but who can avoid an accident? His Excellency is about to be so unfortunate as to be burnt in his own house?" And then this "gentleman," who has already promised to "amuse" himself with "His Excellency's" sister, proceeds to threaten the heroine with his licentious attentions. Mr. Puxley is, however, a novelist "of parts," and may, we think, be favourably compared with his young contemporary, the author of Savrola, whose imagination, though better trained in some respects, has not proved its power to bestow such pleasure.

In conclusion, if we were asked to define the weakness of the novel of action, we should express it in one word—posturing. It postures not because its authors are insincere, but simply because by renouncing the analytic method they surrender to the necessity of constantly signifying the heroic type by speeches, gestures, and surfaces.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

SOPHIA.

BY STANLEY J. WEYMAN.

Mr. Weyman's new story is one of fashionable life in the West End in the eighteenth century. It opens in 1742, and there are routs, and visits to Vauxhall and coach rides into the country; and a deal of pleasant description of manners is wrought into a story which is concerned mainly with love and social comedy. (Longmans. 6s.)

THE FARRINGDON. BY ELLEN THORNEYCROFT FOWLER.

A new novel by the popular author of Concerning Isabel Carnaby and A Double Thread. The story deals with Methodism, love, and society, and is laid in Mereshire, "which is in the middle of England." The dedication to the book runs:

For all such readers as have chanced to be Either in Mereshire or in Arcady,
I write this book, that each may smile and say,
"Once on a time I, also, passed that way."

(Hutchinson. 6s.)

BECKY.

BY HELEN MATHERS.

This popular novelist's latest heroine has some—just a few—of the qualities of the great, the only Becky. But the happier trend of her fortunes in love is indicated by the motto-lines:

Would you know, O curious Ben,
What true women want in men?
Only titles that are won
By some act that they have done;
Only manners that impart
Knowledge of their source—the heart.

(Pearson, Ltd. 6s.)

CASTLE AND MANOR.

BY ST. GEORGE MIVART.

This posthumous story was suggested, we are told in a brief preface, by the personal, social, and local experiences of the author. Its contents suggest that this description is very accurate. We have aristocratic and cultured people talking about the Anglican and Roman Churches, faith and science, Newman and Mr. Herbert Spencer, the equality of the sexes, forms of government, &c. (Sands & Co. 6s.)

TWO SUMMERS.

BY MRS. J. CLENNY WILSON

A quiet romance, something in the manner of Mr. Howells. One of the two summers is spent on the Pacific coast, and the other in a peer's house in England. The plot is slight, the strength and main interest of the book—a very charming one—being its character-drawing. (Harpers. 6s.)

THE TIGER'S CLAW.

BY G. B. BURGIN.

We do not gather at a glance why this cheery story of London life—oscillating between the West End and the City, between the Albany and Clement's-lane—is so fear-somely entitled. But there is a tiger's claw, perhaps, in every novel. Mr. Burgin describes various phases of London life, including a Quakers' meeting in Bishopsgate-street. We are a little sorry that he has joined the ranks of the prologue writers. (Pearson, Ltd. 6s.)

THE VALLEY OF THE GREAT SHADOW.

BY ANNIE E. HOLDS-WORTH.

A sad story, with a happy ending, by the author of The Years that the Locusts hath Eaten. The scene is an Alpine health resort, peopled by invalids, and the principal character is the doctor. "Life, Death, Love—these three," are the last words; "but the greatest of these is love." (Heinemann. 6s.)

A STORY OF THE ESTANCIA.

BY GEORGE CRAMPTON.

A romance of the Argentine Republic. "Fast galloped Don Santiago and his man over the brownish-yellow pasto, leaving Las Aromas behind them," and so forth. Horse-racing, intrigue, love, and cigarettes. (Unwin. 3s. 6d.)

"A 439."

BY TWENTY-FIVE MUSICAL SCRIBES.

A 439 is the autobiography of a piano, and it has been written "with a hope that the profits on the sale of this book may yield a considerable sum for the funds of the Incorporated Society of Musicians' Orphanage." The piano dedicates its autobiography "To My Tuners, Good, Bad, and Indifferent." Each writer takes a stage in the piano's career, and we have such pleasantly suggestive chapter headings as "My Début," "She Kissed my Cold Keys," "In Hospital," "The Prima Donna's Jewels" (written by Mr. Frankfort Moore), "Keyboard Love," and "The Touch of a Sovereign Hand." (Sands & Co. 6s.)

CELESTE.

BY WALMER DOWNE.

This novel, by the author of Shamrock and Heather, deals with life in the Southern States after the War of Secession, when many gentle Southern families felt the pinch of poverty. "Yes, when rude poverty has made it necessary, these high-born women have . . . graced, with their nameless charm of manner, circumstances which would have made men harsh or sour for life." Of such was Celeste. (Pearson, Ltd. 6s.)

The Words of Rabelais.

SAY rather the words of Urquhart. But, as Mr. Whibley says in his masterly introduction to the new edition of Rabelais (the Tudor Translations), Urquhart "knew Rabelais to the bone . . . he was, in a sense, Rabelais incarnate." Rabelais was drunk with new words. So was Urquhart. In translating Rabelais the Scotsman could find word for word, or better the words of his master. Thus Urquhart's pages are a kind of drift and deposit of Renaissance pebbles of speech. Some of the pebbles have lain where they were first flung; others have been polished and worn, and then discarded; some have survived, and many might well have survived that have not.

Mr. Whibley is careful to show that Urquhart was enormously indebted to Randal Cotgrave, whose Dictionnaire of the French and English Tongues, published in 1611, is a very "treasure house of words." A wonderful man was Cotgrave—a kind of George Borrow among words, a loving wanderer of all the lanes and alleys of English speech, in an age when that speech was both old and new. "Scholar though he was," says Mr. Whibley, Cotgrave shared with Urquhart a love of the street-corner and the tavern. It was not in the homes of the great that he gathered the outcasts and footpads of speech, for which his dictionary is (so to say) a literary doss-house. Many an hour must he have spent wandering up and down among the thieves and rufflers of London, or in the narrow streets which filled the Latin Quarter of ancient Paris. But he was no mere loafer in the cities of Europe: he knew the countryside as well as the tavern, and you can picture him as he tramps between the hedgerows, or sleeps at necessity under the stars.

It is easy to see when Urquhart is drawing on his own scholarship, acquired in the European centres of learning, and when he is leaning heavily on Cotgrave for homely slang, or words for the cries of animals. If Cotgrave's work is a treasure house, Urquhart's translation is a treasure city which every philologist loves to sack. It is not only stored, but is paven, with innumerable curious words, suggestive, appetising, marvellous. As:

Many of these words are not wanted now. Cunniborow (cony- [i.e., rabbit] burrow) is an Urquhartism for a nook, a cranny. "There is not a corner, nor cunniborow in all my body where this wine doth not ferret out my thirst," exclaims one of the drinkers at the celebration of the birth of Gargantua—a birth which you are to accept as recounted, and "never emberlucock or inpulregafize your spirits" with vain doubts. Condisciple is a good word still at need, and the need is surely frequent enough. "Condisciples of Mr. Ruskin" describes the members of the new Ruskin Union; and it is written in the Encyclopædia Britannica that "Vigors found an energetic condisciple and coadjutor in Swainson." Perennity and prejudicate need no commendation, nor clounch for clown; substantific is substantival writ sharp; and dunsical is now spelt with two c's when it is spelt at all; "I have no patience with the foolish duncical dog," says someone in Clarissa Harlowe. Hulchbacked is old hunchbacked; and it was with hulch-back't demi-knives that the monks of Seville slit the wezans of the shepherds of Gargantua in one of those terrible rows that arose out of the affair of the Cake-bearers of Lerne. The monks may be said to have cardinalised the ground with the blood of their invaders. Flabel is to fan: "it is continually flabelled, blown upon, and aired by the north winds." A shable was a short sword, like a sabre; the Monk of Seville had "a good slashing shable by his side," and the weapon is found in Rob Roy. The verb empoison has an obvious, if trifling, advantage over poison; it was used by Mandeville in connexion with a king of Damascus, and by Dickens in connexion with the refreshment buffet at Mugby Junction. Hydropic (produced by or containing water, hence dropsical) is old, but common; the word is good in surgery. Squinance has been shortened to quinsy. Supputation is become computation; but one would not enforce the change on Rabelais: "You must therefore remark, that at the beginning of the world, (I speak of a long time, it is above fourty quarantaines, or fourty times fourty nights, according to the supputation of the ancient Druids) a little after that Abel was killed by his brother Cain. . . ." verily this was supputation, not mere computation. Mirific is a good poet's-word, and patrocinate is more dignified than patronage, and disposure might be used in connexions where disposal seems thin and hackneyed. Says Panurge in praise of Debt: "Yet it doth not lie in the power of every one to be a Debtor. To acquire Creditors is not at the disposure of each Man's Arbitrament; you nevertheless would deprive me of this sublime Felicity." And in Pantagruel's counsel to Panurge on Marriage: "It is therefore expedient, seeing you are resolved for once to take a trial of the state of Marriage, that, with shut eyes, bowing your Head, and kissing of the Ground, you put the business to a Venture, and give it a hazard in recommending the success of the residue to the disposure of Almighty God." And how the word thrives in Ben Jonson's Underwoods!

A life that knew no noise, nor strife;
But was, by sweetening so his will,
All order and disposure still.

Sedulity is a very good word, yet we now rarely see anything but its clumsy form, sedulousness, which cannot, like sedulity, be used in the plural. Milton wrote in one of his State Letters: "That your Sedulities in the Reception of our Agent were so cordial and so egregious we both gladly understand, and earnestly exhort ye that you would persevere in your good Will and Affection towards us." Skreak is an obsolete form of shriek, and might well be kept for certain kinds of shrieking. A frightened woman shrieks, but a small animal skreaks. One can prefer twattle to twaddle sometimes. When Panurge and Epistemon came back from consulting the Sibyl of Panzoust, "having presented to him the Leaves of the Sycamore they show him the short and twattle Verses that were written in them." Fatidicency, meaning divination, is pretty obsolete. Says Pantagruel, praising the counsel of dumb men: "Let us make trial of this kind of Fatidicency." Oddly enough the Century Dictionary prints the word "Fatidicency" and quotes this passage where, as we have said, the word is Fatidicency. Preallably is simply previously, but may be preferred to it as in Pantagruel's remark: "However, it passeth for current, that the imminent Death of a Swan is presaged by his forgoing Song, and that no Swan dieth until preallably he have sung." The word is rare. Cogging is a good old word; it signifies cheating by means of loaded dice, or by flattery. When Panurge is trying to minimise the prophecies of the poet Raminagrobis, he says: "He answer'd but by Disjunctives, therefore can it not be true which he saith; for the verity of such like Propositions is inherent only in one of its two Members. O the cozening Pratler that he is! I wonder if Santiago of Bressure be one of these cogging Shirks." And Shakespeare makes Coriolanus say:

Chide me no more. I'll mountebank their loves,
Cog their hearts from them, and come home below'd
Of all the traders in Rome.

Swindging is but swingeing, in the sense of lashing. Milton has it in his "Ode on the Nativity":

And wroth to see his kingdom fail,
Swindges the scaly horror of his folded tail.

Stinched is but stunched, and brabbling babbling. To bedusk meant to smudge. Belam is still a North-country word meaning to thrash; more usually one hears simply "lam." Ambage is a good word, meaning circumlocution, roundaboutness; the physician Rondibilis explains to Panurge how the blood passes through several Circuits, Ambages, and Aufractuosities, to the heart. The word was used by Chaucer, Locke, and Swift, but is now rare. Impetrate is an interesting word, meaning to obtain by prayer or petition, particularly of the Pope. Hence, in Rabelais, the Pope says to the Abbess of Toucherome: "There is not anything fitting for you to impetrate of me which I would not most willingly condescend unto." And Jeremy Taylor says: "When I fast, it is first an act of repentance for myself, before it can be an instrument of impetration for him." Commensal is a very good word, signifying "eating together at the same table." Smollett has it in his translation of Gil Blas: "They surrounded me, and with the utmost complaisance expressed their joy at seeing me become a commensal officer of the palace."

Behooful (needful, advantageous) is more familiar as behooveful. Shakespeare makes Juliet say:

We have cull'd such necessaries
As are behooveful for our State to-morrow.

Pervicacious, meaning obstinate, is found no more, though it is found in Dryden. Rickling is a useful little word. When Panurge gave Triboulet, the fool, a bladder with peas in it, Triboulet was so pleased that "he slipt himself out of the Company, went aside, and ratling the Bladder took a huge Delight in the melody of the rickling and crackling Noise of the Pease." So may we, without foolishness, take delight in the wonderful words in the Rabelaisian bladder, even though many of them be now less nutritious than pease.

Things Seen.

Passengers.

THE Broadway cable car was overcrowded. An old man made his way up to the front where a younger man, wife, and child were seated. The younger rose promptly at the approach of the elder, and, with a good-natured smile, said, "Take my seat, sir."

"Oh, no!" protested the new passenger; "keep your seat, sir."

"Take it, sir, take it."

Looking gravely over his spectacles, the new-comer said: "But why should I take it? Tell me that."

"Well—well, now, for many reasons: because it's the proper thing for me to give my seat to an older man."

"H'm! ah! I should like to know, sir, about how old you think I am, sir?"

"Sit down, sir, sit down."

The car at this point gave one of its series of hiccoughs, and everybody standing was wrenched and twisted out of temporary joint. The old man was jammed into the vacant seat. Everyone had some personal damages to repair. The air was lively with exclamations and apologies. A passenger sitting opposite left the car. The older man then rose, and, motioning to the younger, said: "There now, thank you, sir, there's your seat again; but I'd just like to ask you once more, how old you think I am, just for curiosity. I'd like to know."

"Oh, now! that's rather an embarrassing question to answer before such an audience." And with a merry laugh—"I don't like to say. Besides, it wouldn't be polite."

A growing interest was manifested by the other passengers. The young wife lifted her little girl to her knee and whispered something to her husband.

"What does she say?" queried the old man.

"Oh, dear! Ha, ha, ha!" chuckled the younger.

"Why, my wife says you don't look any older than I do. By Jove! is that so?"

There was a craning of necks in the rear of the car. Someone called, "Down in front!" No one seemed to be getting out anywhere.

"That's pretty tough on you, sir. I was born in 1826, and am in my seventy-fifth year."

"Well, I was forty-one last month. There's something wrong about one of us." An explosion of laughter followed. Even the conductor joined in, and the motor-man peered through the door to see what was up. The little girl waited for the laughter to subside, and as it died out piped up shrilly, "Say, Popper, are you getting acquainted with the people in the car?"

Car No. — turned the curve at Forty-Fifth-street with the conductor and one passenger in an agony of embarrassment.

A Great Preacher.

ON Monday Dr. Joseph Parker, the minister of the City Temple, will enter upon his seventieth birthday, having been born at Hexham-on-Tyne on April 9, 1830. In this connexion it may be interesting to recall a comparison which has been drawn between the eloquence of Dr. Parker and that of Chrysostom. It was on the occasion of Dr. Parker's pulpit jubilee, in 1898, that the Rev. Vaughan Pryce, Principal of New College, London, spoke as follows:

REV. JOSEPH PARKER, D.D.

From a photograph by Messrs. Killick & Abbott.

"I have often thought that an interesting and striking parallel might be drawn between Chrysostom, the most famous preacher of ancient time, and the distinguished minister whom we congratulate to-day.

Both may be described as by special vocation preachers, as obviously and distinctly called to preach as was the great Apostle himself: the numerous homilies of the one, with their varied and abundant excellencies, may not unfitly, I think, have placed beside them the sermons that have issued from the City Temple. Both preachers have dealt with the same text-book—the Bible—and have aimed at making its voice clear to the men and women about them. The method of both may be truthfully called exegetical and expository. The one is said to have expounded the whole Bible in the services of the sanctuary; the other, apart from numerous volumes of discourses all occupied with biblical ideas and with the relation of these to the active life of busy men, has published the result of years of systematic exposition in the many volumes of the People's Bible. The claim of both is to be interpreters of the Word: here is the basis of all argument and of all appeal. In both cases the spirit of the preacher is throughout warmly and intensely evangelical in the best sense of that term, the Gospel being to them the mind of God in deepest and most loving expression, a message of life, and therefore more than a philosophy, more than a theology. Both are known as men of conspicuous native gifts, men of great vitality, with power of incisive speech, pungent wit, regal imagination, with natures capable of passionate feeling and utterance when the wrongdoings of men have to be denounced; of tender, sympathetic, and healing words when the sorrowing have to be comforted. Neither can be called the preacher of a philosophy, but there is philosophy in the preaching of both—the truest philosophy, because a philosophy which is true to human nature and the human heart. In the preaching of both the ethical element abounds, and the supreme aim is to shape the lives of men to high and noble ends, to gain influence over them with a view to their spiritual well-being. Consequently, with neither is the message that of a formal orthodoxy, but always that of a vital Christianity. The whole ministry of each may be called a protest against unbelief, against narrow conceptions of God, of man, and of life, a call to men to place the best highest. In both the preaching is an epitome of the character; the preacher's own soul struggles are depicted; the preacher's own spiritual conflicts, sorrows, and victories are portrayed in the work of encouragement and warning. Each may properly be described as an extemporaneous preacher in the best sense of the term, with the gift of felicitous expression, of subtle (and sometimes almost boisterous) humour, and with the faculties well in hand in the moment of utterance; each, in the best sense, popular, partly, perhaps, through clearness and directness of speech and urgency of appeal, partly through the power of conceiving and expressing the emotions and thoughts of men of the living present, and partly through fulness of apt, lively, and often homely illustration. It is a delicate task to compare two men like this, no doubt; nevertheless, the comparison best expresses the present speaker's conception of him whose long and conspicuous service we recall to-day, and is the contribution he ventures to offer to the celebration of this Jubilee."

Stevenson Looks In.

SURELY someone is there in the shade . . . Don't go away! Yes; I am the watchman to-day: the Immortals are having their afternoon nap. Who are you? Robert Louis Stevenson. You were only passing, and looked in? A picturesque figure! I hear your friends love you. They wish you to stay? You don't seem to be quite sure about it yourself! That is the Empyrean: a rather dazzling light, isn't it? Ah!—lean on me; come this way. It is doubtful if you would feel at home here; questions might be asked about your diplomas—perfect artistry as distinct from genius. . . . What do I mean? Your work! So runs our verdict! Do rest on my arm; this radiance staggers you. The shade gave you a chill? You are one of the unfortunate fortunates! Had your intellectual and imaginative capacity been equal to your superb gifts as an artist you would have taken your place in the sacred circle. Your case has a personal sweetness and grace; you have been acclaimed by the elect among mortals. But there is an infallible criterion of greatness. Let me call it genius. It is indefinable. Those fellows down there scramble to the housetops with their proclamations of it. They have been trying to define it ever since Adam knew he was naked and hid himself; explaining this and that about it; giving their own impressions of it. But the secret is still concealed; and it never can be divulged. Here we never make any mistake! . . . You are an extremely interesting imitation man of genius. You are the very genius of the temperament of genius. You deceived others—sometimes yourself; you are acquitted of base intent! You danced all your life on the border-line of genius. Very clever, skilful; in Weir of Hermiston you almost crossed the frontier. It was then that your name was uttered in the Empyrean; there was a moment of expectant silence; then a moment of regret; Jeremy Taylor said a fine thing about you (I must not repeat!), and I saw a tear in Bunyan's eye—but he did not speak.

Ah! pitiable, lovely fate! . . . I must tell you that you have failed to make good your claim. In the literature of imagination the only irrefragable proof of genius is creative power. It is not artistry, however exquisite. It is a unique revelation: a new birth: it gives to the world a new thing. It is never imitative; it may confess its masters, but it does not follow them. Now you . . . Oh, yes: these things you bring are well done; but have they not all been done before? Your graceful egoism was farther graced by that word of inspired modesty about the sedulous ape. Your style is the agglomeration of an immense variety of styles informed by your own fascinating idiosyncrasy, your highly cultivated taste, your enchanted ear for the music of words. It is only original, only peculiarly your own, in the sense that a woman exquisitely dressed retains her individuality. She is the same person; but much of her charm is adventitious. So—we must speak the truth here!—your outfit is an exceedingly ingenious arrangement of almost all the beautiful things in the universal literary wardrobe. . . . Plagiarism? Not at all! You are far too honest and fastidious to be a vulgar plagiarist. It was, indeed, unnecessary. For you could add colours to another's rainbow; filigree to another's embroidery; facets to another's jewels. You have in the superlative degree the decorative mind. You are the M. Worth of English fiction. . . . Pray do not misunderstand me! You are more than that. But, being that, what could you do with the fire of the stars, the wonders and terrors of the illimitable deep? You have bequeathed to your fellow-mortals a charming little kingdom; but was it not made out of the great empires of the Immortals? You were sadly given to talking about your art and yourself as an artist. The "phrase of distinction" (that last infirmity of half-genius) was your Holy Greal; you lived in a kind of beatific adoration of it. Your insight was curbed by experiments in technique. You would pause to decorate an emotion; but pure emotion always springs to its own ideal expression, and needs no dressing, being the perfect nude. You would write—write—write the passion out of a love scene. Oh, how beautifully dead Catrina is! You would disfigure a character with a distinguished phrase. That is the dementia of artistry! You know how you would worry about "the hang of a thing" (Stevenson! genius doesn't know, doesn't care!), and would give the most delightful analyses of your feelings under the sweet torment of getting it to satisfy your sensitive artistic conscience. That is the way of the artist. It is not the way of genius. Not one of those radiant ones in the Heights is there by virtue of phrasemongery. Why—let me tell you—the exultant irresistibility of their impassioned souls was impatient of the medium in which they were compelled by the dulness of mortals to express themselves. . . . Am I a depressing person? You must not be downcast! Tens of thousands have yearned to get as far as you have got: they are out there in the shade, and I must not call them. You can barely exist here; but you will live in the glimpses of the moon. The generations who love fragrant personality in art will not suffer you to die. The common man, with his big hungry heart, will find small sustenance in you; so you will live less and less vividly. Your place will be among the dainty, the curious, the literary "well-attired" (as Milton said of the woodbine—Ruskin has just been pitching into him for it); the dilettanti will arise in their children and children's children and call you blessed. You are the cleanest and most wholesome of all the decadents. You wince at that! But the decadent is the worker in art whose work has no spiritual significance. . . . You fought death nobly—brave, bright spirit! but as you fought it you embalmed its mask in your art. I would not willingly grieve you; but that was your nearest approach to an unconscious effort of genius. . . . My dear Stevenson! here is Jekyll and Hyde. You are not, of course, to be judged finally by this story. But it is very characteristic of you! Here you had a theme of inspiration; it was your chance of immortality—and what did you do with it? You saw in it a tale to make your readers' flesh creep, and so you left it. There is nothing, in your books, before or after, equal to that idea. It was a gleam upon you from the regions beyond, and had you been a man of genius you would have been compelled in spite of yourself to lift the whole thing out of the barren triviality—I had almost said the silliness—of decoctions from a chemist's shop. Not so have the great ones dealt with the awful truth of man's dual nature! You were there at close quarters with the most stupendous fact of human existence—the eternal conflict between good and evil, the pestilence that walks in darkness, the terrific unseen forces before which some of the finest spirits of all time have gone down in nameless ignominy—and yet—and yet you were content to treat this august problem through the agency of a chemical powder on the stomach! The tale has no profundity, no symbolism worthy the name; its terrors are the terrors of the mechanical ghost trade. I was about to say that its only sincerity is the sincerity of craftsmanship. But you are plainly sincere in the entire business. It was to you a yarn—just a yarn—nothing more. . . . I have brought you so far, and I ask you to lift your eyes to that shining place, and try to imagine what they would have made of it! They could not—they simply could not—have confined to a mere exercise in writing the overwhelming mystery of the angel and the beast in the human soul. They would have given to it the accent altogether peculiar to intuitive imagination—the significance which is at once illuminative and indescribable. The divine spark in them would have blazed forth, and humanity would have had an apocalypse of its glory and its shame. And they would not afterwards, I assure you, have been able to tell much about it. For genius sees, and seeing reveals, and the miracle that is wrought remains a miracle even to itself. . . . Robert Louis Stevenson! you have not wrought miracles, or, if you have, they are the miracles which can be taken to pieces and examined. And that is the difference between the artist and the creator, between fancy and imagination, between artistry and genius. . . . I am glad, nevertheless, that you have looked in. Don't be alarmed; that is only the Immortals beginning to awake. You may stay awhile. Go over there and rest on the lower slope; you will find it quiet and sunny; there are blue-bells and heather, and a tranquil sky. . . . See! there is Bunyan. He is almost always alone. Shall I ask him to come and speak to you? . . .

VINCENT BROWN.

The Missing Word.

SIR,—A few days ago Lord Stratheona, the High Commissioner for Canada, in his place in the House of Lords, repudiated the word "colony" in referring to those parts of the Empire which are not washed by the waters of the Narrow Seas. At the time of the great Jubilee, Sir Wilfred Laurier referred with equal directness to the fact that Canada was no longer a colony; that its inhabitants were no more colonists than the inhabitants of Kent. Canada is a nation. The Afrikaner Dutch of South Africa, particularly the old families loyal to the British Crown, have long resented the use of the word "colonists" because they say they never were British colonists, though they yield to no Briton in loyalty to Queen Victoria and her heirs. In Australia, the affected assumption of superiority by New Chums over the "colonists" is bitterly resented, and the stony stare of the British administrator in dealing with the inhabitants of Britain beyond sea has been the raw material of rebellion for 140 years. The lost possessions of England are due to this cause more than to any other. Why is this? The term "colony" implies servitude, inferiority, suzerainty, subordination of lesser breeds in a lower state to that of the high mightiness of the mother country. This was the Roman and Napoleonic conception of a colony, and we know the result. The derivation of the word "colony" is uncertain, but the learned Skeat suggests the root to be from kal, "to drive." If there is one thing that the American rebellion taught the Anglo-Saxon race, it is that the "colonists" will not be driven or coerced even in word. What wonder, then, that the terms "colony" and "colonist" should be as vigorously and sincerely repudiated by Canada as by Kent: by Victoria or Natal as by Midlothian or Lancashire? If the British people wish to federate the British Empire there is no tie more effective than the abolition of the words "colony" and "colonists," and the frank and whole-hearted acceptance of the idea that the man in Ottawa or King William's Town is no less a Briton or a Britisher than the man who reads his Daily Mail on the top of the Peckham omnibus, or takes his morning gallop in the Row. But it is necessary to clear away the jungle of misconception that has sprung up from the bad old days when Englishmen claimed from settlers across the sea tribute and respect, not merely to the Queen, but to political institutions created by them for their own, not for colonial, convenience. In order to dispel this misconception, a word must be found that shall describe the subjects of the Queen in all parts of the Empire. The matter has been discussed for some years, but no one has yet hit upon a happy solution. The word "Briton" excludes the Canadian, the South African, or the Australasian. I am inclined to think that the word "Britisher" is the only one that satisfactorily includes the whole of the Anglo-Saxon race, and even then the Celtic Irish may consider themselves excluded. After the fighting on the Tugela no word will be satisfactory to the Empire that is unsatisfactory to the Irish. Perhaps you will, therefore, open your columns for a discussion as to the best substitutes for "colony" and "colonists," which by common consent should be relegated to the dust-bin of disused language.

The part taken in the war by the Anglo-Saxon communities over sea requires their recognition not as dependencies but as equals; as partners in the assets of the British Empire. Parliamentary federation may be impossible, but the need for a continuous foreign policy, the necessity for raising the social and educational standard of all classes throughout the empire, and the certainty that the tendency of British thought is to grow more like that of Canada and Australia than the daughter nations to become like that of England, emphasise the importance of discovering a word without further delay that shall be finally accepted as descriptive of Queen's men and women all over the world. Downing-street cannot help us. Will not the poets, the men of imagination, and masters of language, and even the men whom language masters, come over and help us? The Queen is the Queen of Canada, but the Parliament at Westminster has no more power to coerce Canadians than the Parliament of Ottawa to coerce the men of Camden Town. If sympathy is closer between the Canadians, the Australians, and the Cape men at the outset of an acquaintance than with New Chums or Tender Foots, the comradeship on the outskirts of the nation comes from greater knowledge, larger sympathies, and a wider outlook than that of the sedentary and insular stay-at-homes whose separatism and peace-at-any-priceism has now received a blow that has staggered inhumanity.—I am, &c.,

ARNOLD WHITE.

Lettres à l'Etrangère.

MONSIEUR LE DIRECTEUR,—On nous communique une note publiée par votre journal dans son numéro du 31 Mars dernier, et d'après laquelle l'auteur d'une traduction, d'ailleurs non autorisée par nous, et par conséquent tout-à-fait incorrecte, d'un ouvrage publié par notre maison, et intitulé Lettres à l'Etrangère, par Honoré de Balzac, aurait émis des doutes sérieux sur l'authenticité de quelques-unes de ces lettres.

Nous donnons un démenti formel à cette allégation qui est de nature à nous causer un préjudice matériel et surtout moral que vous comprendrez facilement.

Toutes les lettres publiées par nous sont absolument authentiques; les originaux sont entre les mains de M. le Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul (37, Boulevard du Régent, à Bruxelles) qui consentirait certainement à les communiquer à toute personne autorisée qui lui en ferait la demande.

Nous vous demandons de vouloir bien publier la présente dans un de vos plus prochains numéros et vous prions, Monsieur le Directeur, de recevoir l'assurance de nos sentiments distingués.

Maeterlinck and the "Contemporary Review."

SIR,—It is not my wish to answer in any detail Miss Underhill's attack on my Maeterlinck article. I merely want to explain, first, that my article was not intended as a complete study of Maeterlinck, but rather as a discussion of his poetry, regarded chiefly from the technical standpoint. His essays, his mysticism and philosophy, were outside my consideration, except in so far as they enabled a reader to understand his artistic methods. No doubt I ought to have called the article "The Poetry of Maeterlinck," or something of the sort, to avoid misunderstanding such as seems to have occurred.

In the second place, I must caution your readers against accepting Miss Underhill's summary of my article as accurate. I quote a sentence from her letter: "In all these plays Mr. Ropes, while denying Maeterlinck the dramatic gift, allows his power over the chords of pity and terror—but rather thinks Mr. Kipling does it better." This obviously refers to the following paragraph of my article (the only place in which Kipling is mentioned at all): "This method of suggesting the supernatural [the passage refers to 'L'Intruse,' and to that play alone] without describing it, of building up an insistent horror out of common but inexplicable things, is not peculiar to Maeterlinck; it is, in fact, the well-known device of skilful modern writers of weird and supernatural tales. Kipling has used it with great success, so has Guy de Maupassant. Maeterlinck's style is more poetic than theirs, but less convincing." This is what I said, and the meaning is tolerably obvious. "L'Intruse" is a study in supernatural horror, in which Maeterlinck uses, and successfully uses, literary methods common to many modern writers. I mentioned Kipling and Maupassant, as I might have mentioned Stevenson and Sheridan Le Fanu. But such practised literary craftsmen as Maupassant, and Kipling give their readers a stronger shudder than does the mystical Maeterlinck, possibly because these two are habitually in contact with hard realities. I venture to assert that what I wrote is not in the least like what Miss Underhill says I wrote. Let your readers compare the two passages and judge for themselves.

I must plead guilty, however, to ignoring "the strange stillness of the soul which is felt through his (Maeterlinck's) works," and I should be glad if Miss Underhill, or some other disciple of the Belgian master, would so far have pity on me as to explain what and whose soul is referred to, what this stillness is, whether serenity or silence or both, and why this serenity and silence of somebody's soul should make a great dramatic poet, when Shakespeare had to content himself with emotion and expression.—I am, &c.,

ARTHUR R. ROPES.

"Mudie's!"

SIR,—I feel surprised that the verdict against Mudie's Library in the Vizetelly case has attracted so little notice. Surely it is against the public interest. Mudie's will now have to start a corps of censors, and books which the public ought to read will be rejected by the Library because of references to living persons which are doubtful in their significance. Besides, on this new principle, where is responsibility for the circulation of a book to stop? How many people "handle" a book before it reaches the public? Wholesale distributing agents, Her Majesty's mails, wholesale carriers, retail booksellers, &c. Is an action for libel to lie against all these? I represent in my family an unbroken subscription of over forty years to Mudie's, and feel that they are good servants of the reading public, who ought not to be hampered in the way they bid fair to be.—I am, &c.,

Our Weekly Prize Competitions.

Result of No. 28 (New Series).

WE offered a prize last week for the best suggestion, within the limits of 200 words, of a subject for an historical novel. Apparently the task was too heavy, for very few readers have competed. The best suggestion is, we think, the following, contributed by Miss Grace Stebbing, West Dene, Most Croft-road, Eastbourne:

Why has no historical novel ever been woven around that wonderful Prince Henry of the fifteenth century, fifth son of John I., of Portugal?

Could more fascinating hero of romance be found than the young governor of the just-conquered military post, ardent student, prophetic learner, and, uncommon combination, philosophical mathematician with practical mind?

Britons, for gratitude, owe tribute to the memory of this prince-scholar. Many beloved invalids have been restored to health, many precious lives prolonged by the discovery of Madeira—discovery primarily owing to his determination and intuitive knowledge of what existed in the mysteries of the unknown seas.

As for the festively inclined, what thanks don't they owe the wonderful sun-fed grapes of Madeira! What a picture might be the famished sailor's first feast on the lovely island which they had just named from its wealth of building wood.

For a touch of comedy comes his captain's discovery of Porto Santo, and letting loose thereon one solitary rabbit and her babies, which in two years had so multiplied as to eat their home into a desert, which, strangely enough, was the dowry of Columbus's first wife about fifty years later.

Other suggestions include these:

THE MODERN PATRIOT.

A youth burning to serve his country, becomes absorbed in the problem of life presented by the masses. He is sent to South Africa on a search for health. He finds it and wealth. There he sees a way to realise his dreams—in a vast region holding illimitable possibilities as a British possession. With indomitable courage and energy he pursues his object.

He meets and becomes deeply attached to the high-souled, ill-fated hero of Khartoum, who is the one man that perceives the best in him. Inclined to follow his hero to Khartoum, he yet sticks to his guns in Africa, feeling his mission lies there; and also (perhaps) because of a secret, but hopeless, attachment to his hero's sister, which he would overcome.

Sheer force of character, with a singleness of purpose that brings all his powers to bear on the one issue, carries him through with eminent success, but not without jealous envy, and aspersions on his character as a money-grubber.

The mistake of the Raid brings enmity swarming upon him. His adherents are the more enthusiastic. Undaunted by frustrations and disappointment, he still pushes on his work. He rescues a despairing lad from gambling away his life, and shakes him up to better things.

Then war intervenes to carry out his designs. In the siege of his beloved Kimberley the real heart of the man shows itself to all. The lad, hit by a chance shot, dying, confesses his name a false one, and begs him to convey his few treasures to his mother—the love of his early life.

THE FORLORN HOPE.

Pietrus Joubert, Boer, orphaned in childhood, inheriting from Huguenot ancestors higher instincts, finer feelings than those around him, poverty and hardships, endured as a matter of course by helpless ignorance, arouse his sympathies. He determines to rise, to show them a higher life than the mere wresting subsistence from Nature with little regard for humanity.

He seizes opportunities, but honour often prevents him from pushing his advantage. Generally more or less misunderstood, he is regarded watchfully, suspiciously.

Acting-President in Burger's absence fires his mind with the idea that here lies the way of usefulness. He contests the Presidency with his friend Kruger, is juggled out of his majority—as he may have lost his bride, owing to his rival's superior riches.

Krugerites influence opinion against him as a progressionist desiring unwished, and unneeded reforms; as a friend to the hated Englishman—his visit to England later, a supposed proof.

Accusations of treachery after the Raid nearly break his heart. Then, only, he becomes aware of Kruger's jealousy, and the prevailing feeling.

His opposition to the war goes against him; but his conduct of it is trusted in. Misfortunes follow and oppress him. Cronje's surrender forbodes the end. He succumbs to Death with a broken-hearted sense of his life's failure. Then his loss is deplored, and his character appreciated.

[A. C., London.]

THE ROMANCE OF THOMAS WENTWORTH, EARL OF STRAFFORD AND LUCY, LADY CARLISLE.

The exciting events of the time form an excellent framework for a study of the celebrated characters who made history by the force of their own personalities. The group of popular leaders, headed by Pym and Hampden, once Wentworth's intimates, becoming his mortal foes, who hound him to death; his own complex character urging him, by a mixture of ambition and unselfish devotion to Charles, to adopt a policy that has made his name execrated; the vacillating King, persistently thwarting till he ruined the man he loved, and stooping to accept the supreme sacrifice of his death; Henrietta Maria, mischievous and intriguing, trying to win over Strafford's enemies by midnight and backstair conferences; Lady Carlisle, beautiful, witty, and gay, courted equally by Voltaire and by Land, accused of every moral baseness, but using her utmost finesse to save the man she truly loved—these are the actors in the swiftly moving tragedy that brought Wentworth to the scaffold, where, noble and dauntless, never reproaching the master who abandoned him, he died with a courage worthy of a better cause. Here is material for a dramatic and touching story.

[M. C. B., Ascot.]

THE BRIDGE-BUILDERS OF THE MIDDLE AGES.

E.g., London Bridge, commenced 1176 on site of old wooden structure, and completed by the French priest-engineer Isambert, 1209. Charter of engagement given by King John, though probably thus thwarting English feeling, the masons of the country being noted for their powers in throwing arches.

It is an early instance of an almost national undertaking, lists of donors in all parts of the country showing that the public spirit was stirred by the endeavour to serve and beautify London.

Or, the Order of the Pontife or engineer-monks of the twelfth century, whose bridge-building and roadmaking were great aids to the progress of civilised intercourse.

Or, the building of Bow Bridge by order of Queen Mathilda (who, it is suggested, was wetted in crossing the ford); the maintenance and repair undertaken later by the Abbess of Barking, and by her handed on to the later monastery. The abbot permitted a house to be built and the charge of the bridge to devolve on the tenant, who levied taxes on passers-by, except the nobility!

This would be a romance of work, not of fighting, and claims a Kipling or a Stevenson. The curious hero of the present historical novel, who has five sore wounds, but recovers from them after a meal of bread and burgundy sufficiently to ride thirty miles, would be absent. There need be no absence of love-interest, however the race of engineers and masons still continues.

Competition No. 29 (New Series).

ON page 296 of this number of the ACADEMY will be found a letter from Mr. Arnold White, pointing out the necessity for a word to cover all Greater Britons, and not only Greater Britons but also Irishmen. "Colonial," he points out, is too local, and "Britisher" excludes the Irish. We offer a prize of a guinea for the best suggestion.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, April 10. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the first column of p. 300, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

OUR SPECIAL PRIZE COMPETITION.

The following were received up till the date of the closing of the competition on March 31. The names of the prize winners will be announced in our issue of April 28: Josefa, Perseverentia, Nix, Ultimo, Ruppedito, Rusby, Leonard Eliot, Peter Wynsel, Dick Whittington, Persevero Magda, Y. A. ## New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

DOCTRINE AND DOCTRINAL DISRUPTION.

BY W. H. MALLOCK.

We refer elsewhere to this book, of which the following is the last sentence: "The aim of the present volume has been no more than this—to show the Protestant, and especially the Anglican Protestant, of to-day, bewildered by doubts and difficulties, that if this voice of the organic [Catholic] Church be illusory, all doctrinal Christianity—the miracle of Christ's birth and death, the miracle of the Resurrection and the Atonement, regarded as objective truths, are equally illusory also." (Black. 6s.)

ON THE EVE OF THE WAR. BY EVELYN CECIL, M.P.

This is the narrative of a journey in the Transvaal last autumn, in which the author met and conversed with Presidents Kruger and Steyn, Mr. Schreiner, and other influential men. He endeavours to state political aspects of the crisis as they existed, or were thought to exist, on the eve of the conflict. (Murray.)

MRS. DELANY (MARY GRANVILLE):
A MEMOIR, 1700-1788.

COMPILED BY GEORGE PASTON.

This is a useful abridgment of the voluminous Autobiography and Correspondence of Mrs. Delany, published in six volumes in 1861-62 at five pounds the set. Some unpublished letters have been drawn upon by the present editor. (Grant Richards.)

FIRST AND LAST POEMS.

BY ARABELLA SHORE.

A note on this book will be found in our Bibliographical column. (Grant Richards. 5s. net.)

HINTS ON THE CONDUCT OF BUSINESS,

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE.

BY SIR COURTENAY BOYLE.

"The active man riseth not so much by his strength as the expert by his stirrups," is the motto of this volume of business maxims by the Secretary of the Board of Trade. The sixteen chapters deal with such subjects as the Opening and Closing of Letters, Notes, Labour-Saving Appliances, The Use of Experts, Compilation of Reports, Interviews, Deputations, &c., &c. (Macmillan. 3s. 6d.)

A BRIEF HISTORY OF EASTERN ASIA.

BY J. C. HANNAH.

By Eastern Asia Mr. Hannah means all Asia except Persia, Mesopotamia, Arabia, Syria, and Asia Minor. The book has a useful relation to many political problems of the present day, dealing as it does with such great historical processes as "The Russian Conquest of Siberia," "The War between English and French in India," "The Opening of Japan and its Results," &c., &c. (Unwin. 7s. 6d.)

In addition to the foregoing, we have received:

CHATTO &amp; WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS

THE UNCHANGING EAST. By

ROBERT BARR With Frontispiece. Cr. 8vo, cloth, 6s.
"A brisk and cheerfully written volume of experiences of travel in Egypt, Tripoli, the Holy Land, &c.... A happy lack of dates and geographical information will not be resented by the desultory reader."—Outlook.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

ANDROMEDA: an Idyll of the Great River. By ROBERT BUCHANAN, Author of "The Shadow of the Sword."

"Mr. Buchanan has clearly drawn upon his own early experiences in London for much of the incidental matter in this story. 'Andromeda' is a strange tale rendered still stranger by the singular beauty of the girl.... The story as a whole is excellent."—Glasgow Herald.

"It is vigorously written; it is set in picturesque scenes; it tells a romantic story, and it describes an attractive heroine. .... A very readable and a very sympathetic story. It is certainly one of the best which Mr. Buchanan has given us for quite a long time."—Echo.
"In creating the shaggy sailor savage, Matt Watson, Mr. Buchanan has been forcible and clever; that much abused word 'powerful' is excusable in this case. .... Altogether the book is good reading."—Poll Mall Gazette.
"It is well constructed, well written, and readable, and will find, we may be sure, a very considerable public."—Globe.

THE SON of the HOUSE. By

BERTHA THOMAS, Author of "The Violin Player."
"A pleasant domestic story, such as the author has more than once shown that she can write, and her readers will not fail to be charmed by it. Its stronger passages bear fresh witness to her power of developing character, and working out a situation on convincing lines."—Athenaeum.

A SECRET of the NORTH SEA.

By ALGERNON GISSING.
"Of engrossing interest.... A story pulsating with life, full of energy and action, and abounding in instances of literary skill and finish."—Poll Mall Gazette.
"A strong and picturesque story.... A powerful piece of work."—Standard.

SOUR GRAPES: a Romance. By

J. F. CORNISH.
"Susceptible male readers will have difficulty in deciding whether kittenish Ruby Braabrooke or true-hearted Barbara Ashleigh is the more winsome."—Scotsman.
"An absorbing story, the remarkable plot of which is unfolded in a style at once vigorous and polished. The book will be read with interest by all who can appreciate a good story well told."—Studio.

THREE-AND-SIXPENNY STORIES.

A YOUNG DRAGON. By Sarah Tytler, Author of "Mrs. Carmichael's Goddesses." [April 23.]

AINSLIE'S JU-JU: a Romance of the Hinterland. By HAROLD BINDLOSS, Author of "In the Niger Country."

WITHOUT the LIMELIGHT: Theatrical Life as it is. By GEORGE R. SIMS.

"The stories are powerful, and though 'Dagonet' is a jester, his jesting is often akin to tears."—Weekly Sun.
"A very graphic picture.... The fact that the book is here and there autobiographical will add to its attraction for the public."—Globe.

MADAME IZAN. By Mrs. Campbell

PRÆD, Author of "Nulma."
"A bright, bizarre novel, suffused by Eastern colour."—Academy.

MISS BALMAINE'S PAST. By B. M.

AN INVALUABLE WORK OF REFERENCE

UNIFORM WITH

NUTTALL'S STANDARD DICTIONARY

(Now in its Six Hundred and Twenty-first Thousand).

THE NUTTALL ENCYCLOPÆDIA.

Being a Concise and Comprehensive Dictionary of General Knowledge.

EDITED BY THE

REV. JAMES WOOD,

Editor of "Nuttall's Standard Dictionary," and Compiler of the "Dictionary of Quotations."

It is Issued in Four Styles. Large crown 8vo.

1. In cloth gilt, strongly bound ... price 3s. 6d.
2. In half-morocco, marbled edges ... 5s. 0d.
3. In half-morocco, gilt top, with patent Index ... 6s. 0d.
4. In half-calf, extra marbled edges ... 7s. 6d.

THE publishers of "The Nuttall Encyclopædia" believe that with the enormous spread of education amongst all classes there exists a large demand for a popular Encyclopædia of General Information, in a single volume, handy of reference, and at a price within the reach of all—in fact a work which can be constantly turned to for information in a concise form on matters of daily intercourse, but foreign in the main to the class of topical and necessarily ephemeral matter prepared for the public by the important annuals and almanacs; and the work herewith announced has been expressly compiled to meet this demand.

THE DISTINCTIVE POINTS ARE:—

1. Its Cheapness.—The cloth style costs 3s. 6d. for a volume containing 700 pages, closely, but very clearly printed, with upwards of 16,000 terse articles, an exceptional number of references of encyclopædic character, and ones which place the practical utility of the work on a scale far above its one-volume rivals, and enables it to compare favourably in usefulness with vast treasure-houses of information, such as the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

2. The Value of its Contents.—In the Rev. James Wood, the Editor of "Nuttall's Standard Dictionary," the Publishers have had the services of an Editor whose skill and experience have enabled him, first, to select what particulars ought to be given under each reference; and, second, to present the facts in a style at once clear and concise. He has, therefore, been able to give within a small compass the gist of information which could only be obtained after extensive literary research; and for most purposes for which reference is usually made to an Encyclopædia the information given here will, it is believed, be found sufficient.

3. Its Handiness and Readiness of Reference.—Under one alphabetical arrangement its short pithy articles will yield at a glance, on numberless occasions, the information likely to be sought for.

"The Nuttall Encyclopædia" is an attempt to combine in one compact volume information on nearly all the subjects discussed in larger ones. Especially such as come under the categories of HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, GEOGRAPHY, RELIGION, SCIENCE and ART, and relate to LITERATURE, PHILOSOPHY, POLITICS, &c., particularly in connection with the names of the eminent men who have contributed to these.

4. Its Special Features.—Some special features not usually found in an Encyclopædia have been added, notably notices of eminent men still living, and entries explanatory of names in Fiction; all, however, under the single alphabetical arrangement.

While it is hoped that "The Nuttall Encyclopædia" will be found by all classes a valuable and necessary book of reference, its price and scope should commend it especially to

The careful Newspaper Reader;

Heads of Families, with children at school, whose persistent questions have often to go without an answer;

The Schoolmaster and Tutor;

The Student with a shallow purse;

The Busy Man and Man of Business.

This Work can be obtained at all Booksellers' in the United Kingdom and Colonies. Full Prospectus on Application.

"It is marked by three characteristics, which, indeed, may be regarded as now indispensable to any scientific work of value—perfect lucidity in the illustrations, which are numerous and, of course, specially drawn by, or under the direction of, the author; a careful exposition of the historical development of life-forms; and complete bibliographies on each branch of the subject."—Literature.

NOW READY.—Demy 8vo, cloth, price 12s. 6d. net.

SEXUAL DIMORPHISM IN THE ANIMAL KINGDOM.

A Theory of the Evolution of Secondary Sexual Characters.

By J. T. CUNNINGHAM, M.A.

Containing 32 Illustrations.

"Mr. Cunningham has elaborated a theory of evolution in answer to the problem: What are the causes which have produced the three kinds of structural difference in animals? He supports his theory by facts and illustrations drawn mainly from the works of others. A book of distinct scientific importance. The present volume is well printed, and profusely illustrated with carefully executed figures."—The Outlook.

"It stands out from the ever-increasing crowd of guides, text-books, and manuals, in virtue not only of originality of design, but also of the fact that the subjects treated have been specially investigated for the purpose of the book, so that we have not the mere compilation of a book-man but an account based on the results of the author's own observation."—Natural Science.

The Literary Week.

THE Bill just promoted by the Trustees of the British Museum has excited considerable surprise. It is a Bill to enable the Trustees "to deposit copies of local newspapers with local authorities, and to dispose of valueless printed matter." The first proposal arises out of the immense and continuous accumulation of newspapers at the Museum. It is desired to relieve the pressure on the Museum's space by placing under the custody of local bodies all newspapers published since 1837. But surely it is within the dates 1837—1900, &c., that research is most frequent. And the prospect of having to go to Eatanswill to consult the Eatanswill Gazette is not alluring to students. We should have thought the remedy was to pull down the old barns and build greater. In the other matter we sympathise with the Trustees. What they account rubbish is probably rubbish; it is their business to know, and Trustees should be trusted within wide limits.

MRS. CRAIGIE'S new comedy in three acts, "The Wisdom of the Wise," will follow Mr. Grundy's play at the St. James's Theatre, according to present arrangements. "A Repentance" is to be performed at the Empire Theatre, New York, this month. Miss Rahn, who made a great success as Ursyne in "Osbern and Ursyne" at the Empire Theatre, has been engaged as leading lady by Mr. Richard Mansfield.

MR. STEPHEN CRANE, we regret to hear, is lying seriously ill at the mediæval house in Sussex, Brede Place, where he has been living for the past two years.

"MR. C." is the title of an eight-page pamphlet, we have received, calling itself "An Appendix to Dictionary of National Biography, Volume 62." The use of the word appendix by anyone but Messrs. Smith Elder seems a trifle bold. We find that the pamphlet deals with the Woodfalls and Sir Philip Francis; it is for students of the "Junius" controversy.

MR. GEORGE MOORE contributes to the North American Review a characteristic paper on "Some Characteristics of English Fiction." His present whim is to distinguish the great from the small in literature, by asking himself if a story is symbolic; "if it be a symbol, that is to say, if it be the outward sign of a moral idea." Turning to women, Mr. Moore finds that it would be as vain to seek a symbolic novel among women as to seek a religion. He will not even allow it in George Eliot, "who tried to think like a man, and produced admirable counterfeits of his thoughts in wax-work. So far her novels may be said to be symbolical." Mr. Moore utters many other curious things a little wearily, for the world is very inattentive, and concludes with a prophecy: "I stop without having said all. England has produced the richest poetical literature in the world, and in Shakespeare, in Milton, in Shelley, in Wordsworth she will find her true immortality. Her Empire will pass away and be forgotten like the Babylonian and the Persian, for the heart only remembers ideas and dreams."

OUR competition last week for the best suggestion of a subject for an historical novel may well have caused a momentary lifting of the brows to historical novelists. It is not pleasant to find the very subject suggested on which you have been working for months. Thus, apropos of "M. C. B.'s" suggestion for a historical novel on the subject of "The Romance of Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford, and Lucy, Lady Carlisle," Mr. Frank Matthew writes: "I have been at work upon a romance based on the fall of Strafford for some months. I don't want to seem guilty of priggishness someone else's idea, and if you would mention this in your columns I would be grateful."

THE Daily Graphic has published and sold in London streets the Ladysmith Lyre. We hope our contemporary will do a similar service for the Friend, the paper edited by the war correspondents at Bloemfontein. A recent issue contained "A First Impression," by Dr. Conan Doyle, a little article which thrills because it narrates the thing worth seeing by the man who can see. We are indebted to the Daily Mail for the portions we quote. Dr. Doyle begins: "It was only General Smith-Dorrien's Brigade, but if it could have passed, just as it it was, down Piccadilly, it would have driven London crazy."

I watched them—ragged, bearded, fierce-eyed infantry—struggling along under a cloud of dust. Who could have conceived, who had seen the prim soldier in time of peace, that he could so quickly transform himself into this grim, virile barbarian? Bull-dog faces, hawk faces, hungry wolf faces, every sort of face except a weak one. Here and there a man smoking a pipe, here and there a man who smiled; but most have swarthy faces and lean a little forward with eyes steadfast and features impassive but resolute. Here is a clump of mounted infantry, a grizzled fellow like a fierce old eagle at the head of them. Some are maned like lions, some have young, keen faces, but all leave an impression of familiarity upon me; yet I have not seen Irregular British Cavalry before. Why should it be so familiar to me, this loose-limbed, head-erect, swaggering type? Of course! I have seen it in an American cowboy over and over again. Strange that a few months on the veldt should have produced exactly the same man as springs from the western prairie!

But these men are warriors amid war. Their eyes are hard and quick. They have a gaunt, intent look, like men who live always under a show of danger.

In another column we give, by permission of the London manager of McClure's Magazine, some extracts from a chapter in the forthcoming biography of Prof. Huxley by Mr. Leonard Huxley. These letters show how, from the first, width and proportion marked Huxley's life. He studied, but he lived. He could leave his medusæ and crayfish, and be, in matters of faith and conduct, a fisher of men. Loving to seek out the beginnings of life, he did not miss the love of Woman, in whom all beginning is statued and exalted. When he lifted his eyes from an almost protoplasmic cell, he could still see life steady and whole. That he should have designed so to live is not remarkable, for youth is generous; it is more noteworthy that he lived so to the end, thoroughly warming his hands at the fire of life.

THE "Foreword" to the English translation of Gerhart Hauptmann's fairy play, "The Sunken Bell," is by an American writer, Charles Henry Metzler, who describes Hauptmann's appearance when he visited America some years ago.

Instead of the aggressive, self-confident man I had fancied him, I saw a student—almost an ascetic. His boyish air and shrinking gravity were curiously at variance with the great will-power betokened by his set though tortured lips and the experience in his pale and weary eyes. He had a smooth face; a high forehead, crowned with short and careless hair; a well-shaped, sensitive nose. If I had passed him in the street I might have set him down as a perfervid young curate, or a seminarist. A painful, introspective, haunted earnestness was stamped upon his face—the face of a thinker, a dreamer, a genius.

Hauptmann is now thirty-six. His first play, written under the spell of Tolstoy, was "Vor Sonnenaufgang," produced eleven years ago at the Berlin Lessing Theatre. Each play that he produced raised a controversy noisy with admiration and derision. But in "Lonely Lives" his art became more delicate, in "The Weavers" more emboldened and commanding. "Hannele" and "Florian Geyer" followed. The last play was to have been part of a dramatic trilogy dealing with the Reformation, but its failure put an end to the plan. In "The Sunken Bell" we have a fairy tale into which we are invited to read almost what we will. Its symbolism will fit æsthetic, moral, social, and religious interpretations. Mr. Metzler gives his own ideas of what Hauptmann means, but the reader will be wise to ignore these until he has read the play in a receptive spirit. The translation is "free," and is in verse.

MR. W. G. COLLINGWOOD has recast his Life and Work of John Ruskin (1893), and it is now issued in one volume, under the title The Life of John Ruskin. There have been added new biographical details and a number of letters hitherto unprinted, while the story of Ruskin's life has been brought to a close in a final chapter. In this chapter Mr. Collingwood relates that in his last days Ruskin would pore over, and drowse over, his pet books by the hour. One of these was A Fleet in Being, lent to him by a little boy. "He read and re-read it; then got a copy for himself, and might have learnt it by heart, so long he pored over it."

CANON RAWNSLEY proposes to place on the brow of Friars Crag a memorial, in the form of an early British cross, to John Ruskin. The site has been selected because it was the place that made the first deep impression of the beauty of nature upon his mind. "The first thing," wrote Ruskin, "which I remember as an event in life was being taken by my nurse to the brow of Friars Crag, on Derwentwater." Subscriptions should be sent to Canon Rawnsley, Crosthwaite Vicarage, Keswick.

VISITORS to Nîmes will soon be able to pay their respects to a statue of Alphonse Daudet which is about to be placed in the Square de la Couronne, with considerable pomp, though without any contributory recognition from the French Academy. The sculptor, M. Falguières, has evidently been a good deal inspired by M. Léon Daudet's fine book about his father, for he has represented the author in his latter years, with his fine head poised in meditation. It is, of course, as "l'homme du Midi," as the author of Tartarin de Tarascon and Numa Roumestan, and as the analyst and eulogist of southern character, that Daudet is to be acclaimed and enthroned at Nîmes. Daudet had a keen sense of place and climate, and their influence on temperament and character. He used to say that every country had its "north" and "south," with their psychological differences; and he loved those authors who made much of their native air, and allowed it to invigorate and influence their work. He would talk like this to his son:

When a young man, be he boastful or timid, comes to see me with his little volume in his hand, I say to him: "What is your country?"—"It is so and so, Monsieur." "Is it long since you left your home and the old people?"—"So long." "Shall you go back?"—"I don't know." "Why not at once, now that you have tasted Paris? Are they poor?"—"Oh, no, Monsieur, in easy circumstances." "Then fly to them, unhappy youth. I see you undecided, young, impressionable. I don't believe you really have in you that Balzacian energy that boils and ferments under its attic roof. Listen to my advice, you'll thank me for it later. Go back to the fold. Make yourself a solitude in a corner of the mansion or the farm. Explore your memory. The recollections of childhood are the bright and unpoisoned spring of all masterly creative power that you possess. There is another reason you must see; you have time. Make all about you—the farmers, the sportsmen, the girls, the old men, the vagabonds—talk with you. Let all that focus again! And, if you have talent, you will write a personal book, with your mark on it, that will interest your own people first, and the public too, if you chance to get hold of a well constructed plot."

Daudet's advice would surely fit the cases of a great many young writers who have come to London to write novels on stock subjects, leaving their liveliest inspirations behind them. But Léon Daudet recognised the hopelessness of such advice, and so do we.

MR. ALFRED AUSTIN has taken the opportunity of the Queen's visit to Ireland to reprint some travel impressions on Ireland, which he contributed in two papers to Blackwood's Magazine a few years ago. To these Mr. Austin appends a poem written at Dugort, in the Island of Achill, in 1895. We quote the last stanza of the poet's counsel to Erin:

Live your own life, but ever at our side!
Have your own Heaven, but blend your prayer with ours!
Remain your own fair self, to bridegroom bride,
Veiled in your mist and diamonded with showers,
We twain love-linked whom nothing can divide!
Look up! From Slievemore's brow to Dingle's shore,
From Inagh's lake to Innisfallen's Isle
And Garriff's glen, the land is one green smile!
The dolphins gambol and the laverocks soar:
Lift up your heart and live, enthralled to grief no more!

COMPARISONS between Dickens and Thackeray always seem peculiarly profitless, and we are sorry to see that Mr. W. J. Dawson insists on extolling Dickens at the expense of his great contemporary in the Young Man, a paper in which criticism has a kind of instructional weight with its readers. That Dickens "much excels" Thackeray as a creator of character is strange doctrine. If for creator Mr. Dawson had written "recorder" or "collector" we should not have complained; but Mr. Dawson actually goes on to ask: "Indeed, whom is there that Dickens does not excel?" Which has the merit of closing the discussion so far as we are concerned. We are glad that Mr. Dawson draws his readers' attention to Mark Rutherford with the just remark: "He has the secret of a certain sad fortitude of spirit, and knows how to impart it."

"W. F. W.," whose "Notes About" are such a pleasant weekly feature of the Pall Mall Gazette, tells the world about the difficulty he had to obtain an inexpensive Bible containing the Apocrypha. His experiences seem to have been similar to those which were detailed in the Academy by another searcher nearly two years ago. It may be remembered that the nearest contact with a copy of the Apocrypha which our contributor gained was in a second-hand bookshop in the Brompton-road, where the bookseller's only copy had just gone to "a gentleman at Cricklewood." "W. F. W." was more fortunate. The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge supplied him with a copy of the Apocrypha in ruby 32mo (to match a sixpenny Bible) for sevenpence. Even this copy had no title-page, but, instead, an "apologetic-looking extract from Article 6." The British and Foreign Bible Society, it seems, refuses to print the Apocrypha at all. As "W. F. W." says: "Benefactors do not approve of these Apocryphal utterances; and practical considerations must naturally prevail at 146, Queen Victoria-street." However, it seems that the rarity of the Apocrypha is itself apocryphal. Mr. Henry Frowde states that some fifty editions of Oxford Bibles contain it; and the Apocrypha alone, bound in leather, and with a proper title-page, is issued by Mr. Frowde in eight different sizes.

MORE than one literary gossipier has remarked a certain incongruity in the newspapers between the stern tidings of the war and the trifles of criticism and book talk. Mr. Edmund Gosse reconciled the two elements very happily in the verses which he read at the dinner of the Omar Khayyám Club last Thursday evening. They were as follows:

While Zál and Rustum drew their thunderous line
Across the rolling veldts that shift and shine,
Or marching down the long sun-bitten road,
Went wheeling round Rhinocerosfontein,—

We, laagered safe from all our shadowy foes,
Performed our rites and waved the double rose,
Feasted in innocently Persian mode,
And told each other—what the master knows.

In peace we drank; yet never might forget
With what rare wine the wilderness was wet,
What vintage, poured for us, the withering grass
Holds to our glory and eternal debt.

Nor will forget. Yet are we folk of peace,
We long to hear the ringing warfare cease,
And o'er our feast a purpler flush will pass
When Zál comes home with Rustum from the seas.

REFERRING to the retirement of Dr. Sewell from the wardenship of New College, the Queen makes a curious slip. It says: "It is hard to believe that any man is still alive who has seen Dr. Johnson working in the Bodleian Library at Oxford. But Dr. J. Sewell, the venerable warden of New College, has done so." This is, of course, wrong. Dr. Johnson died in 1784! Probably the Queen writer had too hastily read our own paragraph, which stated that Dr. Sewell was said to be the only man in Oxford who had spoken to men who had seen Dr. Johnson in the famous library—a very different matter.

CONCERNING our recent suggestion that a book on the war by Mr. Charles Hands would probably be good reading, a writer in Country Life says: "Mr. Hands has as many admirers as he has acquaintances, for he is one of the most charming little men living; but if he were to write a book the only question is whether his friends would be more delighted or more surprised. He has always served his newspaper nobly, particularly in Cuba; but a laughing philosophy is second nature to him, and, knowing him very well, I simply cannot picture to myself Charles Hands sitting down to write a long book. If he did it would be a fountain of humour and of shrewdness, and facts would never be permitted to hamper him for a moment."

WE have received the second and third series of the Illustrated Topographical Record of London issued by the London Topographical Society; and we regret to find that the third series is somewhat attenuated owing to want of funds and that a different mode of publication is likely to be necessitated in future. This invaluable Record is too little known. Let us state, then, that the London Topographical Society has for years employed Mr. J. P. Emslie to make careful drawings of the exteriors and interiors of interesting London buildings before their demolition. In all about fifty such drawings have been issued in the three neat paper-cover books now before us, and to the drawings have been added interesting architectural and historical notes by Mr. Emslie and Mr. Philip Norman. Thus, in the second and third series, we have Mr. Emslie's accurate records of Fore-street as it was in 1880, when it still suggested the street in which Daniel Defoe was born; of No. 16, Fetter-lane, a reputed home of Dryden, pulled down in 1887; and of the north end of High-street, St. Giles's, before the formation of the Charing Cross-road; &c. In the third series are drawings of old houses in Aldersgate-street, remains of the old "Hummums" Hotel, Covent Garden, &c. We are glad to learn that though the separate publication of these records is likely to cease Mr. Emslie's drawings will in future embellish the Society's Year Book.

BESIDES their illustrated "Record" of topographical changes and demolished buildings in London, the work of the London Topographical Society embraces the reproduction of maps and views in facsimile, the design being to form a chronological series from the earliest extant maps to recent times. Lord Rosebery is the president of the society, Lord Welby is its vice-president, there is an influential council, and the Society conducts its operations in its own offices at 16, Clifford's-inn, where the works already issued may be inspected. Their most recent undertaking is the reproduction of a panoramic picture of the highway from Hyde-park Corner to Addison-road, made by the surveyor of the Kensington Turnpike Trustees in 1811. The drawing is, of course, a survey, but the elevations on the north side are given for the whole distance, and these compose a charming panorama of the highway as it was in the days of stage-coaches. The previous issues of the society include Van den Wyngaerde's View of London, a facsimile of the original drawing made in the middle of the sixteenth century, now in the Bodleian Library at Oxford. Visscher's View of London in 1616, Porter's Map of London and Westminster taken shortly before the Great Fire, may also be mentioned, and there are others no less interesting.

A PHRASE there is that needs correction. We read in a contemporary that the late Mr. Archibald Forbes "wore out prematurely his cast-iron constitution." We should have thought that the constitution which enabled Mr. Forbes to perform such extraordinary feats as his 110 miles' gallop from Ulundi, or his not less amazing feats of endurance at Plevna, and which never broke down but merely "wore out," had little in common with cast iron, which, as every housewife knows, is brittle to a fault. A "wrought iron" constitution would be the right description, in terms of iron. Yet the other epithet is almost always chosen in such cases.

SEVERAL correspondents have written asking whether the acknowledgments of Special Competitions which we printed last week covered all that we had received from the first. No; they were merely the last instalment. The essays, poems, &c., received by us number many hundreds.

VERY recently a contemporary allowed a correspondent to ask, "Does Anyone Read Shakespeare?" We are able to state that Messrs. Snowdon, Sons & Co., of Millwall, London, E., read the Plays with some diligence. They have issued the Swan's own testimony to the merits of their Snowdrift Lubricant for Engineers. We cannot quote the whole of the ingenious list of quotations of which the initial letters, when read down the page, give the legend, "Engineers Will Find Snowdrift Lubricant Always Best," but we will quote part of it:

S mooth as oil!

WE have received an anonymous contribution of a harrowing character, entitled "The Return of the Spring: an Author's Lament." It is interesting, and very well written; indeed, the author of such a composition has little reason to lament on the score of his literary ability. Nor do his private troubles seem to us to be incurable; his confession is sown with "cannots" which we simply "cannot" accept. We give him this intimation that his article is too long for us to use, and that it will lie at this office until he claims it. A shorter and more inspiring contribution from his pen would have our consideration.

Bibliographical.

"I FIND that in Moore's Diary," writes a well-known journalist—for all the world as if he had never read that work till now, which one can hardly believe to be the case—"he speaks of Sydney Smith imitating, among the various forms of hand-shaking to be met with in society, 'the high official, the Archbishop of York's, who carries your hand aloft on a level with his forehead.'" Moore, of course, is an authority on what he saw and heard; but I prefer, in this case, that of Lady Holland, who, in her memoirs of her father (1855, Vol. I., p. 403), prints a little speech on hand-shaking which (she says) Sydney Smith addressed to a young lady, beginning: "There is nothing more characteristic than shakes of the hand. I have classified them. There is the high official—the body erect, and a rapid, short shake, near the chin"—and so forth. This latter version is much better than Moore's; and I fancy the whole passage is to be found repeated in the slender volume called Wit and Wisdom of Sydney Smith, which was published some sixteen years ago, and which I can heartily recommend to the attention of my brother scribe.

In writing last week about Miss Arabella Shore, I forgot to mention that she describes herself, on the title-page of her First and Last Poems, just issued, as "editor of the Journal of Emily Shore." So far as I know, this is the first public announcement of the interesting fact. If I remember rightly, Miss Emily Shore's Journal was published in 1891 without any editor's name. The preliminary information, indeed, was rather meagre, and the Journal, very rightly, was allowed to stand on its own merits. Unquestionably Miss Emily Shore was not the least notable member of a notable family. She died, I think, in her teens, of consumption; but her Journal shows that she had considerable mental and spiritual gifts, and that, if she had had a longer life, she might have left behind her some solid literary achievement. Meanwhile the Journal itself will no doubt have the effect of keeping her memory green, at any rate among those who have leisure and liking for research in the bye-ways of book-land.

Yet another variant on the epigram which I quoted the other day from Bishop Walsham How's Lighter Moments: Says the Rev. John J. Poynter, writing from Oswestry: "I vividly remember yet another version of the lines—more picturesque, too, and vigorous in some ways—being read to us students in sermon class assembled:

My daughters praise our curate's eyes;
 I cannot see their light divine;
 For when he prays he closes his,
 And when he preaches I close mine.

They were from the Spectator of that week—somewhere, probably, in March 1877." That is all very well; but George Outram's Legal Lyrics, &c., were printed—privately—so long ago as 1851, and any claim to the epigram I quoted from that volume must at least be dated prior to that year, or it is of none effect. I still think that the lines as printed in the Lyrics (latest edition, I believe, 1888) are more satisfactory than any of the versions supplied by my kind correspondents.

Not so very long ago there was produced in London a little one-act play called "Dr. Johnson," in which, if my memory serves me, not only the great lexicographer, but also the faithful Boswell, was among the personæ. The desire to portray "littery gents" upon the stage appears to be spreading. The Daily News has drawn our attention to a current American piece, by a reputable playwright, in which Oliver Goldsmith (poor man!) is the title-character, and in which his legendary love for Miss Horneck is exploited for all (or more than) it is worth. It is, however, only fair to remember that, so far as Goldie is concerned, the Yankees are not the first sinners in this respect. Just two years ago there was performed at a London theatre a "curtain-raiser" entitled "The Rescue of Oliver Goldsmith," in which, by the way, Dr. Johnson once more figured. This had been preceded, by half-a-dozen years, by a little one-act drama (played in the country), for which Mr. F. Frankfort Moore was responsible—a dramatic trifle, named (in simplest fashion) "Oliver Goldsmith." There is, however, no limit to the boldness of these playmakers. Did not Charles Reade introduce into his "Masks and Faces" no less a personage than Colley Cibber, his superior in stage-craft, if in nothing else?

Talking of literature and the stage, what a benefactor the latter can, on occasion, be to the former! The circulation of the dramatised novel or poem expands as if by magic. To put a story on the "boards" is to "boom" it splendidly. I take it, therefore, that there is, and has been, and will be, a great run upon the English versions of Quo Vadis, the tale by H. B. Sienkiewicz, which is to be "theatricalised" at the Adelphi under American auspices and in the provinces under Mr. Wilson Barrett. The first translation into English of Quo Vadis published in this country appears to have been that by Jeremiah Curtin, brought out in November, 1896, and then (in two volumes) in December, 1897, and again in May and July, 1898. Another version, by Messrs. S. A. Binion and S. Malevsky, appeared in April and July of last year, and is to be purchased, apparently, for the small sum of one shilling. There is a chance, therefore, of Quo Vadis becoming familiar as a story, as well as in the garb of a drama, to the English "man in the street." THE BOOKWORM.

When We Dead Awaken: a Dramatic Epilogue in Three Acts. By Henrik Ibsen. Translated by William Archer. (Heinemann. 3s. 6d.)

ART versus life—that is the theme of this strange piece, which is less a self-contained play than a disastrous and futile coda to some long-preceding dramatic action, as, indeed, the sub-title partially indicates. The principal characters are four. There are, first, Prof. Rubek, the great sculptor, and his Philistine little wife Maia, who are vainly trying to enjoy the fruits of worldly success. Rubek has made his name and fortune by his group, "The Resurrection Day," of which the central figure is "the noblest, purest, most ideal woman the world ever saw" awakening from the sleep of death. Since the completion of that masterpiece he has done nothing but portrait busts—"striking likenesses," but with something "equivocal, cryptic, lurking in and behind" them, something that the people themselves cannot see, and that Rubek alone can see. "At bottom they are all respectable, pompous horsefaces, and self-opinionated donkey-muzzles, lop-eared, low-browed dog-skulls, and fatted swine-snouts." Rubek is fundamentally dissatisfied with himself and his art; he is overset by the tedium of the world and the desolating dull companionship of Maia, to whom art is only a word. In vain he tells her that he is happy—"in a way." In the next breath, speaking in a parable, as all the characters speak, he curtly informs the poor little doll that she is "not born to be a mountaineer." And Maia, too, is restless, querulous, unhappy. She complains that Rubek has not fulfilled his original promise to "take her up to a high mountain and show her all the glory of the world"; it is in reply to this that Rubek taunts her with her inability to climb.

Such is the impasse, when the other two characters appear in the bathing-establishment where Rubek and Maia are staying. Squire Ulfheim enters with an oath, and describes himself thus: "A bear-hunter, when I have the chance, madam. But I make the best of any sort of game that comes in my way—eagles, and wolves, and women, and elks, and reindeer—if only it's fresh and juicy and has plenty of blood in it." Maia is taken with his unaffected animalism, and at his suggestion goes off to inspect his dogs; Maia has met her fate. Then comes the fourth character, "the strange lady," dressed in white and followed by a black nun. She gazes at Rubek "with vacant expressionless eyes."

RUBEK: I know you quite well, Irene.

THE LADY [in a toneless voice]: You can guess who I am, Arnold.

RUBEK [without answering]: And you recognise me too, I see.

THE LADY: That is quite another matter.

RUBEK: With me? How so?

THE LADY: Oh, you are still alive.

RUBEK [not understanding]: Alive—?

THE LADY [after a short pause]: Who was the other? The woman you had with you—there at the table?

RUBEK [a little reluctantly]: She? That was my—my wife.

THE LADY [nods slowly]: Indeed. That is well, Arnold. Some one, then, that does not concern me—

RUBEK [nods]: No, of course not—

THE LADY: One whom you have taken to you after my lifetime.

RUBEK [suddenly looking hard at her]: After you—? What do you mean by that, Irene?

Irene is mad, in some respects. Among other disorders she has homicidal mania, and the black nun keeps a strait waistcoat for her. Irene sat nude to Rubek for the statue of the young woman. As deeply as the sculptor himself Irene was absorbed in the statue; she always calls it "her child." Rubek accepted her services and co-operation, and then thanked her "for a priceless episode," and then showed her the door, her who had "renounced home and kindred" for him. Her charge against him now is three-fold. First, he put "the work of art first—after it the human being." Second, he was so passionless as to respect her honour. Third, she had to give up to him her "young living soul, and that gift left me empty within—soulless. It was that I died of, Arnold."

Rubek (after the manner of men) perceives the value of the treasure he had cast aside. He hints to Maia that he wishes to commit adultery, in order to be able to resume his artistic activity. Maia, "unconcerned," replies that she can go away if necessary, and adds: "But it won't be; for in town—in all our great house—there must surely, with a little goodwill, be room enough for three." Maia then goes off hunting with Ulfheim. Rubek proposes adultery to Irene, but Irene, "immovable," answers: "For our life there is no resurrection." Later, however, "with a wild expression in her eyes," she breaks out to him: "Will you have a summer night on the upland—with me?" And the assignation is made. But still there is no contentment.

RUBEK [repeats dreamily]: Summer night on the upland. With you: with you [His eyes met hers], oh! Irene—that might have been our life. And that we have forfeited—we two.

IRENE: We see the irretrievable only when—[breaks off short.]

RUBEK: When?

IRENE: When we dead awaken.

RUBEK [shakes his head mournfully]: What do we really see then?

IRENE: We see that we have never lived.

In the brief third act, when "dawn is breaking" on the hills, Maia, out hunting with Ulfheim, barely saves herself from the atrocious advances of that libertine; while Rubek and Irene, wending their way to the furthest upland, "through the mists and then right up to the summit of the tower that shines in the sunrise," are overwhelmed by an avalanche. The attendant black nun, unharmed, shrieks "Pax vobiscum"—this is her sole speech—and Maia's "triumphant song" of freedom sounds from below. Finis.

It is a plain, repellent tale, told with nearly all Ibsen's old masterful skill. The play would probably "act" very well. Every page is full of subtle dramatic quality, and the great scene between Rubek and Irene in Act II. is beyond the slightest doubt extremely powerful. The characters are fully realised for us. They may be exquisitely unnatural, but we see them as Ibsen meant us to see them. There is no fumbling, no uncertainty. The supreme craftsman has been at work. But what then? Is this all? Are we to pretend that we have not tried to pierce the superficialities of this sinister, abhorrent, and sterile narrative? Ibsen has more than once fretted against those who try to "read into" his work messages which he never sent. His attitude has always been: "My plays mean nothing." In the first act of the present play, when Maia urges that though the world knows nothing it can divine something, Rubek replies: "Something that isn't there at all, yes. Something that never was in my mind. Ah, yes, that they can all go into ecstasies over." We have no intention of going into ecstasies, but we do say that the reader is compelled at least to attempt "to divine something" under the factual envelope. By causing all his persons to speak in metaphors, Ibsen leaves him no alternative. The reader, like Rubek, must perforce exclaim, "sadly and earnestly": "There is something hidden behind everything you say." The whole piece is a welter of dark utterances, vague symbolisms and mysterious figures of speech. Here is an example. Rubek and Maia are talking of a railway journey by night:

RUBEK: I noticed how silent it became at all the little roadside stations. I heard the silence—like you, Maia—

MAIA: H'm! like me. Yes.

RUBEK: —and that assured me that we had crossed the frontier—that we were really at home. For the train stopped at all the little stations—although there was nothing doing at all.

MAIA: Then why did it stop—though there was nothing to be done?

RUBEK: Can't say. No one got out or in; but all the same the train stopped a long, endless time. And at every station I could make out that there were two railway men walking up and down the platform—one had a lantern in his hand—and they said things to each other in the night—low, and toneless, and meaningless.

MAIA: Yes, that is quite true. There are always two men walking up and down, and talking—

There are scores of similar passages in the play—the bramah-locked casket, the girl whose shoes were worn very thin, the wounded bird of prey, the habitation of the bears, the ships with no harpoon-men on board, the heights, the valleys, the “tight place,” and many more. It is idle to assert that these may properly mean nothing. Either they mean something, or they are absurd and constitute a needless and irritating violation of that inner realism of dialogue upon which Ibsen has always insisted. And not only episodically, but in its large outlines the play has all the semblance of a parable. The story seems always to be hiding some spiritual significance. Hence the inevitable question: What is that spiritual significance? Frankly, we do not know. More frankly, we do not believe that it exists. To read When We Dead Awaken is like beating in the dark against an agitated curtain in the vain quest of some solid figure on the other side. The curtain drops heavily back at every stroke, till at length the searcher desists, baffled and weary. If, indeed, there be aught behind the curtain, it is un bodied shapes, elusive, formless, futile.

We, as well as any, can appreciate the tremendous force which Ibsen has been, the singleness of his aim, and the greatness of his achievement. But the heat of the battle which raged round him is now cooled, and none but the most desperate fighters—in whose ears the war-cry will never cease to ring—can fail to recognise, if they will be honest, that a fine genius has passed into its period of decadence. The last four plays are fourfold proof of this. In the mere fact of decadence there should be no cause for sorrow, for it is a phenomenon of natural law. Every artist, if he lives out his life, becomes decadent; but not all in the same way. With some the decadence is tender and serene, as with Shakespeare. With others it is unquiet, hysterical, inconsequent—as though the artistic vitality, retaining its energy, had gone to sleep, and worked creatively in a feverish and amorphous dream. This is Ibsen's case. His career has been a concentration of himself upon himself, too complete to be entirely healthy. Like the Rubek whom Irene knew, he gave up life for art. It was a grand renunciation, but even renunciations have to be paid for, and Ibsen is paying for his in the manner of his decadence.

Some Mysticism and a Mystic.

An Essay in Aid of the Better Appreciation of Catholic Mysticism. Illustrated from the Writings of Blessed Angela of Foligno. By Algar Thorold. (Kegan Paul.)

WITH Mr. Thorold's aim I have every sympathy, if I rightly understand it. He aspires to ingratiate Catholic mysticism with the intelligent public; to divorce mysticism from its popular association with Mr. John Wellington Wells and the saltatory education of drawing-room tables. The motive is excellent, but it comes to mean in practice the popularisation, and I am sure that popular mysticism is an evil thing. The precise aim of Mr. Thorold's present book is to present “the constituents of mysticism,” and (it must be assumed from the title-page) to illustrate them from the writings of the Franciscan mystic, Angela da Foligno. I do not see that he has presented the constituents of mysticism. This is a pity, for he is a writer of considerable distinction as regards style. His most profound and illuminatively original points are taken from Coventry Patmore, whom he has evidently studied. Not that I impeach the general originality of his treatise. I would he had taken more; above all, Mr. Patmore's perspicuous sense of order, his pregnant condensation and concentration upon his subject. Mr. Thorold divagates with exasperating fluency upon the slightest provocation. He cannot resist a controversial opening, however far it may lure him from the matter of his professed thesis. He thinks it necessary, “incidentally and by way of illustration,” to describe “a hypothetical process of conversion, and also to suggest the sort of way in which the modern Catholic mystic may be disposed, for the sake of his own peace of mind, to meet some current objections to Catholic faith and practice.” This incidental illustration ultimately occupies the greater part of the treatise. I presume that I am more or less a “mystic,” in Mr. Thorold's loose sense of the term; but it is not for my peace of mind to pursue and criticise him through his “incidental” divagation, and divagations upon divagation. I cannot see that they are “necessary,” nor why they should absorb needful space. A controversy on “Bible Christianity,” for example—what is it doing in this galley, or will it conciliate the outsider's sympathies towards mysticism? Suasive exposition should surely be the means employed. He elaborately piles the arguments for scepticism drawn from physical science, merely to explain that the “natural mystic” will start from a quite other basis of thought. Why waste time in such elaborate entrenchments if you intend to pass them by and leave them en l'air? And again, what a far cry from the “constituents of mysticism”!

This controversial zeal leads him into rash statements. “To the man of mystical temperament, . . . and to him only, is the message of the [Catholic] Church addressed.” A tremendous limitation for a body Catholic! Or would Mr. Thorold persuade a consensus of theologians to endorse “the fact that it was the fall of Lucifer, rather than that of Adam, which for the first time introduced moral evil, with all its possible consequences, into the Creation”? This “fact” (a bold word!) sweeps away the traditional innocuousness of Eden; for Mr. Thorold means the physical Creation. Mais enfin, these constituents of mysticism? After this preparatory labour, there crawls forth (to my eyesight, at least) but one. Adopting Coventry Patmore's view, that the supreme justification of dogma is the psychological value of the truth it contains, he bases mysticism on the doctrine of the Creation. He shows (to state it briefly) that full acceptance of that doctrine implies the subjection of the whole man in his whole being to God. But this is the basis of all true Christian life, and only the basis of mysticism inasmuch as mysticism is the furthest and logical outcome, the ultimate flower, of true Christian life. It is not a specific basis. Nor does it help the reader to understand what mysticism specifically is. Yet beyond this and an historical introduction (which has its own elements of disproportion) there seems to me nothing to prepare the unaccustomed reader for the highly mystical writings of Angela da Foligno which follow—abruptly and without comment. He steps into them as from a bathing-machine—and I can fancy may gasp. Valuable for the acquainted student, they do not appear a good choice as an introduction to mysticism. They contain many “hard sayings,” and the earlier portions have much of the physical character so repellent to the outsider. Even on the average Catholic some things will come with a douche of surprise.

I am sorry to say these things, for Mr. Thorold writes well, and there is method in his long approach. But he has a crocodile unwieldiness in revolving on his own axis.

Lack of proportion crowds out or attenuates the central matter—which is surely the nature of mysticism. If he does not actually leave the rails, he is yet too fond of loop-lines.

The mystic is not (as Mr. Thorold's use of the word would seem to countenance) a student of mysticism, any more than a scientist is one who studies books on science. Not yet is he a devotee, a devout practiser of religion. Mysticism is an interior ladder, at the summit of which is God. The mystic endeavours, by a rigid practical virtue, combined with prayer, meditation, and mortification of the senses, to arrive at a closer union with the Creator. Union with God is proposed as the state of the future life, and therefore the ultimate end of the Christian. But mysticism holds that some degree of such union is possible in this life. It is the belief of Plato no less than St. John of the Cross. There is an indwelling of the Divinity in every Christian. "Know ye not that ye are a temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?" But the gradual purification of body and soul, with the turning of the whole man towards God, permits the Deity to flow in with a greater closeness, until there is finally accomplished, if not the spousal union of the next life, at any rate a betrothal union, we may say.

These are only your espousals; yes,
More intimate and fruitfuller far
Than aptest mortal nuptials are.

Such, in brief, is the theory of mysticism. Its principles are many and not in a few words to be laid down. For it is no terra incognita; from the recorded experience of mystics the whole process has been mapped out elaborately. This mystical theology, as it is called, serves, however, mainly for the instruction of directors who have to deal with such persons. The mystic himself can pursue no beaten track, no guide-book path. The way to God is through Himself, and is conditioned by His Own nature. It is alike for no two men. And it is the study of its adaptation to the personality which is so psychologically interesting in the writings of individual mystics.

The process varies indefinitely with the individual concerned. "The mystic is the religious genius," says Mr. Thorold, and there is profound truth of analogy in the saying. But that mysticism has no necessary connexion with natural genius there could not be a better proof than his chosen instance, Angela da Foligno. Her psychological interest resides largely in the fact that she was the reverse of a "genius." In the unconscious betrayal and characteristic savour of her writings, she appears obviously to be by nature a very little woman, a woman of bounded and self-conditioned mind, with all that incapacity of vital conception outside the personal environment which Ruskin grieved over in her sex. Not for her a large and impersonal outlook. A young married woman, of irregular life previous to her entering upon the mystical way, she seems (if one may trust her own violent self-accusations) to have combined actual laxity with a show of religiosity. Among her latest and most serious sacrifices to the new way of life she mentions head-tires and the like beloved feminine adornments. At a yet later stage of her spiritual preparation, she makes the naïf confession that she ceased to laugh at Petruccio. Clearly a light damsel, to whom this unidentified Peterkin was dear matter of merriment—even more difficult to forego than head-tires. Her one quality beyond the common is a strenuous emotionality; and this was nowise conspicuous in an Italian woman belonging to a century of vehement passions. Of weak nature, she found conversion a slow and painful process; she was not "saved" in a moment, after the manner of the Salvation bench. She has no literary art, no special gift of expression: her account of her spiritual experiences is of a girlish naïveté. One would expect the character of her spiritual relations to be adapted to the limitations of her mind, since mysticism follows the natural order, which is elevated into the supernatural without violent wrench. And it is even so: these relations have an intimate littleness nothing less than startling to the general reader, and arresting to the most experienced. A homely Bride of the Song of Songs (so to speak), one wishes, in listening to her, for the veil of poetry. This reason precludes us from quoting what is psychologically most interesting in its adjustment to the simple and personal feminine mind. No less interesting are the numerous suggested analogies between divine and natural love, and equally interdicted from quotation by consideration for the general reader. But psychology is baffled by another aspect of these writings. For this unlearned woman of small mind, whose earlier visions have all that literal and physical character which we should à priori expect, in her later visions, attains an altogether unexpected height of abstraction, and subtle philosophical conceptions which I have known to astonish at least one philosopher. The abrupt transition to these transcendental summits from the infantile simplicity of the writer's previously exhibited mental outlook, and the prattle of her narrative style, is a chief riddle of this extraordinary book. A riddle it will be to the ordinary reader, whether he admits or does not admit the supernatural element, and to many readers a profane riddle. To myself, with all its interest from the standpoints which I have indicated, it appears a book for which publicity, the indiscriminate publicity of the bookseller's window, was unmeant. I feel as if I had been eavesdropping at a convent confessional. I can hardly think it will make one convert to the value of mysticism. But I fear it may repel many.

Newspaper Stamps and Hindrances.

Taxes on Knowledge: the Story of their Origin and Repeal.
By Collet Dobson Collet. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

THE story of the hindrances which the stamp and other Acts placed on the freedom of the Press, and on the cheap dissemination of news, is a most interesting chapter in our social history. If it were written as it should be it would be full of excitement and interest: the narrative of a sort of steeplechase in which the Press would be seen taking the obstacles placed before it, here clearing a ditch and there a fence, until at last it arrived where it now is, with no masters and no censors but the public and the advertisers. But such a history yet remains to be written, for the present work is both dull and pretentious, and the reader will be a very youthful and enthusiastic admirer of the daily paper who will wade through all the small beer which trickles over so many pages in these two volumes.

But the statesmen who imposed the stamp duties and continued them were not actuated by any "nefarious" desire to stifle public knowledge. They may have deserved to be pelted with adjectives, but they seem chiefly to have been actuated by the desire to raise money for the revenue, a desire which is natural in the official, as is the opposite desire in the average man to evade or abolish any tax or duty which touches his pocket. Those who clung to the Stamp Acts were actuated by a desire to put money in the public treasury: those who wished to repeal the duties were impelled by a feeling that without them cheap newspapers might be made a very good thing. To talk of the taxes on newspapers as a "tax on knowledge" is merely another example of the advantage of a good cry which begs the question and tickles the ears of the unthinking. The taxes were really taxes on news, which is a very different thing, for news is not knowledge, and though we are all agreed that it was right and necessary to free the Press, yet it is just as well to call things by their real names.

Queen Anne, when men's passions were still excited by the Civil War and the Revolution. In the process of settling down language was used by pamphleteers which could not be justified, and for the sake of peace it was as well to stop the inflammatory writers whose words might just possibly have thrown all England into the melting-pot again. Considering the state of the country a couple of centuries ago, the following passage is probably justified in its imputation of motives, and it gives a fine idea of Mr. Collet's style :

Was there no way by which, without the necessity of constant censure, private men might be prevented from using the Press to make their opinions public? The pamphleteers were not rich, but they were often persons of education, and not penniless. When only a few copies of their writings were wanted they could pay for them, but now that reading was become more common, and that great numbers of copies were printed, the cost had, to a great extent, to be paid by the readers. If these sheets could be taxed their distribution might become difficult, and when anyone attempted to evade the tax he could be punished, not as a libeller, but as a smuggler, and the character of what was printed would not come under discussion, as it generally would in a trial for libel. At the time we are recording, 1709, these considerations appear to have very much occupied the minds of the members of the House of Commons.

There is, no doubt, a great deal of truth in this exposition, but the measure is one example of how Bills come to be passed or taxes imposed for a specific, if unavowed, purpose, and then are retained, thanks to the force of official habit, after the reasons which prompted them have passed away. But for a long time the Newspaper Acts and the stamp tax was looked upon as a convenient method of stopping those seditious persons who even as late as the beginning of this century published observations "tending to excite hatred and contempt of the Government and Constitution of these realms as by law established," till gradually the people and the Government advanced in their education, and finally realised that a cheap Press, though lending itself to many abuses, was far more sensitive to the control of public opinion than to that of a tax collector at Somerset House. But what strikes one especially in all this long history of a struggle against taxation is the very small amount received by the Exchequer. In 1815, the year of the Battle of Waterloo, the revenue from newspaper stamps was only £383,695, and in 1835 it was only £553,197, having been at its height in 1831, at the time of the Reform Bill agitation, when it reached the sum of £586,635, a wretched enough sum to squabble over for so many years.

Lord Lyndhurst really gave the first blow to the newspaper taxes in 1834, and the end might have come more quickly had not the Corn Law agitation turned the minds of the great public into a more personal channel, for cheap bread seemed more desirable than cheap news, and so the latter got shelved. In 1851 the matter was taken up by more serious persons, such as members of Parliament and others, and the advertisement duty, which pressed hardly on papers, was abolished on August 4, 1853. The compulsory stamp on newspapers was abolished June 29, 1855, the paper duty was repealed October 1, 1861, and the Registration and Security Acts in 1869.

For thirty years, therefore, the Press has been absolutely free, and has had no restrictions placed upon it except those enforced by public opinion and the advertisers. How strong the pressure these can exercise he who will may see at any time. Public opinion is now a very real and salutary censor.

In the Close.

Sunningwell. By F. Warre Cornish. (Constable. 6s.)

THE gentle life, gently told, of a canon in the Midlands who lives in the Cathedral Close with his sister and niece until the niece marries, the sister dies, and the canon himself fades away loving and beloved, "a pattern set to show that it is possible to be a Churchman without being a dogmatist, a critic without being censorious, a Christian yet not over unworldly." It is the glory of the Church of England to have produced such men, and, although we fancy the type is rarer than it was, there are doubtless many Philip Mores—learned, kindly, and devout—leading the claustral life in some of the sleepy cathedral towns of which England still boasts. Whether it will long survive the multiplication of dioceses, the increased means of communication between town and town, and the general rush and rattle of modern life, remains to be seen; but when it dies out life will have lost much of its picturesqueness.

Mr. Cornish's picture of Philip More, "who looked in the first place a gentleman, in the second a clergyman, in the third a scholar, . . . but not a don," is charming. So are those of the gruff old organist and his pupil and successor, "who looks like a German"; of the three old maiden ladies who kept a girls' school of the old-fashioned kind, and were "at home" every Wednesday; and of More's old servant, devoted to his master, but disliking "dinner-parties, rather because they gave others pleasure than because they gave himself trouble." And all More's kindness does not prevent his conversation on most matters from being flavoured with a delicate irony that is as shrewd as it is good-natured.

"There is nothing more wonderful," he says, "than the fact that a woman has nothing to learn. What she knows about a person or a fact, especially a person, admits of no addition or diminution, no misgiving or doubt: that is thenceforth to be added to the facts of the case, as part of the dossier. Now that, I think, is not a common quality in men; and the men who have it are just those to whom women submit their judgment; in action, that is, not in opinion; for whatever a woman may do or allow to be done she always knows she was right all the time."

Or, again :

"The smaller the man, the bigger the priest. Keble and his friends, those who stayed with us, were clergymen before they were priests. The modern High Churchman, as soon as he is ordained, is tempted to think that he is not only set apart, as he ought to think, but set above the laity, as a lord over the heritage. They seem to think they have given to them at their ordination a ticket of admission to front places in the Kingdom of Heaven."

Or, again :

"The people we call our inferiors are not merely indifferent. They look upon us as on the whole on the right side of nothing; for instance, deans and canons, to John Byles's mind, are people who walk behind vergers, and the converse proposition does not interest him."

It is, perhaps, with a double meaning that Mr. Cornish alludes to More as "the humourist."

The more serious purpose of the book is no doubt shown in the catastrophe. Spurred on by the attempt of some of his brother clergy to procure his signature to a condemnation of Essays and Reviews, More preaches a sermon in the Minster, setting forth "the duty of studying new doctrine, and not condemning it merely because it was new." And then, finding that this does not satisfy the orthodox, he follows it up by another developing "the somewhat subtle and difficult thesis" that "the form which religion takes is continually changing, and so even the creeds must mean different things, to those who repeat the words now, from what they meant to those who framed them; the material form in which true doctrines were presented might easily pass into the region of legend." The more evangelical of the chapter set the bishop at him, and the bishop suggests that he should resign his preferments. On his way home from the palace he gets a chill, which develops into a pleurisy, and he is never after the same man. Although he resigns his cure, he retains, with everybody's consent, his canonry, but does not touch the stipend. At length he dies, regretted as much by his opponents as by his friends, on a peaceful death-bed, which is one of the most touching things in the book.

Mr. Cornish, who, we forgot to say, is Vice-Provost of Eton, is no doubt right; and such things were possible in "the 'sixties and 'seventies," although, he thinks, "such sermons might be preached without offence now." Yet it is hard to see how the bishop could, at that time, have done other than he did. In his love for comprehension—and he repeatedly makes More say that the cathedrals should be open to Nonconformist ministers as well as to clergymen of the Church of England—Mr. Cornish, perhaps, takes too exclusively the clerical view of the matter, and overlooks the result that the expression of such views as his hero's are apt to have on the, it may be, uninstructed layman. Although he speaks of the Essays and Reviews period as one "when science and criticism were battering at the church doors, while the congregation inside thought more of how they could succeed in keeping them out than on what terms they could let them in," the same assault with the same result was delivered many times before Essays and Reviews was written, and is raging with great fierceness now. The rotundity of the earth, the plurality of worlds, the doctrine of evolution, have each in their turn marshalled their forces against the dogmas of the Christian Church, and Catholic, Anglican, and Dissenter have united first in defending and afterward in surrendering the position. Now has come the turn of that advanced or destructive criticism which says in effect that both the language and the evidence of the Bible may be freely altered or rejected according as it does or does not agree with profane sources; and already, as readers of the ACADEMY know well, there are many within the fort who are clamouring that this point, too, shall be conceded. Nor is there any sign that matters will stop here. The belief in miracles is challenged even in Mr. Cornish's book. The ecclesiastical mind has a way of its own in such matters, and we are far from saying that to it the subtle arguments—we will not call them casuistries or sophistries—by which More supports his theory of comprehension may not seem sufficient. But to the layman, accustomed to look upon facts from the objective side, the spectacle of a Church—including in this phrase again all Christian denominations—opposing while it can and accepting when it must the conclusions of a science which has always been distasteful to it, is likely to have a result very different from that which Mr. Cornish hopes and no doubt fancies.

This apart, Mr. Cornish has written a book in every way charming, and one which deserves to be read for its own sake, irrespective of the theological opinions of author or hero.

Edward FitzGerald's "Great Gun."

The Poems of George Crabbe. A Selection. Arranged and Edited by Bernard Holland. (Edward Arnold.)

MOST readers of the present day would confess that their knowledge of Crabbe was limited to the admirable parody in the Rejected Addresses. In truth, it is scarce a parody; every feature of Crabbe's style is exactly caught, while it is scarcely an exaggeration of Crabbe's own pedestrian moments. The jingles, burlesque though they appear, are no whit worse than Crabbe's own.

Wanton thoughts, I grant,
Were first my motive, now the thoughts of want is a quite average example from the Parish Register.

Without saying that the Rejected Addresses gives an adequate idea of Crabbe, it may yet be questioned whether there is not some reason for the neglect of Crabbe. Has Crabbe, in fact, quite the stuff to live?

The only prominent attention which we remember being paid to Crabbe of late years came—curiously—from no less exacting a critic of poetry than the late Coventry Patmore. It is an unlooked-for conjunction; yet, since he put his essay on permanent record, it is worth referring to as showing what a modern champion has to say for Crabbe. The chief thing which strikes him, the thing to which he returns again and again, is Crabbe's pitiless microscopic perception. He compares it to an electric light, wherein the very sludge and dead dogs in a tidal river shine again. The perception is undeniable, and this defender of Crabbe admits, in effect, that it is exercised too indiscriminately for art, that we could spare a few of the dead dogs. This, of course, is the merit claimed for Crabbe since his first appearance: that he sees for himself, and paints what he sees, even to the extent of dwelling on ugliness and squalor.

Nature's sternest painter, yet the best.

Of the sternness there is no possible doubt, but we demur to that "best." The description is careful, minute, accurate; but it is far too minute, far too accurate for poetry. There is no selection: one stanza of Tennyson would do the thing infinitely better with a tithe of the words. It is, in fact, excellent prose description; everything noted objectively in exact detail, nothing spared, nothing forgotten. Whereas a poet should forget everything but the few strokes which make for magic.

The following description of the Aldborough neighbourhood is a very good example:

Lo! where the heath, with withering brake grown o'er,
Lends the light turf that warms the neighbouring poor;
From thence a length of burning sand appears,
Where the thin harvest waves its withered ears;
Rank weeds, that every art and care defy,
Reign o'er the land, and rob the blighted rye:
There thistles stretch their prickly arms afar,
And to the ragged infant threaten war;
There poppies, nodding, mock the hope of toil,
There the blue bugloss paints the sterile soil;
Hardy and high, above the slender sheaf,
The slimy mallow waves her silky leaf;
O'er the young shoot the charlock throws a shade,
And clasping tares cling round the sickly blade;
With mingled tints the rocky coasts abound,
And a sad splendour vainly shines around.
So looks the nymph, whom wretched arts adorn,
Betray'd by man, then left for man to scorn;
Whose cheek in vain assumes the mimic rose,
While her sad eyes the troubled breast disclose;
Whose outward splendour is but folly's dress,
Exposing most, when most it gilds distress.

This is not only stern, but wilfully so. He sees everything with a grim eye. Aldborough, we are told, was excessively poor and squalid then; but the surrounding country must have been then, surely, much as it is now. The lovely Suffolk marshes, blooming with flowers and flower-like grasses, must have stood as they stand now. Then, as now, the flag-lilies must have turned them into glory in due season of the year. Yet from all Crabbe's works put together you would gain no conception that such a country surrounded his native village. His eye was jaundiced by the poverty amid which he was reared until it took natively to harsh objects. Whatsoever was arid in the country about him he noted grimly; but for its compensations he had no eye—or so it seems to us.

Yet Crabbe has power undeniably; he has truth and pathos and a manly style (which would have been better without Pope); and it is perhaps ungrateful to higgie whether his power should exactly be described as poetical. Nor will it do the present day any harm to read The Borough or the Parish Register, while it may do it considerable good.

THE UNCHANGING EAST.

BY ROBERT BARR.

Mr. Barr's book is resolutely and implacably facetious. Not humorous, not comic, but facetious. One would give so much for a genuinely comic idea, for a spark of wit, for an oasis of fine writing or even a single felicitous descriptive epithet inspired by imagination; but no, we are denied everything but facetiousness. And what is so sad about it is that in this facetiousness there are no surprises, the expected always happens. To a large extent such was also the case with the Innocents Abroad, on which book apparently Mr. Barr (although, as he tells us, by birth a Scotsman) has modelled his style; but it has to be remembered that the Innocents Abroad was the first of its kind and came into being thirty and more years ago, and also that it was often really funny and always the work of a powerful and original mind. Now, in Mr. Barr's record of travel he has put no originality and no power; he has merely used to the utmost a convention that is old to the point of exhaustion.

Thus: when Mr. Barr wishes to stay in a place, he "lingers longer, like Lu." He has been informed that it is quite common for French ships to lose their reckoning and "find themselves in the position of the man in the song, who 'dunno where 'e are.'" "France," he says elsewhere, "has really resolved to acquire the leather medal for stupidity, and has become a troublesome neighbour; while as a colonist she is beneath contempt." A Tunisian Arab, "like the man who broke the bank, walks along the Bois de Boulogne with an air that is inimitable." Concerning an Eastern coin: "There is on the larger silver coins a cabalistic mark, which resembles an American spreadeagle having a fit. This hieroglyphic nightmare, they tell me, is Turkish, and means 'God save the Sultan.' I think I could amend the phrase by substituting another word for 'save.'" And so forth; everywhere this tawdry bank-holiday facetiousness, unfortunately not unminged, as we have shown, now and then with something very much like bad manners.

In fairness to Mr. Barr, it ought to be said that these chapters were written for publication in a weekly paper, where such things are more in keeping; but that does not excuse the book. There is also a certain amount of information in these pages, and Mr. Barr's geniality is invincible; but we cannot consider its production as other than time ill spent. It is as well worth while to try and write well as to write like this. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

THE KENDALS.

BY T. EDGAR PEMBERTON.

Here is a book which—though, we dare say, it is having a certain amount of vogue at the libraries, and will find a place on the shelves of the "enthusiastic playgoer"—does not touch literature at any point. It professes to be "a biography," but is really a sort of éloge chronologically arranged. Its author speaks of his "close, constant, and valued friendship" with Mr. and Mrs. Kendal; and the volume is just such as a close, constant, valued friend would pen, if he had little faculty either for criticism or for style. Boiled down to the bare element of fact, this book might have excuse for existence as a pamphlet. As it stands, it is but a tedious tale of (as the author has it) unmitigated successes. A good deal of what Mr. T. E. Pemberton here says he has said already in his volumes on T. W. Robertson and Mr. John Haro. His chief fault, however, is his prolixity, his determination to write round a fact rather than state it simply and concisely. The strain of perpetual eulogium in which he writes is explicable from his own point of view, but particularly irritating to the fair-minded onlooker. It is no wonder that Mrs. Kendal begged to be omitted from the memorial; to be exposed to the sustained flow of Mr. Pemberton's published approval must be not a little trying to any player with a sense of humour. For the rest, the work is illustrated by a number of excellent reproductions of photographs, representing Mr. and Mrs. Kendal in parts they made popular. And meanwhile, happily, those accomplished performers are still active in the pursuit of their profession, and, we may hope, will not be the legitimate subjects of genuine biography for many a year to come. (C. A. Pearson, Ltd. 16s.)

"STORY OF THE NATIONS."—MODERN ITALY.

BY PROF. PIETRO ORSI.

The story of the Italian struggle for independence has been told in many ways. We have had of late Mr. Stillman's thoughtful study of the forces which wrought The Union of Italy and della Rocca's dramatically personal memoirs. Prof. Orsi gives harmoniously the political movements and his characterisations of the individual actors—Mazzini, Garibaldi, and the state-building Cavour. He traces the working of the liberal spirit under the differing conditions of the various provinces in a manner to make clear the problems which confronted the statesmen and soldiers of Piedmont and the revolutionaries of the rest of Italy. Nor has he fallen into the enthusiast's error of unreasoning resentment; but shows that the antagonism of Austrian and Italian was due in part to the inevitable conflict of opposing ideals. Pleasantly he reveals Italy, as only an Italian can, through its different provinces, with their peculiarities of soil and spirit:

Thus Piedmontese life is moulded by Turin, the city of even and regular streets, which corresponds, as it were, with the character of its people. The delightful Ligurian coast, fringed with villages embosomed in olive groves, fitly harmonises with the life around Genoa the Magnificent, famous for her marble palaces and stirring maritime activities, which render her the first commercial port of Italy. The fertile Lombard region has its focus in busy, hard-working Milan, whose glorious cathedral overshadows a great part of Italian commercial enterprise. Venice, that magic city of the lagions, continues to be one of the essentially artistic centres of the peninsula. Emilia and the Romagna provinces, from Parma to Ravenna—the former capital of the Ostrogoths, and the venerated burial-place of Dante—recognise as their chief city time-worn Bologna, the oldest university town in Italy. Florence, with her placid traditions, her glorious "humanities," reflects, in the "even teur" of her existence, as well as in her outward surroundings, the whole of Tuscan life and temperament.

In conclusion, Prof. Orsi shows us Italy of the present in which "the prose of possession succeeds the poetry of desire," yet which in her network of inartistic railways and telegraph lines is linking herself with the ancient Romans, the road-makers of the world. The author's national sympathies may account for a certain idealisation of the mediæval communes and princedoms. Stranger it is to find a professor at Venice committing himself to the statement that the house of Farnese "never specially distinguished itself." The master mind of Alexander Farnese found its chief work in the revolted Netherlands, yet he shared with Venetians the honours of Lepanto.

We may congratulate Prof. Orsi on a translator whose English version is English, unmarred by Italian idiom, though her rendering of the patriotic songs must be confessed inadequate. (T. Fisher Unwin. 5s.)

THE MORALS OF SUICIDE. BY THE REV. J. GURNHILL, B.A.

It is impossible not to feel respect for this book. The author avows himself a Christian Socialist, and approaches suicide as "a symptom of the sin and misery which is seething beneath the surface of society in all its classes." He has carefully analysed the statistics of suicide taken from Morselli's well-known book, and has further attempted to classify the causes of suicide as disclosed in one hundred cases taken, "just as they came," from newspaper reports. Unfortunately, the basis of observation is an unsafe one for reasonable inference. Obviously, the real "cause" of a suicide does not, in perhaps the majority of cases, get into the newspapers. It is generally everybody's interest to keep it out. Again, Mr. Gurnhill himself gives the probable annual number of suicides effected or attempted in England as about four thousand; and of these, one hundred is too few to calculate from. Nor do we think that you can, as Mr. Gurnhill attempts to do, assign one "cause"—"physical, mental, moral, or social"—to each case of suicide. As a rule, there are factors at work coming under all, or more than one, of his heads. For the cure of suicide Mr. Gurnhill looks to "Christian Therapeutics"; and here he leaves sociology for a sphere of theology into which we cannot follow him. (Longmans.)

CARLO CRIVELLI.

BY G. MCNEIL RUSHFORTH, M.A.

With the exception of Mr. Stevenson's Velasquez, Mr. Rushforth's Crivelli is, perhaps, the most interesting volume that has yet appeared in the "Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture" series. There is nothing added to the scanty notices already published of Crivelli's life, for there does not seem to be any material from which to add it. An obscure and solitary life in the March of Ancona leaves but few records. But the analysis of Crivelli's personality, of the growth of his art, of the strains of tradition and influence which meet in it, is excellent. And Crivelli's work is so isolated, clear-cut, and individual that such treatment tends to more solid and definite results than is always the case when it is applied to painters more many-sided and more in the movement. The one thing that Mr. Rushforth does not seem to us quite to bring out is the extent and quality of Crivelli's symbolism. He lays just stress on the union in the painter of "much that was archaic and conventional" with "a real appreciation of nature and searching after realism." He mentions the festoons of fruit and vessels of flowers that adorn Crivelli's Madonnas, the cracked and fractured marble surfaces, the leafless trees placed in the backgrounds, but he does not wholly explain their introduction. The realistic delight in the study of nature for its own sake, no doubt, in part; but everyone of these details subserves symbolism. Nothing is more familiar in northern Italy than the mulberry tree stripped of its leaves. Crivelli observes it, but surely it typifies for him the state of the world lacking redemption. So, too, the cracked surface of the balustrades on which the Child and his Mother lean, while the fruit and flowers are certainly exquisite decoration, but certainly also the fruit and flowers of grace. And the beautifully-drawn fly in Lord Northbrook's picture, at which the Child looks with such horror, while he holds a fluttering bird to his bosom—is not that Beelzebub, the prince of flies? While the birds, here and elsewhere, pecking at the fruit or perched on the leafless trees, are but the emblems of human souls. The symbolism would not be difficult to a painter working in so Franciscan a country as the March of Ancona. Mr. Rushforth's careful catalogue of Crivelli's works makes a valuable appendix, while his illustrations are the more interesting since some of them are from photographs taken in out-of-the-way spots by Mr. Houghton for the purposes of this volume. As usual, the larger pictures, the National Gallery "Annunciation" for instance, do not reproduce well upon the scale adopted. (Bell. 5s. net.)

SOLDIER SONGS.

EDITED BY J. E. CARPENTER.

A little khaki-bound collection of some of the best ditties about fighting and fighting-men. It begins with "A Knapsack and a Cheerful Heart," and ends with "God Save the Queen." Wherever a musical setting is known, the publisher of the music, or the air to which the song may be sung, is given. Among recent numbers are "Soldiers of the Queen," "Tommy, Tommy Atkins," and Mr. Conan Doyle's "Who Carries the Gun." Mr. Kipling is not represented at all, an omission due probably to the iron laws of copyright. (Warne.)

Fiction.

The Waters of Edera. By Ouida.
(T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

THIS book belongs to the later Italian series of Ouida's novels. It is now close upon forty years since her first work, Held in Bondage, was issued; nevertheless, the imaginative force of her last gives no sign of decadence. The story is, indeed, powerful, and one can conceive that it was "thrown off" with masterful ease, as Victor Hugo might have thrown it off—writing in bold scratching strokes at a plain wooden desk: such is one's impression.

Ouida takes an Italian valley, and shows, in depicting the life of the peasants therein, that their very existence depended on the river Edera which watered it. Then she moves forward a "foreign syndicate," who, for their own sinister commercial ends, wished to divert the stream. There was a fierce struggle between the country party and the town party; but, of course, the squadrons of commerce gained the victory. The river was diverted, the valley ruined, and the syndicate lapped in gold; incidentally, there were a number of murders and two suicides, those of the hero and his mother. Adone—proprietor of the valley—is one of Ouida's "beautiful" heroes, and she has given him a heroine to match. Some of the pictures of the latter are charming:

She was only a child, and her spirits rose, and she capered about in the shallows, and flung the water over her head, and danced to her own reflection in it, and forgot her sorrow. Then she washed her petticoats as well as she could, having nothing but water alone, and all the while she was as naked as a Naiad, and the sun smiled on her brown, thin, childish body, as it smiled on a stem of plaitain or on the plumage of a coot.

Then when she had washed her skirt she spread it out on the sand to dry, and sat down beside it, for the heat to bake her limbs after her long bath. There was no one, and there was nothing in sight; if any came near she could hide under the great dock leaves until such should have passed. It was high noon, and the skirt of wool and the skirt of hemp grew hot, and steamed under the vertical rays; she was soon as dry as the shingles from which the water had receded for months. She sat with her hands clasped round her updrawn knees, and her head grew heavy with the want of slumber, but she would not sleep, though it was the hour of sleep. Some one might pass by and steal her clothes, she thought, and how or when would she ever get others.

The whole book is full of the appreciation of free, natural beauty, and the passionate hate of cruelty and oppression. It is unconventional in a large, rather fine manner. Full of lofty scorn and noble dignity, it is yet rather pathetic in its ignorances and its prejudices. For Ouida a thing is still either wholly good or wholly bad: there is nothing between. Her emotions have an almost tragic splendour, but her thinking is crude. Artistically the novel has one chief defect: it is not woven with sufficient closeness; its meshes are too big to hold fast the reader. Otherwise it is admirable, despite the somewhat crowded disasters at the end.

A Man of his Age. By Hamilton Drummond.
(Ward, Lock & Co., Ltd. 6s.)

As a successor to For the Religion, this record of Navarraise intrigue, amid the counter-influences of Jeanne d'Albret and her "cousin of Medici," is a disappointment. Mr. Drummond has matter to relate, and there are leaves in his book which possess something like a romantic atmosphere; but, upon the whole, the tale is cloudy, obscure. The reader feels the need of a guide amid this thick tangle of allusiveness. Halfway through, he is like a traveller who, having journeyed far in the dark, desires violently to know where he is. We are inclined to attribute part of the misfortune to Mr. Drummond's mere apparatus of narration. Our old friend Blaise de Bernauld tells the story in the first person; but already in the second chapter Blaise is quoting at length from one Henri de Crussenay, and in the next chapter Henri de Crussenay is quoting at length from his servant Roger, and Roger is quoting other persons. We thus have a tale within a tale within a tale, and the system of inverted commas becomes too complex for Mr. Drummond's management. This may be a trifle, but it creates a fatal discomfort. The novel should certainly have been written in the third person.

Some of the incidents are exciting, and some improbable—especially that on p. 161, though we assume that Mr. Drummond has authority for it. The plot as a whole is too deliberately "concocted" and prepared in its minor arrangements. Here is an example:

The dusk was gathering in fast as I made my way to the Castle with Roger hard after me, three paces away. To suit the occasion, and match the dress that custom and necessity put upon me, I had changed my weapon for a light Spanish blade, good steel enough, but more a kind of a finish to a man's dress than a sword for hard use. Roger, too, carried a blade but little stouter than my own, and I remember well that the swing of it in his hand as he buckled it on puckered his face into a grim derision.

"My faith," said he, shaking it as a man would a cane, "'tis a good thing we go but to make a show of ourselves, for if it came to the keeping of my life whole within me, I had liefer trust the mercies of a three-foot cudgel."

Need we say that in the shortest possible space of time the lives of Roger and his master are made to depend on precisely those swords. The character of Blaise is convincing, but some of the others are feebly drawn; Suzanne's distinguishing marks have been a commonplace of historical fiction for many years.

The Wallet of Kai-Lung. By Ernest Bramah.
(Richards. 6s.)

MR. BRAMAH is a humorist; and we have to thank him for several hours of what, in the elegant language which passes between the characters in this book, would be described as refined and dignified amusement. China has before now been a happy hunting ground for whimsical-minded satirists—witness Mr. Gilbert's "Mikado" (which, though nominally Japanese, is Chinese enough for our purpose) and "The Potion of Lao Tse" in Dr. Garnett's Twilight of the Gods; but we do not remember any work in which so much good comic use has been made of the Celestial's impassivity, opportunism, and floridity of diction.

Whether Mr. Bramah has invented all these tales, or whether they are adaptations, we do not know. Sometimes they are so absolutely Chinese as to suggest that he has merely given them an English form, and at other times, as in the literary satire entitled "The Confession of Kai Lung," the Chinese setting is merely a vehicle; but if Mr. Bramah has invented all along the line his work is a very remarkable tour de force. What he lacks is dramatic finish. Several of the stories have rather lame conclusions, particularly "The Vision of Yin," but they are so persistently and freshly amusing that this is easily forgiven. Altogether "The Transmutation of Ling" is the best—the gravely absurd history of a young Chinaman, whose body is turned to gold by a magic potion, and who thereupon sells himself to a company: an act which leads to a series of exceedingly polished adventures for the removal of gravity—to fall once more into Kai Lung's narrative method.

For the purposes of quotation we have made a selection from the proverbs, nominally taken from Chinese classic authors, which Mr. Bramah has scattered about his pages:

He is a wise and enlightened suppliant who seeks to discover an honourable Mandarin, but he is a fool who cries out "I have found one."

It is a mark of insincerity of purpose to spend one's time in looking for the sacred Emperor in the low-class tea-shops.

Although there exist many thousand subjects for elegant conversation, there are persons who cannot meet a cripple without talking about feet.

Money is hundred-footed. Upon perceiving a tael lying apparently unobserved on the floor, do not lose the time necessary in stooping, but quickly set your foot upon it, for one fails nothing in dignity thereby; but should it be a gold piece, distrust all things, and valuing dignity but as an empty name, cast your entire body upon it.

Should a person on returning from the city discover his house to be in flames, let him examine well the change which he has received from the chair-carrier before it is too late; for evil never travels alone.

The road to eminence lies through the cheap and exceedingly uninviting eating-houses.

One word more: The Wallet of Kai-Lung has to be read very vigilantly, for Mr. Bramah is one of those who drop good things without ostentation.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE COLLAPSE OF THE PENITENT. By F. WEDMORE.

Mr. Wedmore for the most part writes brief stories with almost unparalleled care. Here he gives us something longer, his aim being to depict the emotions which are experienced by a prodigal when the period of his welcome terminates, and the rôle of penitent becomes a little tiresome. The prodigal in question is Mrs. Vasey, née Rose Damarel, the pianist. (Hutchinson. 3s. 6d.)

THE PRINCESS SOPHIA. By E. F. BENSON.

Mr. Benson's Princess is the bright particular star of the court of Rhodopé, "an independent principality on the wooded coast-line of Albania." Gambling mingles with affairs of State, and Sophia herself has "the luck of the devil." She introduces an era of gambling into her little kingdom, and one of her maxims is this: "I like people to be good, when being good comes natural to them; but the continual effort to do one's duty is paralysing to other energies." A gay and readable story. (Heinemann. 6s.)

SMITH BRUNT. By WALDRON K. POST.

A story of the old U.S. Navy, opening in 1806. We follow Smith Brunt all over the world. The writer makes a point of the fact that Smith Brunt enjoyed none of the newspaper popularity of later heroes. "But, 'y Guy, I dunno,—yes, b' Guy, I do know, he was somethin' that's just as good as any hero, and a darn sight better than some—he was a straight-out officer of the United States Navy." (Putnam's Sons.)

IN THE WAKE OF THE WAR. By A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK.

Mr. St. John Adcock, whose tales of London street life have already made him a reputation, has taken some of the minor phases of the present struggle as his subject material. Not the fighting itself, not indeed South Africa at all, but the family about to lose a son, the reserve man preparing to depart, the decision to enlist—of these he writes, and each makes a story. (Hodder & Stoughton. 2s. 6d.)

ANIMA VILIS. By MARYA RODZIEWICZ.

As may be conjectured, the author of this novel is a Pole. She is also rich and free and independent, never yet having met her ideal. So Count de Soissons, who translates the book from the Polish, informs the reader. The story is of Poles in Siberia, and it throws a strong light on both the race and the country. (Jarrold. 6s.)

The Rise of Huxley

I dined with a whole lot of literary and scientific people. . . . Owen was, in my estimation, great, from the fact of his smoking his cigar and singing his song like a brick.

THESE sentences occur in a letter from Huxley to his eldest sister, Mrs. Scott, written in 1850. The letter is given in a chapter from Mr. Leonard Huxley's life of his father, which, by enterprise and good luck, the editor of McClure's Magazine is able to lay this month before his readers. This chapter, heralding a biography on which great hopes are set, tells of Huxley's early struggle to win a livelihood by scientific work. A more moving and inspiring story of its kind could hardly be imagined; and though it covers only five years, years of hard-breathing effort rather than fulfilment, the long career of Thomas Henry Huxley is lit up and embellished by the revelations afforded of the young surgeon's aims, both as the world viewed them and as he weighed them in his own wise, self-loyal heart. On such data one boldly forms final judgments of Huxley, assured that they will not be disturbed by the completed record of which this chapter is but a small part. It is already shown that Huxley set out, or rather was temperamentally destined, to live the full life of a man. Unlike Browning's grammarian, who decided not to Live but to Know, Huxley made it his business to know and live—accepting the harder task of reconciling the two ambitions.

It is now fifty years since Huxley returned to England after a spell of work as assistant surgeon on the exploring frigate H.M.S. Rattlesnake in Australian waters. In Sydney he had become engaged to Miss Nettie Heathorn, and when he set foot on shore at Chatham his consuming wish was to give that young lady a home of her own. The letters printed in McClure's Magazine show what pains of frustration the young lover had to undergo. In the letter to his sister in Tennessee, already mentioned, Huxley writes under the date November 21, 1850 (he is at the age of twenty-five):

Now, as to my own affairs—I am not married. Prudently, at any rate, but whether wisely or foolishly I am not quite sure yet, Nettie and I resolved to have nothing to do with matrimony for the present. In truth, though our marriage was my great wish on many accounts, yet I feared to bring upon her the consequences that might have occurred had anything happened to me within the next few years. We had a sad parting enough, and as is usually the case with me, time, instead of alleviating, renders more disagreeable our separation. I have a woman's element in me. I hate the incessant struggle and toil to cut one another's throat among us men, and I long to be able to meet with someone in whom I can place implicit confidence, whose judgment I can respect, and yet who will not laugh at my most foolish weaknesses and in whose love I can forget all care. All these conditions I have fulfilled in Nettie. With a strong natural intelligence, and knowledge enough to understand and sympathise with my aims, with the firmness of a man, when necessary, she combines the gentleness of a very woman and the honest simplicity of a child, and then she loves me well, as well as I love her, and you know I love but few—in the real meaning of the word, perhaps, but two—she and you. And now she is away, and you are away. The worst of it is I have no ambition, except as means to an end, and that end is the possession of a sufficient income to marry upon. I assure you I would not give two straws for all the honours and titles in the world. A worker I must always be—it is my nature—but if I had £400 a year I would never let my name appear to anything I did or shall ever do. It would be glorious to be a voice working in secret and free from all those personal motives that have actuated the best.

Towards the end of the letter he grips his pen a little harder:

I don't know and I don't care whether I shall ever be what is called a great man. I will leave my mark somewhere, and it shall be clear and distinct [T. H. H., his mark.] and free from the abominable blur of cant, humbug, and self-seeking which surrounds everything in this present world—that is to say, supposing that I am not already unconsciously tainted myself, a result of which I have a morbid dread.

One piece of luck he had; he was given a shore appointment to H.M.S. Triguard at Woolwich. It enabled him to live in London, and reap the fruits of his Rattlesnake memoirs, which he had sent to England and which had received instant recognition. At a bound, indeed, Huxley had placed himself in the front rank of naturalists; but this was a different thing from being able to marry Nettie. To that loyal young lady he wrote again and again, as his fortunes swayed back and forward, yet on the whole forward. He had unbearable spells of depression between his successes. In March, 1851, he writes: "To attempt to live by any scientific pursuit is a farce. Nothing but what is absolutely practical will go down in England." Continuing to bring out his biological papers, he suddenly received a great encouragement. The Royal Society wanted fresh blood, wanted to replace its dilettanti by workers. It was resolved to elect fifteen men who were likely to do the Society honour; and of thirty-eight candidates, Huxley was one of the chosen. On this he writes: "I was talking to Professor Owen yesterday, and said that I imagined I had to thank him in great measure for the honour of the F.R.S. 'No,' he said, 'you have nothing to thank but the goodness of your own work.'" Yet in the letter to Nettie, in which he tells her of his election, the young F.R.S. indulges in more pessimism:

Opportunities for seeing the scientific world in England force upon me every day a stronger and stronger conviction. It is that there is no chance of living by science. I have been loth to believe it, but it is so. There are not more than four or five offices in London which a zoologist or comparative anatomist can hold and live by. Owen, who has a European reputation, second only to that of Cuvier, gets as Hunterian Professor £300 a year! which is less than the salary of many a bank clerk. . . . In literature a man may write for magazines and reviews, and so support himself; but not so in science. I could get anything I write into any of the journals or any of the Transactions, but I know no means of thereby earning five shillings. A man who chooses a life of science chooses not a life of poverty, but, so far as I can see, a life of nothing, and the art of living upon nothing at all has yet to be discovered. You will naturally think, then, "Why persevere in so hopeless a course?" At present I cannot help myself. For my own credit, for the sake of gratifying those who have hitherto helped me on—nay, for the sake of truth and science itself, I must work out fairly and fully complete what I have begun, and when that is done, I will courageously and cheerfully turn my back upon all my old aspirations. The world is wide, and there is everywhere room for honesty of purpose and earnest endeavour. . . . So far as the acknowledgment of the value of what I have done is concerned, I have succeeded beyond my expectations, and if I have failed on the other side of the question, I cannot blame myself. It is the world's fault and not mine.

The world did not mend its ways for long after that, and Huxley was well-nigh maddened by poverty and hope deferred; few things being harder to bear than frustration in honourable love when a single turn of the wheel of Fortune might confer paradise. Huxley found himself treated with extraordinary respect by the foremost scientific men of the day; his work was quoted as having full authority; and following his election to the Royal Society in 1851, he won that Society's Gold Medal, and was elected to the Society's Council. But what was all this without Nettie?

It was sore waiting, and distraught planning. A professorship of Toronto lured him, but he was pressed to stay in England. Others saw as plainly as himself his high call, and, more plainly than himself, his ultimate success. And while he wore out his heart, Nettie was so distant that his hotly-written letters took four to six months to reach her, and her advice had lost all applicability when it came to his hand. He even thought of throwing up England and going out to Sydney to practise as a surgeon; but his "demon" forbad. He wished he understood brewing; he could then join Nettie's father in business. But to all such proposals that young lady returned a decisive "No." "A man," she said, "must pursue those things which he is fitted to do well." The lover breathed a deep sigh of relief: "The spectre of a wasted life has passed before me—a vision of that servant who hid his talent in a napkin and buried it."

A wave of hope imbathes his spirit. Writing in July, 1853, he says:

My course in life is taken. I will not leave London—I will make myself a name and a position as well as an income by some kind of pursuit connected with science, which is the thing for which nature has fitted me if she has ever fitted any one for anything. Bethink yourself whether you can cast aside all repining and all doubt, and devote yourself in patience and trust to helping me along my path as no one else could. I know what I ask, and the sacrifice I demand, and if this were the time to use false modesty, I should say how little I have to offer in return. . . .

I am full of faults, but I am real and true, and the whole devotion of an earnest soul cannot be overprized. . . . It is as if all that old life at Holmwood had merely been a preparation for the real life of our love—as if we were then children ignorant of life's real purpose—as if these last months had merely been my old doubts over again, whether I had rightly or wrongly interpreted the manner and the words that had given me hope.

We will begin the new love of woman and man, no longer that of boy and girl, conscious that we have aims and purposes as well as affections, and that if love is sweet, life is dreadfully stern and earnest.

Stern and earnest it remained, for, when at last the Fates wearied of trying his spirit, they yet doled out their gifts with austerity. Still, it was the end of a long agony when he got work that enabled him to snap his fingers at the Admiralty, and when Churchill the publisher commissioned a Manual of Comparative Anatomy, and the Westminster Review began to pay him for articles. The prospect of being Fullerian lecturer at the Royal Institution was held out to him, and, better still, Edward Forbes's post at the Museum of Practical Geology, worth £200 a year, was given to him. He could make another £250 a year by his pen alone. He could marry. The course of events was now punctual and apposite as at the end of a novelette. For when he took his seat in the Geological Museum "it happened that Miss Heathorn and her parents had just settled to return to England, where they arrived in May, 1855, and the wedding took place on July 21."

From these glimpses it will be seen that Mr. Leonard Huxley's life of his father is a book to anticipate with peculiar pleasure. Even the greatest scientists are rapidly superseded; they did but forge links in a chain to which there is no end. Hence the biography of a student of Nature requires for its interest a deal of humanity; life as well as work; and it should show a man who could emerge from his laboratory to "smoke his cigar and sing his song like a brick." It should depict a Huxley.

Things Seen.

The Flower.

THEY were two geologists.

The elder man had a gruff and imperious voice. The grey eyes wore only that cold glitter that debate is wont to kindle in the eyes of the learned. He was, too, a Materialist.

Suddenly, his younger companion interrupted the flow of broken talk.

"Ah," he exclaimed with an eager gesture, "there is a —."

I have forgotten the name, but he was pointing to a blue flower that poised its tiny bell on a slender stem at the other side of the stream. The older scientist looked, and the eyes grew warmer and less keen, and the furrows grew less deep and long, as he looked. It was a rare flower and a pretty one.

"I am in luck," said the younger, preparing to leap across the stream; "that will be an addition to my collection."

"I think not," slowly answered his companion.

"What do you mean?"

"I mean," said the elder gravely, "that no man plucks flowers and shortens their all too brief life when I can prevent it."

Soon the debate waxed warmer than ever. The sentimentality of the Materialist was absurd; perhaps no man would pass that way again until the grace of the flower had fallen into corruption. Yet some strong force in the old man's heart made him wholly inflexible. At length the younger man made an angry move towards the stream. His companion quickly leaped across before him, took his geological hammer from his wallet, and sat down sternly beside his unconscious charge.

And there the Materialist sat through the afternoon—for his companion was stubborn too. The elder man was the last to run for the train. And the flower lived on.

The Schooner.

BEHIND me the town stretched lank and grey and weather-beaten. Row on row of shuttered windows and drawn blinds suggested irresistibly the deserted theatre. But the stage itself was full of light and movement, and I, lying lonely among the sandhills, was the only spectator.

Over my head a lark fluttered in the sunshine, now and then a red golfing jacket would pop up like a rabbit; but I had eyes only for the sea. After long months of confinement in the measured bounds of city streets my eyes revelled in the sense of colour and distance. Brick and stucco preserve a dull uniformity of tone, but here all was a maze of shimmering colours. There were yellows and greens in the shallows, further out violet, and then a thousand varying tones of purple up to the dark semi-circle of the horizon.

So, though the wind whistled shrilly in the grasses, I lounged and smoked, and was happy. That morning, as the train rattled through the green country, thrushes were singing in sheltered inland gardens, and the air was heavy with the smell of new-turned earth.

Here, too, spring was calling, but with a deeper, stronger note. Then suddenly through a gap in the line of houses there was a flutter of belying canvas, and a little schooner came tacking out of the mouth of the harbour. She was dirty and unpainted; her decks were choked with litter; but she met the long roll of the waves with a jaunty swagger, and was transformed by the sea and the sunlight. As she steered slowly out, I saw a fellow in the stern wave his cap defiantly to the grim, unresponsive line of houses, that had seen so many boats sail out. It thrilled me.

"Disappearing Authors."

Doubts about "Dainty Editions."

MR. JUSTIN MCCARTHY's list of "disappearing authors" has excited much surprise. It included Jane Austen, whose new editions are legion; Trollope, who, it is credibly stated, is "in" for a revival; Charles Lever, of whose works one firm alone (Messrs. Downey) have sold £9,000 worth in the last few years; and Charles Reade. We ourselves disputed the "disappearing" of Jane Austen, and a correspondent quickly confirmed our view by informing us that the Kilburn Free Library issues each of her novels to twenty-one readers per annum. We have since made a few inquiries, which throw some interesting and varied sidelights on the subject. First we will give the testimony of the librarians of two of the largest free libraries in the country, those of Nottingham and West Ham.

Mr. J. Potter Briscoe, City Librarian of Nottingham, writes:

Jane Austen is an unknown name to the present generation of our readers.

Trollope's works are rarely asked for.

The three Charles' are waning in popularity. Kingsley is known through his Westward Ho! and Hereward the Wake only. Reade is in slight request, and Lever is not so popular as he was even five years ago.

We are now overstocked with the novels of the five mentioned authors.

Mr. Briscoe can hardly be mistaken about the status of Jane Austen in Nottingham. We are astonished by his report of her case.

Mr. Alfred Cotgreave, Chief Librarian at West Ham, partly confirms Mr. Briscoe. He brackets Jane Austen and Anthony Trollope as authors who are "certainly not so much read now"; and Trollope, we know, is read very little, lacking the new and dainty editions which have been showered—vainly?—on Jane. The other authors—Lever, Kingsley, and Reade—"still maintain their popularity to a great extent at West Ham." Here is a table of issues for one year at West Ham:

Charles Lever's Novels	...	...	...	260
Charles Reade's Novels	...	...	...	245
Charles Kingsley's Novels...	...	...	...	218
Anthony Trollope	...	...	...	126
Jane Austen...	...	...	...	109

Again we are astonished, and, indeed, we are resolved—if we can do it with strict adherence to truth—to bring kindlier witnesses to Miss Austen's popularity. We will consult the booksellers. A large City firm reports that Kingsley's novels and Lever's military novels sell well, but not Trollope or Reade. And then:

Whether Jane Austen be read or not it is impossible to say; this we know, that there have in quite recent years been five different editions published, all of which met with a ready and extensive sale.

A Manchester bookseller confirms the wide sale of Jane Austen; and from Oxford—where Trollope, Lever, and Reade are reported to be in a bad way—comes the same persistent distinction in Jane Austen's case:

As to Jane Austen buying is not, of course, synonymous with reading, and a mere bookseller can speak only of his sales; but, judging by the constant demand for her works here in Oxford, it may be assumed that many "attempts" to read her are made, and I venture to hope we may safely go further and say that she is both read and enjoyed to a considerable extent.

The only comfort we pluck from these hesitating reports of Jane, is that they throw a doubt, which we have long shared, but dared not breathe, on the "dainty edition." We have a suspicion that the dainty edition is frequently no more than a dainty sepulchre.

Hope dawns for Miss Austen when we open our reports from Bristol and Eastbourne.

Bristol says: "Mr. McCarthy never made a worse statement of fact than when he wrote, that the modern reader 'has never troubled himself even with an attempt to read Jane Austen's novels.'"

Eastbourne says: "Mr. McCarthy is altogether wrong about Jane Austen's novels. The modern reader does read her works. Ten years ago I would not think of having one of her books in stock, now I have them in two or three editions, and find a slow but increasing sale."

Brighton says that Trollope, Reade, and Lever are not only disappearing but have disappeared. But Kingsley holds his own, and "as to Jane Austen, however much her works have been neglected for years past, there has been a greatly revived interest in them, and they have been widely read and still are."

It seems, then, that Jane Austen sells in the bookshops, but is not borrowed in the libraries. This might simply mean that she is so popular that readers insist on possessing her for themselves; but this would be a too optimistic interpretation of the facts.

It is clear that Kingsley and Lever still hold their own pretty well. Yet in Lever's case we are told, from two quarters, that his sales are retarded by the lack of a good cheap edition of his works.

Reade is in a bad way, yet an Oxford-street bookseller prefers him before Kingsley and Trollope; and Reade's Cloister and the Hearth is "in continuous demand" in Manchester, where, also, his other books are "worth keeping always in stock." Trollope is nearly extinct in Manchester. Both Trollope and Lever are neglected at Eastbourne: "I have not been asked for a work of theirs for some years, and I have lately cleared them out of my library as lumber; and I am sorry to say that Charles Reade is disappearing." At Bristol Trollope and Reade are "moribund."

These reports cannot be said to contradict in any marked way Mr. Justin McCarthy's estimates of the present popularity of writers like Jane Austen, Lever, Reade, Trollope, and Kingsley; and they show that the most championed and new-editioned author of them all—Jane Austen—is by no means so safely throned as some of us had thought.

Puritan Drama.

THE Elizabethan Stage Society's performance of "Samson Agonistes," in the Lecture Theatre at South Kensington, last Saturday, was an interesting experiment, but it was hardly more. If, as one gathers from Milton's preface, the play was intended more or less as a protest against the Romanticism of the Elizabethans, it certainly justifies the Elizabethans. But "Samson" was never written to be acted, and it is therefore hardly fair to judge it as a stage play. It is a magnificent poem, but it is not a great drama. Even judged by the severe standard of a Greek tragedy it is sadly deficient in incident and action. There is no development of character. The whole thing is statuesque to the verge of woodenness. In a sense "Samson Agonistes" is a faithful copy of Attic tragedy, but it is Attic tragedy seen through Puritan glasses, dour and hard and doctrinaire. And Milton has not always endeavoured to imitate the Greek tragedians at their best. The long opening soliloquy of more than a hundred lines, in which the hero expounds his past fortunes to the audience, was not considered the most skilful way of unfolding a plot even in the age of Pericles. Samson's angry argument with Dalila and his dialectical discussion with Manoa recall Euripides in his most forensic vein, that vein which roused the wrath of Aristophanes, while the choruses are sometimes modelled too faithfully on the most didactic moments of Greek choruses, and often lack beauty.

The splendour of the play lies in its lofty feeling, its resonant verse, and in the finely-conceived character of the hero. But more than this is required to make a play interesting on the stage, and Milton gives us no more. It is possible that if "Samson" were given in the true Greek fashion—in a theatre on a hillside overlooking the sea, with the blue waves dancing in the sunshine and the blue sky overhead—it would be easier to bear. It is possible that much of Euripides, and even of Sophocles, would have sounded rather dull in a South Kensington lecture theatre at once draughty and stuffy. But we doubt whether even in the theatre of Dionysus at Athens, or on a Sicilian hillside, Milton's tragedy would have been successful. There is a Puritan rigidity about it, and an absence of the human elements of love and passion which would always leave an audience cold. It may be urged that something of the same criticism might be made of the "Prometheus Vincit." But the chained Titan's invectives against Omnipotence are necessarily more stirring, more dramatic, than Samson's carefully-reasoned submission to the Divine will, and the choruses of Milton are not the choruses of Æschylus. It was perhaps a little unkind of Mr. Poel to emphasise this fact by the music to which those choruses were set. It may have been a compliment to Milton's stern Puritan views to make his Danites intone their comments as if they were verses of the Psalms, but the setting only emphasised the rather dreary austerity of the poet's lines. Nor were matters improved when, in moments of grotesque excitement, the Danites (most of whom were ladies) all spoke at once in a curious staccato sing-song.

But it would be ungrateful to reproach the Society for the short-comings of Saturday's performance. The problem of "staging" a Greek chorus in these days has never been successfully solved, and we admire Mr. Poel's courage in attempting to act "Samson Agonistes" too much to criticise the result harshly. When all is said, one does not go to "Samson" for drama. The interest of the play is mainly autobiographical. As one sees the hero blind among his enemies, bemoaning his folly in having trusted his two Philistian wives, one sees Milton, blind also, and living among a generation whose ideals were other than his, bemoaning his unfortunate marriages, and longing for strength to pull down their Dagon's temple upon the heads of the good folk of the Restoration. The acting was undistinguished, but it would have needed superb elocutionary power and great intellectual gifts to give Milton's long rhetorical speeches with effect, and the argumentative passages would probably have been intolerable under any circumstances. It was therefore no disgrace for the actors to fail in so hard a field.

Correspondence.

Maeterlinck and the "Contemporary Review."

SIR,—Mr. Ropes's letter seems to call for a few words in reply. He now tells us that his article was not intended as a complete study of Maeterlinck's work, but merely as a discussion of his "artistic methods." It is a pity that these limitations were not more clearly defined at first. When he says (Contemporary Review, page 423): "The function of criticism is not so much to condemn or praise, as to understand and explain. If Maeterlinck is the greatest genius of the age, let us see in what his greatness resides; if he is a mere babbling idiot, let us at least classify his idiocy and assign him to his proper ward in the asylum of degeneracy," it is difficult to believe that only questions of artistic method occupied his mind.

Had this been so, however, it seems doubtful whether the technique of any writer can be justly criticised apart from a consideration of the message which it is intended to bear. Certainly the delicate framework on which the mystic poets hang the filmy tissue of their thought must appear meaningless to those who, like Mr. Ropes, deliberately ignore their symbolism and intention. "His (Maeterlinck's) essays," he says, "his mysticism and philosophy, were outside my consideration except in so far as they enabled a reader to understand his artistic methods."

But a knowledge of Maeterlinck's philosophy, as exhibited in his essays, must go hand in hand with any true comprehension of his technique. I am surprised that any serious critic could doubt this. Desiring to express certain spiritual truths, Maeterlinck chooses the medium best suited to his design: Mr. Ropes, ignoring the spiritual truths, belittles the achievement because the medium is not to his mind.

Secondly, Mr. Ropes finds my summary of his article inaccurate. It appears that his languid praise of Maeterlinck's use of the supernatural applies to "L'Intruse" alone. I credited him with perceiving the same fine qualities in "L'Intérieur" and "Les Aveugles." Also, I now gather that he did not mean to say that "Mr. Kipling did it (the gradual accumulation of terror) better" than Maeterlinck. I subjoin two extracts—the first from his article, the second from his letter.

1. "Maeterlinck's style is more poetic than theirs (i.e., Kipling's and Maupassant's), but less convincing."

2. "Such practised literary craftsmen as Maupassant and Kipling give their readers a stronger shudder than does the mystical Maeterlinck."

Surely the strength of effect produced is the essence of success in this class of writing!

On one point alone I can meet Mr. Ropes on his own ground. He says he is unable to grasp "the strange stillness of the soul which is felt in Maeterlinck's works." I agree. But this, being purely a question of feeling, is hardly a subject for argument; especially with an antagonist who confesses to a weakness for "the hard realities" of life.

Nor, after all, is the matter a very important one. It is scarcely probable that the hostility of the crowd will deflect M. Maeterlinck from the path which his genius points out: nor that he, or his fellow mystics, will be tempted to exclaim in the words of Mr. "Adrian Ross's" most popular ditty:

If you do not love me I shall die! die! die!

—I am, &c.,

EVELYN UNDERHILL.

3, Campden Hill-place, W.

SIR,—Mr. Ropes is surely not serious in saying that he does not know what is meant by "the stillness of the soul" in literature. It means the higher repose. In the case of Maeterlinck it also means, I think, purity of emotion, a sweet resignation to destiny, the atmosphere of abstract love, the contemplative mind dwelling humbly on great things. Mr. Ropes will find in Ibsen's last play everything that "the stillness of the soul" does not mean. When We Dead Awaken is a very pitiful revelation of soul panic.—I am, &c.,

The Missing Word.

SIR,—In reference to Mr. Arnold White's letter in the last number of the ACADEMY, I wish to point out that the word Briton is of Gaelic origin, and that the name Britannia was given to a country in which there was a large Gaelic population. The term Anglo-Saxon, which Mr. White uses, is one which excludes the "Celtic fringe" altogether, all Irish, Highland Scots, and Welsh, and as a Welshman I wish to protest against it. Why not Anglo-Celtic?—I am, &c.,

ANCIENT BRITON.

Our Weekly Prize Competitions.

Result of No. 29 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize for the best suggestion as to a new word to cover all British subjects, whether English, colonial, or Irish; the request to do so being put to us by Mr. Arnold White. Among the names suggested are "Victorians" (by many competitors), "Britishers" (by three), "Imperials," "Queensmen," "Homelanders," "Britannialists," "Empirists," "Britonians," "Freelanders," "Britempirists," "Imperions," and "Englanders." "Victorians" is in many ways the more satisfactory word, but it is ruled out by the fact that the word is already in use as a term to describe natives of Victoria, in Australia, a vast tract of country. "Britishers" is too long. "Imperials" could never withstand the competition of the tuft of beard which bears the same name. "Queensmen" would have little point when a king was on the throne. "Homelanders" means nothing in particular. "Empirists" is too near "Empiric." "Freelanders" is not expressive enough. Altogether we are inclined to consider "Englander" the best word, although the participation of Ireland is not apparent in it. We have therefore sent a cheque for a guinea to the Rev. F. G. Cole, 42, Blenheim-street, Prince's-avenue, Hull, with whom the word "Englander" originated.

H. W., Malton, writes: "I send a few ideas for Competition 29.

1. John Bullies.
2. Read-easy-uns.
3. Semi-colonists (this last contains the two-fold suggestion of being 'unaggressive,' but never able to reach a full stop!).
4. Bigger-Burghers, might also do to counteract the Little Englanders.

As a name for the Institution to which these gentlemen belong I propose the Lowly Roaming Empire."

Thel's MSS. for Special Competition were duly received.

Competition No. 30 (New Series).

In the Globe of a few days ago was this paragraph: "A hostess who had a mania for setting her guests intellectual puzzles, by way of keeping them quiet in the evening, offered the other day a prize for the best parody of any well-known proverb. The painful frowns that at once gathered on the faces of the company suggested to one of the guests a brilliant idea 'It is not the scowl,' he said, 'that makes the skunk.'" The example given is not a very good one, but it illustrates the game. The historic example is, perhaps, Lewis Carroll's advice to writers: "Take care of the sense and the sounds will take care of themselves." We offer a prize of a guinea to the author of the best parody of a proverb.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, April 10. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the first column of p. 320, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

THE SUNKEN BELL. BY GERHART HAUPTMANN.

This "fairy play," to which we refer elsewhere, is published with the written approval of Gerhart Hauptmann. The translator is Mr. Charles Henry Meltzer. (Heinemann. 3s. 6d.)

THE LIFE OF JOHN RUSKIN. BY W. G. COLLINGWOOD.

A timely re-issue, with timely revisions, of Mr. Collingwood's two-volume work, The Life and Work of John Ruskin. (Methuen & Co. 6s.)

THE CHRISTIAN RACE.

BY THE RIGHT REV. J. C. RYLE, D.D.

Never until now has the venerable ex-Bishop of Liverpool published a volume of sermons. The selection has been made from the Bishop's MSS. by the Rev. T. J. Madden, Archdeacon of Warrington. (Hodder & Stoughton. 7s. 6d.)

THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE LIBRARY:
ENGLISH TOPOGRAPHY, PART XII.

EDITED BY:
F. A. MILNE.

This addition to a capital series deals with Surrey and Sussex. It is rather a pity, we think, that the names of these counties do not appear on the cover, but have to be sought on the title-page. (Stock. 7s. 6d.)

HOW ENGLAND SAVED EUROPE,

VOL. IV.

BY W. H. FITCHETT.

This volume completes Mr. Fitchett's narrative of our wars with France between 1793 and 1815. A good index to the four volumes is given. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

In addition to the foregoing, we have received:

CHATTO &amp; WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS

THE UNCHANGING EAST. By

ROBERT BARR. With Frontispiece. Cr. 8vo, cloth, 6s.
"A brisk and cheerfully written volume of experiences of travel in Egypt, Tripoli, the Holy Land, &c. A happy lack of dates and geographical information will not be resented by the demure reader."—Outlook.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

ANDROMEDA: an Idyll of the Great River. By ROBERT BUCHANAN, Author of "The Shadow of the Sword."

"Mr. Buchanan has clearly drawn upon his own early experiences in London for much of the incidental matter in this story. 'Andromeda' is a strange tale rendered still stranger by the singular beauty of the girl.... This story as a whole is excellent."—Glasgow Herald.

"It is vigorously written; it is set in picturesque scenes; it tells a romantic story, and it describes an attractive heroine. 'Andromeda' is a very sympathetic story. It is certainly one of the best which Mr. Buchanan has given us for quite a long time."—Echo.

"In creating the shaggy sailor savage, Matt Watson, Mr. Buchanan has been forcible and clever; that much abused word 'powerful' is excusable in this case.... Altogether the book is good reading."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"It is well constructed, well written, and readable, and will find, we may be sure, a very considerable public."—Globe.

THE SON of the HOUSE. By

BERTHA THOMAS, Author of "The Violin Player."

"A pleasant domestic story, such as the author has more than once shown that she can write, and her readers will not fail to be charmed by it. Its stronger passages bear fresh witness to her power of developing character, and working out a situation on convincing lines."—Athenaeum.

A SECRET of the NORTH SEA.

By ALGERNON GISSING.

"Of engrossing interest.... A story pulsating with life, full of energy and action, and abounding in instances of literary skill and finish."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"A strong and picturesque story.... A powerful piece of work."—Standard.

SOUR GRAPES: a Romance. By

J. F. CORNISH.

"Susceptible male readers will have difficulty in deciding whether kittenish Ruby Brabrooke or true-hearted Barbara Ashleigh is the more winsome."—Scotsman.

"An absorbing story, the remarkable plot of which is unfolded in a style at once vigorous and polished. The book will be read with interest by all who can appreciate a good story well told."—Studio.

THREE-AND-SIXPENNY STORIES.

A YOUNG DRAGON. By Sarah Tytler,

Author of "Mrs. Carmichael's Goldresses." [April 26.]

AINSLIE'S JU-JU: a Romance of the Interland. By HAROLD BINDLOSS, Author of "In the Niger Country."

WITHOUT the LIMELIGHT: Theatrical

Life as it is. By GEORGE R. SIMS.

"The stories are powerful, and though 'Dagonet' is a jester, his jesting is often akin to tears."—Weekly Sun.

"A very graphic picture.... The fact that the book is here and there autobiographical will add to its attraction for the public."—Globe.

MADAME IZAN. By Mrs. Campbell

PRAED, Author of "Nulma."

"A bright, bizarre novel, suffused by Eastern colour."—Academy.

MISS BALMAINE'S PAST. By B. M.

CROKER, Author of "Terence," &c.

"An entertaining novel.... A very charming story."—Vanity Fair.

The Literary Week.

THE results of our Special Competition will be announced in a Special Supplement in next week's issue of the ACADEMY.

It is evident that in suggesting "The Romance of Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford," as a good subject for an historical novel, "M. C. B." was something of a seer. Last week Mr. Frank Matthew wrote to say that he had been at work upon a romance based on the fall of Strafford for some months. And now Miss Dora McChesney writes to tell us that she has been gathering material for a romance on Strafford's career for the last five years. Mr. Matthew wrote: "I don't want to seem guilty of priggishness on someone else's idea." Miss McChesney writes: "I should not care to have it appear that the theme was suggested to me by any chance mention." We shall be pleased to register any other timely declarations on the subject.

THE first number of the Daily Express, Mr. C. A. Pearson's new morning newspaper, will appear on Tuesday next, April 24.

TO-MORROW (Saturday) the Daily Mail will print the first of a series of South African letters from Mr. Rudyard Kipling. The sum collected by the Daily Mail's clever working of the "Absent-Minded Beggar" poem exceeds £97,000. This is at the rate of £2,000 a line.

MR. RUDYARD KIPLING has in hand a new series of animal stories on the lines of the "Just So" stories. He was moved to write them by the receipt of a letter from the seven-year-old son of Mr. Doubleday, his American publisher. Little Nelson Doubleday demanded to be told "How the Elephant Got His Trunk," "How the Giraffe Got His Rubber Neck," and "How the Kangaroo Got His Long Legs." Mr. Kipling has done his best to oblige, and the story of the elephant and his trunk has already appeared in the Ladies' Home Journal.

THE eagerness of Americans to read new novels can only be described as astonishing. Hardly a month passes but a new candidate leaps into favour, and into a circulation that must rouse pangs in the breasts of many British authors. The latest recruit is The Gentleman from Indiana, by Mr. Booth Tarkington. Its growth in popular favour is tabulated in one of the leading American weekly papers thus:

4,667 copies were sold by November 1.
8,498 copies were sold by December 1.
13,015 copies were sold by January 1.
17,763 copies were sold by February 1.
22,616 copies were sold by March 1.

In the first week of March alone, over 6,000 copies were sold.

A remark of the Boston Transcript that "it's the kind of novel that Abraham Lincoln might have written," seems to open out a new field in criticism.

It is with sincere regret that we record the death of Mr. R. A. M. Stevenson, at the age of fifty-three. He was Robert Louis Stevenson's cousin. Several of the Letters in the two volumes edited by Mr. Colvin were addressed to him, and for many years, the years when his cousin was winning his way, the two lived in intimate companionship. He was the "young man with the cream tarts" in R. L. S.'s story of "The Suicide Club." Those who knew R. A. M. Stevenson wondered that he did not achieve more, for his gifts were many and rare. But his temperament was not the temperament that leads to worldly success. He lived fully, but he was the least ambitious of men. Choosing painting as a career, he studied under Ortmans and Carolus Duran, and exhibited fitfully; but the keenness of his critical vision, his interest in all the schools of painting, his versatility, prevailed against him as a producer. Then he became an art critic, writing brilliantly for the Saturday Review, and during the past few years for the Pall Mall Gazette, where, latterly, he showed an unexpected tolerance. His principal publication was The Art of Velasquez, but writing never made any real call to him. It was in talk that he expressed himself. To listen to him, when he was in the mood, was a privilege. His mind was reflective with all its agility and brilliance; and while ideas rained from him, he was also a listener. But one must not enlarge upon him as a talker. R. L. Stevenson has done that once and for all. He is Spring-Heel'd Jack in "Talk and Talkers," who "may at any moment turn his powers of transmigration on yourself, create for you a view you never held, and then furiously fall on you for holding it." Here is the passage from "Talk and Talkers" describing Spring-Heel'd Jack:

The very best talker, with me, is one whom I shall call Spring-Heel'd Jack. I say so, because I never knew any one who mingled so largely the possible ingredients of converse. In the Spanish proverb, the fourth man necessary to compound a salad, is a madman to mix it: Jack is that madman. I know not which is more remarkable: the insane lucidity of his conclusions, the humorous eloquence of his language, or his power of method, bringing the whole of life into the focus of the subject treated, mixing the conversational salad like a drunken god. He doubles like the serpent, changes and flashes like the shaken kaleidoscope, transmigrates bodily into the views of others, and so, in the twinkling of an eye and with a heady rapture, turns questions inside out and flings them empty before you on the ground, like a triumphant conjuror. It is my common practice when a piece of conduct puzzles me, to attack it in the presence of Jack with such grossness, such partiality and such wearing iteration, as at length shall spur him up in its defence. In a moment he transmigrates, dons the required character, and with moon-struck philosophy justifies the act in question. I can fancy nothing to compare with the vim of these impersonations, the strange scale of language, flying from Shakespeare to Kant, and from Kant to Major Dyngwell—

"As fast as a musician scatters sounds
Out of an instrument—"

the sudden, sweeping generalisations, the absurd irrelevant particularities, the wit, wisdom, folly, humour, eloquence and bathos, each startling in its kind, and yet all luminous in the admired disorder of their combination.

WE suppose that few people read Cowper's poetry in these days when we are all for the "lyric cry." But we shall hear a great deal about Cowper in the next fortnight. He died April 25, 1900; and his Centenary is to be celebrated at Olney next Wednesday. For those of our readers who wish to be there in spirit we give the substance of the programme which has been arranged:

- 12.30. Luncheon at the Bull Hotel.
- 1.0 Visitors will be able to see Cowper's summer-house. (No charge.)
- 1.30. Children of Olney, wearing favours of buff and green (Cowper's colours), will assemble in front of Cowper's House—which has been presented to the town by W. H. Collingridge, Esq.—and sing "God moves in a mysterious way." Every child will then receive a copy of the biography of Cowper, kindly presented by the Religious Tract Society.
- 2.30. Museum publicly opened. Admission 6d.
- 3.30. Public meeting. Admittance 6d. Reserved seats 1s. Chair to be taken by W. W. Carlile, Esq., M.P. Speeches by Dr. Robertson Nicoll, Mr. Clement K. Shorter, and others.
- 5.0 From 5 to 7 Cowper's house at Weston Underwood will be open to visitors. (No charge.)
- 7.30. Special service at the church. Sermon by the Very Rev. F. W. Farrar.

We wish the celebration success, but on paper it looks a trifle formal.

WHO is the young Brahmin about whom Mr. W. B. Yeats writes so prettily in the Speaker? It seems that he made a great impression on "some among us"; that is—we doubt not—among "us" of the Irish literary movement. "Us" had been addicted "when we were all schoolboys" to reading "mystical philosophy and to passing crystals over each other's hands and eyes." Then came a day when "somebody told us he had met a Brahmin in London who knew more of these things than any book." So the young Brahmin was written to, asked, so to speak, to come over into Macedonia and help "us." And being of a meek spirit he came, saw, and conquered. On the very evening of his coming they brought him to a club—a club!—and bade him talk metaphysics, which he did in such sort that he "awed into silence whatever metaphysics the town had." But next day he was remorseful; he looked back on his triumph at the club and called it "intellectual lust." That was clever. You shine first as incendiary, and then as fireman. "And sometimes he would go back over something he had said, and explain to us that his argument had been a fallacy, and apologise to us as though he had offended against good manners." O, Bab, are all thy ballads spent? He told them that his father, who had been the first of his family to leave his native village for two thousand years, had repeated over and over as he lay dying, "The West is dying because of its restlessness." No one seems to have smiled at this. He said "very seriously," "I have thought much about it, and I have never been able to discover any reason why prose should exist." Even then no one seems to have come away. We hope we are not irreverent, but the article secretes many smiles for the reader. The Brahmin taught "us" other things, and among them this: "That all action and all words that lead to action are a little vulgar, a little trivial; nor am I quite certain that any among us has quite awoke out of the dreams he brought us." No? Not recently?

WE referred a few weeks ago to the flourishing state of the book-plate cult, as shown in the birth of a new magazine dedicated to the subject. Alas, book-plate culture has its dark, even its criminal side. A man may smile and smile, to see his collection grow, and be a villain. The librarian of Harvard University has just spread abroad the news of depredations committed in the fine library under his care, and has warned collectors against acquiring certain choice specimens now improperly at large:

During the month of January or February some person, who has had access to the bookstack, has cut from a large number of the older books the front covers, on which the book-plate is pasted, leaving the volumes on the shelves, to all appearance unmutated till removed from their places.

Many of the plates thus obtained have passed through the hands of Dr. C. E. Cameron, of Boston, who claims to have come by them honestly, but has been arrested for larceny and awaits trial in June. Several persons who purchased specimens of these plates from Dr. Cameron have generously and honourably returned them to the Library; but there are still many plates unaccounted for, which are likely to be offered to unsuspecting purchasers, and I beg to warn all such that any of the older engraved book-plates of the Harvard Library now in the market are to be viewed with suspicion, for the books which bear them have but rarely ever been allowed to pass from the possession of the Library, and at present this almost never occurs.

The book-plates which particularly excite the interest of collectors are those which mark the gifts of Governor John Haucock, Thomas Hollis, the Province of New Hampshire, and other generous donors, received just after the destruction of the Library by fire in 1764.

Other particulars are given, and will be found in the Librarian's recent letter to the Times.

OUR recent estimate of the merits of the American historical novel, as now being written and sold by the hundred thousand, is not contradicted by some remarks of the New York Commercial Advertiser, which, with a mixture of business shrewdness and literary cynicism, pronounces the historical novel a good object of enterprise. "Any man with a literary temperament, and a capacity for compilation," it says encouragingly, "stands a very good chance of success in this field."

The critics are bland and the public cordial, and there will be plenty of people to say that the fifth historical novel is better than any of the preceding four, and the sixth is more wonderful yet. And while hard work is necessary, it is a kind of work that can be systematised and makes comparatively slight drain on the creative force. It is a good, straightforward, definite job, with materials ready to your hand. A part of it consists in rearranging certain well-tried properties, and some parts could almost be let out on sub-contract. Almost anyone will soon be able to handle the George Washington scenes, and duels will become a mere matter of clerical routine.

Nor need style and technique present any difficulties, for we are assured:

You do not have to create an atmosphere. It is already made for you. Historical associations will help you out when your art fails. Rig a man up in small clothes and silk stockings, give him a sword and a peruke and four or five old expletives, and a hot temper and a brave heart, and the thing is half done. Put in a few "ans" and "twines," and "tises," and "say I's," and the conversation will fit any past century you like. . . . Richard Carvel's conversation often spans three centuries in a single sentence. But none of these things are noticed if enough happens. That is the one relentless law of the present historical novel. The hero must be kept busy from beginning to end, with never an instant's pause in heroism. The art that can so build a character that he holds you whether he is doing anything worth mentioning or not, is not needed here. For the business of clinging to the masts of sinking ships, hurling back insults in other people's teeth, standing unmoved amid fearful carnage, and waiting for a proud, capricious beauty to recognise his worth, there is scarcely any need of a character at all. He is not a man but a literary storm centre, and requires only four or five large, plain virtues and a good physique.

WE are asked if we can give the date of composition and the author's name of the following poem. It is called "Illusion":

God and I in space alone,
And nobody else in view,
And "Where are the people, O Lord?" I said,
"The earth below, and the sky o'erhead
And the dead whom I once knew?"
"That was a dream," God smiled and said,
"A dream that seemed to be true.
There are no people, living or dead;
There is nothing but ME and you."
"Why do I feel no fear?" I asked,
"Meeting you here this way.
That I have sinned I know full well;
And is there a heaven, and is there a hell,
And is this the Judgment Day?"
"Nay, those were but dreams," the great God said,
"Dreams that have ceased to be;
There are no such things as sin or fear;
There is no you; you never have been;
There is nothing at all but ME."

IN the "Ruskin Memorial Number" of Saint George is printed the following touching letter from Mr. Ruskin to his publisher, written on April 15, 1878:

DEAR ALLEN,—How good and kind you are, and have always been. I trust, whatever happens to me, that your position with the copyright of my books, if anybody cares for them, and with the friends gained by your honesty and industry, is secure on your little piece of Kentish home territory. I write this letter to release you from all debt to me of any kind, and to leave you, with my solemn thanks for all the energy and faith of your life, given to me so loyally, in all that I ever tried to do for good, to do now what is best for your family and yourself.

As I look back on my life in this closing time I find myself in debt to every friend that loved me, for what a score of lives could not repay, and would fain say to them all, as to you, words of humiliation which I check only because they are so vain.

Ever (Nay—in such a time as this what "ever" is there except "to-day"—once more—) your thankful and sorrowful friend—Master, no more—

J. RUSKIN.

LITERARY collectors to whom pompous and fulsome dedications are objects of interest (and they are often very amusing) may not be familiar with an example to which the Rev. George J. C. Scott draws our attention. It is found in a book of Essays by Sir William Corne-Waleys, the Younger, Knight, printed at the Hand and Plough, in Fleet-street, 1600. The dedication is written by a friend of the author, and we quote a portion of it:

To the Right Vertuous and Most Honorable Ladies the Lady Sara Hastings, the Lady Theodosia Dudley, the Lady Mary Wingfield, and the Lady Mary Dyer. . . . The worke of it selfe being vertuous, it cannot but be gracious to your Ladiships; for in this backward Age (too much declining from Vertue) who are more fit to protect and defend her then your Ladiships, who are so neerely allied to Vertue, that she hath chosen you for her Temple, therein inhrined her selfe, and in you onely desireth to be adored. Your Ladiships are neerely conjoined in blood, three of you being Sisters by nature, the fourth by Love; but that conjunction is nothing so noble (although very noble) as that sweete combination of your spirits, which are all so deuoted to God, that though there be a Quaternity of your persons, yet those persons are so guided by those Angel-like spirits, that they make up a delightful harmony, a Soule-ravishing Musick, and a most pleasing and perfect Simpathy of Affections.

If then your Ladiships shall patronize these Essays, what venomous tongues shall dare to infect them? If you like who will dislike them? What you allowe, nothing but Enuie, Detraction, and Ignorance wil disallow, whose infectious breaths shall be so purified by the precious balme of your Vertues, that all shall sodainlie dissolue into the sweete aire of applause. They are now (Honorable Ladies) your owne, being freeлие giuen to your Ladiships by the true hearted affection of their Author.

THE date of the decline of the fulsome dedication is perhaps marked by the sensible action of Mrs. Delany, who, being pressed in 1749 by a Mr. Ballard to accept the dedication of his work, Memoirs of Learned Ladies, insisted on writing the dedication herself. At any rate, she sent Ballard the following as a model, with an injunction that its tone of distant respect should not be exceeded:

MADAM,—I am very much obliged to you for your indulgence in giving me leave to dedicate part of this work to you; and, as I am informed you were resolved against addresses of this nature, I will not tire you with encomiums on your family, your person, or your qualifications, as my intention in publishing the book is to raise the mind above the common concerns of this world; and I hope the examples here set before you will animate you to good and great actions, and then your obligation to me will be at least equal to mine to you.

But this did not suit Mr. Ballard, and the dedication, which was to have been so sober, appeared as follows:

To Mrs. Delany, the truest judge and brightest pattern of all the accomplishments which adorn her sex, these Memoirs of Learned Ladies in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries are most humbly inscribed by her obedient servant,
GEORGE BALLARD.

REFERRING to our article on "Disappearing Authors," Messrs. McGeachy & Co. write to us from Glasgow:

Your method of asking booksellers in different parts of the country regarding the sale of books by Jane Austen, Trollope, Kingsley, Reade, and Lever, is a very wise one. The reports show a variety difficult to explain. For why should an author sell well in one part of the kingdom and not in another? With us, as large retail booksellers, the books by Jane Austen have a large sale. We think there are signs of a renewed interest in her writings. Charles Reade's Cloister and the Hearth is one of the best selling novels we have, and Never Too Late to Mend and Hard Cash have a steady sale. Kingsley is still popular, though many of his books have fallen into the background. Westward Ho! is, of course, the favourite, but Hypatia and Hereward the Wake are constantly selling. Lever and Trollope are decidedly slow at the present time. In these two instances there is the absence of good editions at a moderate price, and when such editions are published an increasing interest will at once be shown by the public. The "dainty edition" has raised the taste of the present generation with regard to the general get-up of their books. These must be well printed and neatly bound.

A revival of interest in a writer not too well known has occurred in connection with the uniform issue of George Borrow's works by Mr. John Murray. For many years, admirers of Borrow asked for a worthy edition of his books. The result has been remarkable, and the expressions of new readers show that these delightful books have lost none of their charm.

Of course, we speak only for ourselves. The experience of every bookseller differs according to his position on the map.

IN her introduction to Anne Brontë's little read novel Wildfell Hall, just issued in the Haworth Edition, Mrs. Humphry Ward tells a story showing that Anne possessed "the Brontë seriousness, the Brontë strength of will." When four years old she was asked what a little child like her wanted most. "The tiny creature replied—if it were not a Brontë it would be incredible—'Age and experience.'" Anne Brontë's gift was not equal to Charlotte's or Emily's, and Mrs. Ward introduces an interesting comparison between the poetical powers of Anne and Emily. Both girls, it happened, wrote verses expressive of their longing to be at home, and it is here that the difference in their powers comes out :

From the twilight schoolroom at Roehead, Emily turns in thought to the distant upland of Haworth and the little stone-built house upon its crest :

" There is a spot, 'mid barren hills,
Where winter howls, and driving rain ;
But, if the dreary tempest chills,
There is a light that warms again.

The house is old, the trees are bare,
Moonless above bends twilight's dome,
But what on earth is half so dear—
So longed for—as the hearth of home ?

The mute bird sitting on the stone,
The dank moss dripping from the wall,
The thorn-trees gaunt, the walks o'ergrown,
I love them—how I love them all ! "

Anne's verses, written from one of the houses where she was a governess, express precisely the same feeling, and movement of mind. But notice the instinctive rightness and swiftness of Emily's, the blurred weakness of Anne's :

" For yonder garden, fair and wide,
With groves of evergreen,
Long winding walks, and borders trim,
And velvet lawns between—

Restore to me that little spot,
With gray walls compassed round,
Where knotted grass neglected lies,
And weeds usurp the ground.

Though all around this mansion high
Invites the foot to roam,
And though its halls are fair within—Oh, give me back my Home ! "

Bibliographical.

THE introduction of Shakespeare, with a "speaking" part, into a novel called Mary Paget, reminds one of similarly bold adventures in the past. I cannot recollect whether the late William Black had the courage to put the bard bodily into his Judith Shakespeare (perhaps one of my correspondents will tell me), but we can all recall Landor's Examination of William Shakespeare, and some of us have not forgotten a certain play called (with delightful brevity and simplicity) "Shakespeare," which had a brief career in a London theatre some eight years ago. In the last-named, if I remember rightly, the bard was presented as a young man, who, after engaging himself to Anne Hathaway, goes up to London and loses his heart to Elizabeth Throgmorton. If my memory serves me, the author of this piece portrayed the poet as firing off bits of blank verse from the plays which he was afterwards to write ! And we had not only Shakespeare, but Spenser and Raleigh and Ben Jonson, whose spoken utterances, I regret to say, did not at all suggest the power or charm of their published efforts. But there is no limit to the self-confidence of the present-day playwright. Did not one such follow Horne in putting Christopher Marlowe on the boards ? and was not Molière similarly treated by another ?

Such a handbook of British and American fiction as Mr. A. E. Baker is said to have compiled or to be compiling should be, if adequately done, an eminently desirable work. We have no such manual at present. It is true that Mr. Percy Russell published, in 1894, A Guide to British and American Novels, in which he discoursed successively of the historical, the military, the political, the Scotch, the Irish, the religious, the "temperance" tale, and so forth, and that he supplied a couple of somewhat useful indices. Mr. Russell's book, however, lacked authority as criticism, and in the way of fact was not sufficiently precise and systematic. Now, Mr. Baker, I gather, will be systematic or nothing, and we may depend, I think, upon his accuracy in detail. An absolutely complete classification of English (which includes American) fiction would be a boon if it could be achieved ; but can it ? Is it not out of the power of one man, even though he should have devoted all his working hours to it ? It seems rather a task for a syndicate or a society, every member of which would contribute from the fruits of his or her reading.

Mr. Beerbohm Tree having selected "Rip Van Winkle" as the next subject for stage interpretation, we may expect that there will shortly be an increased demand for Washington Irving's famous narrative. It so happens that no fewer than three illustrated editions of the tale were issued in London last year—one by Mr. Macquene, another by Messrs. Putnam, and the third (with "Christmas Eve") by Mr. Nister. In 1898 the tale formed part of a little volume of Irving miscellanies published by Service & Paton. Previously to that there was Messrs. Macmillan's illustrated edition in 1893. Of The Sketch-Book itself the recent reprints have been numerous—one in two volumes in 1894, a "student's" edition (and a cheap one besides) in 1895, and yet another in 1897. Those playgoers to whom Irving's narrative is new will be surprised to find how elaborate a superstructure the playwrights have built upon a slight foundation.

The promised new edition (illustrated) of Leigh Hunt's Old Court Suburb will be welcome to many, though the book, which is not yet half-a-century old, is by no means out of print. Messrs. Hurst & Blackett, I believe, still publish it in neat one-volume form. In all probability it has not been much read of late. Many people fancy that the suburb in question is Chelsea, whereas, of course, it is Kensington. It will be remembered that an illustrated edition of Hunt's other topographical and historical book, The Town, was brought out in 1893. Hunt was one of the first to write what may be called the picturesque guide-book, and his example was improved upon by certain of his more recent imitators. Both The Town and The Old Court Suburb are somewhat out of date, but a little judicious annotation is all that they require.

The poets of the future have some reason to dread the doubtful glory of a "penny edition" of their works. I was glancing the other day through Messrs. Newnes's penny Tennyson, and found that the simple title "Godiva" had been enlarged into "The Lady Godiva" ; "The splendour falls on castle walls" had been headed "Dying, Dying, Dying" ; the stanzas beginning "Ring out, wild bells," had been entitled "Ring Out—Ring In" ; while those beginning "Love thou thy land" had been christened "Patriotism" ! More than this, I found that the editor had taken it upon himself to number not only every stanza in the book, but even the paragraph-sections of such narrative poems as the "Morte d'Arthur." I say nothing about the paper and the printing of the penn'orth, but I think the text of the poet should have been presented as he left it.

Turning over the pages of Sir M. Grant Duff's latest instalment of Notes from a Diary, I found him asking a Roman Catholic ecclesiastic whether he knew "the story of Gregory XVI. offering his snuff-box to a Cardinal, who declined it, saying, 'No, your Holiness, I have not that vice,' to which the Pope immediately replied, 'If it had been a vice, you would have had it.'" Now, this colloquy is almost word for word identical with a well-known passage of arms between Claude Melnotte and Beauseant in "The Lady of Lyons," and it would be interesting to know whether this anecdote of Gregory XVI. was in circulation before Bulwer wrote the play ; if it was, the dramatist obviously "conveyed" the jest—which was unfair to its author.

A Needless "Life."

The Life of Edward FitzGerald. By John Glyde.
(Pearsons, Ltd. 6s.)

MR. GLYDE'S book contains some new stories of FitzGerald and some interesting local matter; but as a whole it is the failure which every student of FitzGerald's Letters might have not unkindly predicted. No "Life," properly speaking, of Edward FitzGerald is possible; you might as well ask for a "Life" of Amiel, who never lived, but merely proposed to do so. FitzGerald did not even plan a life; finding himself alive, he settled down to vegetate intellectually. Look at his portrait. What a kindly, heavy saturninity; what a resolution to be only so much awake as he deemed worth his while! FitzGerald let the world alone, and the world ought to return the compliment. We can do with biographies of soldiers and Parliamentary hands, and we have recently had the biography of a successful coal merchant. That is all right; but when a man is so sublimely indifferent to the footlights and the gold dust as was Edward FitzGerald, we ought to cherish that instance of retiredness. We are all grimed and pushing and envious; here was a man who was not; for heaven's sake let it be somewhat difficult to find him in libraries as it was in life. The very notion of anything so pat and measureable as "The Life" of Edward FitzGerald is displeasing to us. We prefer to go burrowing for the Life in the Letters—Letters which, for a certain quaint nookiness, are unsurpassed in the language. What would FitzGerald have said if he had picked up a harmful, unnecessary "Life" of his "dear Sévigné," in whose Letters he lived for days together?

Mr. Glyde has meant well, and there are things in his book which lovers of the Letters may like to note. FitzGerald once made for his own use a list of all the characters in Mme. Sévigné's Letters, and at another time he drew up a chronology of Charles Lamb's life. Well, Mr. Glyde finds us in material for making such book-marker notes, but this is to condemn his book as a work of art. Our special regret is that Mr. Glyde did not limit himself to the task for which he was competent, and for which there was an opening—that of tracing FitzGerald's footprints at Woodbridge, Boulge, Lowestoft, Aldborough, and his other Suffolk haunts. The local information he has collected would have made a thin, but very acceptable, pamphlet. Thus from London, from Nishapur, and from Woodbridge had poured three contributory streams of intelligence about FitzGerald; and the local tribute would have had a charming entity, would almost have defied criticism. But "The Life"—oh, no! The very words toll us back to the Letters—which are a thing most precious and absolute. They are medicine for minds that would fain repel the world a little while using it, that long for peace though declining it. Ah, these dear half-way philosophers, whose teachings require of us no sudden flight from the pavement to the empyrean, but who show us how a man may simplify his life! FitzGerald was one of the band, and in that kind we name him with Horace, and Montaigne, and with Matthew Arnold, wistful at the grave of Sévigné. Formal duty seems to require us to describe Mr. Glyde's book in detail; but the pages slip past our fingers. They are good for excavation. There are things to pencil into the margins of the Letters, but they are not such things as these: "Fitz-Gerald (Mr. Glyde will hyphenate the name) had old-fashioned tastes, and in poetry and great love for the ancients. . . . In the world of Fiction he revelled in Sir Walter Scott's works." Nor does the reader of the Letters want to see FitzGerald's moods stated in terms like these: "He found more real enjoyment in the fisherman's cottage than in the home of the squire, where, he said, awful formalities stifle the genuine flow of nature." That is banal and inexact. Banal and inexact, too, is Mr. Glyde's description of FitzGerald's feeling toward London as one of "hatred." He did not want to live in London; nothing would have induced him to do so. But he always paid London the compliment of excusing himself. The tacit reproaches of his friends were not lost on him; though he would not live in London, none knew better than he that he could not well live without London. He never plumed himself on his retirement. Living out of the world, it was he who felt the drawbacks. "People affect to talk of this kind of life as very beautiful and philosophical," he wrote to Frederic Tennyson, "but I don't; men ought to have an ambition to stir and travel, and fill their heads and senses; but so it is." So it was to the end. He trudged Suffolk roads, saw the sea dimple, read old books and the Reviews, collected pictures, pottered among his flowers, fed his doves, and wrote the most unaffected letters about it all.

The Letters have been given to us with a liberal hand, and we are not sure that we want—or ought to take—a single fact about FitzGerald that comes to us but through them. We are not a whit interested in Mr. Glyde's chapter about FitzGerald's marriage and what the "ladies of Woodbridge"—confound them!—thought of it. We do not care to peer into the little cottage at Boulge, and note its bachelor chaos; nor are we very grateful for the information that FitzGerald always wore his hat when seated by his fire, and that he fidgetted his beard with a paper-knife while his reader read to him. Somehow a knowledge of these things seems a little mean; we put it aside. Even Mr. Glyde's list of books in FitzGerald's library—classified (as assuredly FitzGerald did not classify them) under Fine Arts, Essays, Music, Dramatic, &c.—is curiously unacceptable. The books do not interest us until FitzGerald has taken one of them off the shelf himself. We do not want to know the bounds of his resources, the thus-far-and-no-farther of his browings alone. Charles Lamb was sorry that he had ever seen the MS. of "Lycidas," with Milton's corrections, and we should regret taking an inventory of those bookshelves at Little Grange. All this may seem fanciful and even ungracious; but if so it comes of our allegiance to the Letters. Not a jot of their charm must be imperilled.

We like to think that Nature ordains such lives as Edward FitzGerald's to be medicine to other lives. FitzGerald's Letters are antidotal and curative. And the Letters are FitzGerald's life, therefore the life was good and effective. That is very simple reasoning, but what is to upset it? FitzGerald might have done greater things? Really!—greater than his Letters?—those delightful records of desultory culture, those naïve statements of the things which a rich, yet oddly restricted, nature cared for, and the things it didn't care a rap for? We doubt it. To write the Letters it was necessary that FitzGerald should live in a Suffolk village, where you could hear the rasping of a saw down the length of the main street. He was lazy, but remember that he had the special grace not to repent; and if he refused laborious days, neither did he sport with Amaryllis in the shade. The result was the Letters, and the English "Rubaiyat." And these are enough.

Pale, Tender, and Fragile.

Decorations, in Verse and Prose. By Ernest Dowson.
(Leonard Smithers & Co.)

THIS little volume derives a painful interest from its being the last work of a young poet, who recently died under sorrowful circumstances. The verse (for the prose is little but verse not run into mould) is in substance agnosticism unsustained by the joy of life; in style it is exceedingly craftsmanlike and perfect, with a sense of form that lends appropriateness to the title. "A poet of one mood in all his lays," Mr. Dowson's verse has an almost morbid grace and delicacy, which can only be conveyed by Rossetti's word gracile, and a decadent melancholy. Without fire or figurative quality, it lends itself best to negatives.

He belongs to those who find their affinities in the decadent frailty of such French poets as Paul Verlaine. It is not, however, the later symboliste Verlaine to whom he leans, but the more typical Verlaine of the sighful, faint impressions. To photograph sensitively the effect of a scene, an incident, upon the emotions, and reproduce it in verse with all its delicate transience, without comment, without reflection—an effect, or rather affect (if we might coin the word for the occasion) transferred from the sensibilities of the poet to those of the reader—such is the aim of this French school, in which stood foremost the poet with the satyr-visage and the touch in verse as of maiden's fingers. No interpreters they of nature, but rather strings moved by the wind—and with a like melancholy plaint in all their music. There is much of kindred character in Dowson's poetry, though it need not follow that he deliberately or consciously adopted the same artistic shibboleth. His sympathies he has openly shown in a few poems which are direct translations from Verlaine. It may well be that Verlaine is inimitable; it is very sure that Verlaine is untranslatable. All Mr. Dowson's finished art and native sympathy has failed to capture the uncapturable charm of the originals: the sense is there, and somewhat of the subtly simple diction, but the delicate sigh of the verse has volatilised through the grosser English syllables. Nor does the English writer always convey the expressional nuances of the Frenchman. Take a poem at which many readers of the ACADEMY, some time ago, tried their hands in our "Competition" column. Thus Mr. Dowson:

The sky is up above the roof,
So blue, so soft!
A tree there, up above the roof,
Swayeth aloft.
A bell within the sky we see,
Chimes low and faint:
A bird upon that tree we see
Maketh complaint.
Dear God! is not the life up there
Simple and sweet?
How peacefully are borne up there
Sounds of the street!
What hast thou done, who comest here
To weep away?
Where hast thou laid, who comest here,
Thy youth away?

It is good; but no reader would surmise from it that the original was a masterpiece famous in modern French poetry. "Swayeth aloft" misses the exact significance of berce sa palme, upon which the felicity of the line depends; and the translation goes to pieces upon the last stanza, which no translation can suggest. So does a poem of which the original has not the peculiar technical difficulty of this:

Nay! the more desolate,
Because, I know not why
(Neither for love nor hate)
My heart is desolate.

Whither has vanished the melodious childlike wail of C'est bien la pire peine

De ne savoir pourquoi,
Sans amour et sans haine
Mon cœur a tant de peine?

Mr. Dowson himself has more of Verlaine in spirit than in form, for he tries many modes—villanelle, rondeau, sonnet; but there is always the one manner—subdued, minutely finished—searching his diction fastidiously rather than ostentatiously, with no startlingly refracted colour. And the substance is always one—a cry of premature disillusion and weariness. To him and the young poets of his class the days have come in youth of which they say, "They please me not." To him or to his French models; for one would have a surer conviction of these writers' sincerity in their pessimistic chorus if it were not so plain that the pessimism was à la mode de Paris. Yet the prevalence of the disease need not be doubted. He rebukes "A Lady Asking Foolish Questions":

Why am I sorry, Chloe? Because the moon is far:
And who am I to be straitened in a little earthly star?
Because thy face is fair? And what if it had not been?
The fairest face of all is the face I have not seen.
Because the land is cold, and however I scheme and plot,
I cannot find a ferry to the land where I am not.
Because thy lips are red and thy breasts upbraid the snow?
(There is neither white nor red in the pleasure where I go.)
Because thy lips grow pale and thy breasts grow dun and fall?
I go where the wind blows, Chloe, and am not sorry at all.

That is the daintily sung confession of unfaith which is the melancholy burden of all Mr. Dowson's verse (though nowhere else does he slip into such unpleasantly ungallant phrases as he uses to the hapless Chloe). It is Shelley's "longing for something afar," with the addition that there is no something afar. We hear it again in the mournfully musical lyric, "Venite Descendamus":

Let be at last; give over words and sighing,
Vainly were all things said:
Better at last to find a place for lying
Only dead.
Silence were best; with songs and sighing over;
Now be the music mute;
Now let the dead, red leaves of autumn cover
A vain lute.
Silence is best; for ever and for ever,
We will go down and sleep,
Somewhere beyond her ken, where she need never Come to weep.
Let be at last: colder she grows and colder;
Sleep and the night were best;
Lying at last where we cannot behold her,
We may rest.

When he is not attempting an impossible rivalry of translation, he handles verse with accomplished melody, as in this poem. Pale, tender, and fragile like that which has in it the seeds of death, it fitly exemplifies Dowson's not strong nor strongly original muse. And now—he has gone down and slept.

A Pearl of Great Price.

A History of the Textual Criticism of the New Testament.
By Martin R. Vincent, D.D. (Macmillan.)

PERFECTLY honourable men, no doubt, were the Brothers Elzevir, publishers, of Leyden. Yet, by means of an elegant format and a boastful phrase, they succeeded in landing on the book-market of Christian Europe a version of the New Testament from the corrupt text of which a quarter of a millennium has not been more than sufficient time to emancipate public opinion. "Here then," they announced on the title-page of their edition of 1633, "you have a Text Received of All Men, in which we give you nothing garbled or corrupt." This vaunted "Received Text" was essentially the text of Erasmus, founded on a few inferior MSS. So little, indeed, did Erasmus understand his responsibility that his solitary twelfth-century MS. of the Revelation giving out before the last six verses, he scrupled not to supply an indifferent Greek rendering for which he had no MS. authority at all. The degrees by which the Textus Receptus has been ousted from the extravagant esteem in which for so long a time it was held is clearly and concisely told in the book before us.

In 1628 Charles I. received from the Patriarch of Constantinople the Alexandrian Codex, known familiarly as A; and in 1657 Bishop Walton, of Chester, published his London Polyglot, with the diverse readings of this ancient MS. at the foot of the pages. Courcelles and Fell, Dean of Christ Church, led the way to John Mill, who, in 1707, published at Oxford an edition of the New Testament in which he foreshadowed the results of modern methods. He estimated the variants known in his time at 30,000. The Greek MSS. collated to-day, nearly 4,000, yield more than five times that number.

As time went on and diligence was multiplied, the extraordinary difficulty of reconstructing in its purity the Text, of which the original autographs had perished, became more evident. The method of counting authorities for a given reading was soon shown to be fallacious. By reason of greater age one MS. may outweigh the authority of a dozen others of later date. Not that age is by any means decisive; for whereas a MS. of the fourth century may have been copied from one but little older than itself, a MS. of the eleventh century may have been copied directly from one of the third century, which in turn may derive immediately from the autograph. Another maddening consideration is that a MS. is not necessarily of the same value throughout: internal evidence may show that different parts are copied from different exemplars.

And this leads to the classification of MSS. according to their genealogy, which was first attempted by Bengel, a Lutheran pastor of Württemberg, in 1734. He also it was who first formulated the now familiar canon that "the difficult reading is to be preferred to the easy," since it is more likely that the scribe has altered a passage with a view to removing a solecism, or an apparent contradiction or misquotation, than that he should have introduced such a thing. This principle Griesbach, who published his text in 1805, breaking for the first time clean away from the Textus Receptus, embodied with others: that not single documents but recensions (a word used rather awkwardly for families) of MSS. are to be counted; that the shorter reading is to be preferred to the longer, on account of the scribe's tendency to include marginal notes in the text and to fill out an ellipse; and that the reading which at first sight appears to convey a false sense is to be chosen. The classification of MSS. also received a further development at his hands.

Passing over Lachmann and lesser names we come to Tischendorf, famous for the discovery, in the monastery of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai, of the fourth-century Aleph (Codex Sinaiticus). This he borrowed and carried off to Cairo, where, with the aid of two German secretaries of seraphic energy, he transcribed the 110,000 lines of it and noted the 12,000 changes made by later hands. This document is, perhaps, one of fifty prepared by order of Constantine for the churches of his eastern capital in 331. It contains some thousand readings sustained by the oldest Fathers and Versions (i.e., translations), and not found in the Vatican (B) or Alexandrian (A) codices.

The Sinaitic MS. had great weight with Westcott and Hort, whose New Testament appeared in 1881. Dr. Hort assigns it, with B, to the oldest of his four great families of MSS.; their coincidences he attributes to "the extreme antiquity of the common original from which the ancestors of the two have diverged." The Revisers of 1881 (whose text varies in over 1,600 places from the text used by the divines of King James) follow closely the readings favoured by Westcott and Hort.

Yet even now the traditional reverence for the Received Text is not dead—unless, indeed, it was buried with the late Dean Burgon of Chichester. Burgon's wit and delicious perversity make his Revision Revised one of the most entertaining of books. His argument in favour of the Received Text is based on the conviction that the Divine Spirit which guides the Church would never permit the words which He dictated to be lost or changed. The reversion to ancient authorities, therefore, he altogether mocks. If these documents have been preserved, that shows, he declares, only that they are worthless: had they been of value they would have perished long since of honest handling. After pouring contempt upon Aleph, B, A, and C, the Dean proceeds:

Imagine it generally proposed, by the aid of four such conflicting documents, to readjust the funeral oration of Pericles, or to reëdit Hamlet. Risum teneatis, amici? Why, some of the poet's most familiar lines would cease to be recognisable: e.g., A.—"Toby or not Toby, that is the question." Aleph.—"To be a tub or not to be a tub, the question is that." C.—"The question is, to beat or not to beat Toby?" D (the "singular codex").—"The only question is this, to beat that Toby or to be a tub?"

With this delightful nonsense, which illustrates the lighter side of a science which has been pursued with such passionate devotion, we may take leave of Dr. Vincent's admirable little book. Nothing could be better adapted to the use of those who would gain a general view of the results and fascinating methods of Textual Criticism in this particular field.

Andromache Up to Date.

Andromache. By Gilbert Murray. (Heinemann.)

It was an audacious experiment of Prof. Murray's to take a classic theme and to write around it a modern drama in a manner obviously inspired by Ibsen and by Maeterlinck. Mr. G. W. Steevens attempted a somewhat similar feat in "The Dialogues of the Dead." But, as the Latin grammar puts it, you may expel Nature with a fork, yet she will always be back upon you; and the completeness of Prof. Murray's design is more than once marred by the fatality of classical reminiscence. "Now, by Thetis, stranger, in shape God has made you king-like, but within a very fool!" comes as an odd patch on the web of dialogue; and Andromache and the rest are but too ready, on the slightest provocation, to break out in lines and half-lines of the blank verse which is their natural speech. "I am a king's son; I must have my kingdom," says Orestes, and we believe Prof. Murray hopes that it will be read as prose: and Andromache; "The gods' hearts may be hard, but man's is tender; only very hungry and sore afraid and wild as a hunted beast on the mountain." Apart from such blemishes, the drama is astonishingly clever and unexpectedly interesting. The bald, unadorned way of speech, all arabesques and rhetoric strictly excluded, through which, rather than in which, the characters express themselves is admirably handled. Is not this Maeterlinckian?

PYLADES.

Nay, you fear nothing; that is why I must fear for you.

ORESTES.

What is there to fear for me? Most like I shall come back just as I am.

PYLADES

That is the one thing that cannot be!

Andromache was the subject of Attic dramas by Sophocles, Euripides, and Iophon. That of Euripides is alone extant, and from the plot of this Prof. Murray's is varied. It was, perhaps, discreet to select for rivalry one of the least effective of even the Euripidean masterpieces. Hector slain and Troy taken, Andromache becomes the booty of Pyrrhus, son of Achilles and King of Pthia, to whom she bears a son, Molossus. Pyrrhus marries Hermione, daughter of the deathless Helen. Hermione has no son, and hates Andromache. To Pthia comes, in disguise, Orestes, healed at last of the Furies. He is in search of Hermione, whom he saw and loved of old in her father's halls. Orestes and Hermione plot flight. There is a mélée. Pyrrhus is slain, and Andromache stabs Helen. These are the dry bones of Prof. Murray's drama. In his treatment of it they become the vehicle of a symbolism. The dramatic situation is that of the questing soul between the two ideals, the Wisdom of Life and the Passion of Life. Andromache represents the Wisdom of Life. Through suffering she has attained: she knows and loves. The old angers are swallowed up in humanity. Molossus has slain his first man amid the rejoicings of the Court. Andromache would have him make atonement.

ANDROMACHE.

May your eyes never see half the pain mine have seen! I grew past feeling for it, too, long, long ago. I saw men writhe and bite the dust, without caring for them or counting them. They were so many that they were all confused, and the noise of their anguish was like the crying of cranes far off: there was no one voice in it, and no meaning. And then, as it went on growing, and the sons of Priam died about me and the folk starved, and my husband, Hector, was slain with torment, all the voices gathered again together and seemed as one voice, that cried to my heart so that it understood.

MOLOSSUS.

What did it say, mother?

ANDROMACHE.

It spoke in a language that you know not, my son.

MOLOSSUS.

Did it speak Phrygian?

ANDROMACHE.

It spoke the language of old, old men, and those whose gods have deserted them.

MOLOSSUS.

But you could tell me what it said.

ANDROMACHE.

[Looking at him, and not answering.] Why did you ever wish to kill that herd-boy?

MOLOSSUS.

We had taken their cattle before. They always fight us.

ANDROMACHE.

Would it not be better that they should live at peace with you?

MOLOSSUS.

Why should I fear their blood-feud? I would sooner be slain than ask favours of them. My father would avenge me well!

ANDROMACHE.

And who will be the happier? Listen. Can you hear that little beating sound—down seaward, away from the sun?

MOLOSSUS.

It is the water lapping against the rocks.

ANDROMACHE.

There is a sound like that in the language I told you of. Old, old men, and those whose gods have deserted them, hear it in their hearts—the sound of all the blood that men have spilt and the tears they have shed, lapping against great rocks, in shadow, away from the sun.

MOLOSSUS.

But, mother, no warrior hears any sound like that.

ANDROMACHE.

Hector learnt to hear it before he died.

This touches upon the eternal verities. In Hermione Orestes seeks the Passion of Life, one inexhaustible and unfading as her mother Helen. But Hermione is no Helen; she is a thwarted soul, passionate indeed, but perverse, for the ideal of Passion is unrealisable by men; and the dramatic conflict of the play resolves itself into the opposing influences of the two women upon Orestes. The eyes of Hermione "beaconed him through the dark of the sea." He still dreams his ideal in her, "daughter of Helen, ageless and deathless," fails to realise in her the very woman she is; but in the presence of Andromache her beauty pales, and she is shrunken; and when she stabs Andromache it lets Orestes into a secret. He bids his men begone with Hermione to the ship, and stays looking down upon the dying and strangely transfigured woman. He is initiate.

Prof. Murray has put a good deal into this play: it is at least, as we said, interesting from beginning to end; but part of the interest is barely legitimate, for it comes from watching to see how the writer will get over the difficulties which he has almost wilfully imposed upon himself. He does not get over them entirely; and would not his work have really been more effective if he had chosen a theme in the handling of which he would not have had to waste his energies in combating the accumulated instincts of his readers and himself towards a traditional mode of treatment?

The Trewe Kirk Discernit.

As distinguished from the movement which transformed the Church of England, the Scottish Reformation proceeded upwards from below. It was more purely a religious movement. It began indeed within, among Churchmen; and its first aim was no more than to eliminate from the existing system the gross abuses of simony and nepotism which in Scotland, as elsewhere, honeycombed the whole system of patronage. But the Lutheran doctrine of justification was in the air, and Patrick Hamilton was its proto-martyr—"burnte, at commande of the king selfe, for obstinatie and wickednes." He had the audacity to maintain that "faith, hope, and charity are so linked together that he who hath one of them hath all, and he that lacketh one lacketh all," and the like. And as is wont to happen when one man has the courage to suffer for his convictions, the reek of his burning "infected all on whom it blew." In 1534 was held a great assize over which the king, James V., presided as great justiciar. Over a score of confessors suffered confiscation of goods; Alexander Alane (known in literature as Alesius) was driven out of the country; Norman Gourley and David Stratoun furnished a holocaust to the Moloch of Orthodoxy; and so forward, mainly by contrivance of that prelate of large intelligence, consummate ability, and indomitable energy whom, not inaptly, Dr. Mitchell styles "hierarchical fanatic"—Cardinal Betoun. The hour of the reformers would seem to have struck when in 1543 the Regent, the Earl of Arran, proclaimed freedom to read the Scriptures in the vulgar tongue; but he almost immediately repented of his temerity, and loaded his head with appropriate ashes.

The coming of Wishart, in 1559, marked a change in the character of the movement; with him it definitely assumed a schismatical character. His method was to gather into conventicles those whom he could persuade. Also, he must pass through the cloud and through the fire, and make room for a greater.

John Knox—"that maist notable profet and apostle of our nation"—in his childhood had been a pupil of Wishart's; of him he learned the little Greek he knew. A firmness which came near to obstinacy, an independence which was very much like pride . . . and a passionate force sometimes mistakenly attributed to a vindictive temper—these are some of the qualities predicated of him by D'Aubigné. Knox had received the order of priesthood, but, having acquired "a taste for the truth," ceased to say mass and (strangely) took to the law. Presently, in obedience to an harmonious call, he assumed the office of a preacher, and the vaulting of St. Andrew's Cathedral rang weekly with vituperation. The assassination of Cardinal Betoun, in the margin of his History, he is content to note as "the godly act" of James Melvine. This same godly act was the reason why for some nineteen months, with others of the conspirators, he tugged at an oar from the bench of a French galley. English influence secured his release in 1549. He came to England and took part in the first revision of the Prayer-book. He was appointed to be chaplain to the monarch whom Dr. Mitchell styles "good King Edward," and, it is said, received the offer of the Gloucester bishopric. After the accession of the "bigoted Queen Mary," the English court, he found, was no place for him. He departed, therefore, to the more propitious air of Geneva and the company of Calvin, between whom and the people of Scotland he served the office of a conduit; and thence he sounded that Blast against the Monstrous Regiment of Women which was designed to shake the security of Mary, but merely exasperated Elizabeth; wherein his later explanations, which involved so unpalatable a doctrine as that kings rule in virtue of election rather than by right divine, did not mend matters. At this time he returned to St. Andrew's and frankly proceeded to triumph over the enemies of the Lord. "We doe nothing," he wrote, "but goe about Jericho, blowing with trumpets as God giveth strenth."

The result of the struggle was by this time assured. The new faith was springing vigorously on the soil left fallow by the careless security of the clergy. In Scotland, as elsewhere, the Roman Catholic Church had saved, out of a sometime devoted people, but a remnant.

The author goes at length into the history of the Book of Discipline and the Book of Common Order; and by the discretion of his enthusiastic editor, a lecture upon Alesius, though not properly one of the series delivered on the Baird foundation, has been inserted. If it is with a certain sense of disappointment that we close this volume, that is to be attributed solely to a certain flaccidity of style which may readily be excused to a man strenuously using, as it proved, the last spark of his vitality for a comprehensive purview of the period which for many years he had made so particularly his own. We confidently hope that it will interest, in the great events which it chronicles, a wider public than that to which the lectures are primarily addressed.

"'Twill Serve."

PERIODS OF EUROPEAN LITERATURE.—The Romantic Triumph.
By T. S. Omond, M.A. (Blackwood. 5s. net.)

THE title of this book rather suggests a novel than the latest addition to Prof. Saintsbury's "Periods of European Literature." It is the sequel (the association of ideas will not away) to The Romantic Revolt—a no less cozening title—its predecessor in the series, which dealt with the general rebellion against eighteenth-century classicism; and the period it covers is, roughly, from 1810 to the decline of the Romantic movement in the 'fifties. The design is to summarise the time during which the Romantic movement was at its zenith; and in English literature it may be said to have as its culmination Scott and Browning.

The period is impossibly vast, beyond the mere number of years embraced by it. It is, perhaps, the most opulent period of European literary history. In England it means Scott, Coleridge, Wordsworth, Shelley, Keats, Tennyson, Browning, De Quincey, Ruskin, Carlyle, Dickens, Thackeray, the Brontës—to take up but a random handful of the golden sands; in France, Dumas, De Vigny, De Musset, Lamartine, Sainte-Beuve, Stendhal—all that brilliant band of poets and prosateurs, with the great name of Hugo towering in the midst, and the red waistcoat of Gautier flaming in the forefront; it means historians like Sismondi, Thierry, Michelet; novelists like George Sand and Prosper Mérimée. As if these were not enough, Germany presents to us the Schlegels—August, the great populariser and critic of Shakespeare; Friedrich, who wrote The Philosophy of History; Tieck; Hoffmann; Uhland; Brentano; Fouqué, who gave us the undying figures of Undine and Sintram; Richter, inspirer of Carlyle; Niebuhr, the historian; Schelling and Hegel, in philosophy; while in its later period we have the poetry of Heine and the pessimism of Schopenhauer. Yet here is no pause: Italy offers Manzoni, of I Promessi Sposi fame; Leopardi, the poet, as Schopenhauer was the philosopher of pessimism; Denmark has Hans Andersen; Russia, Poushkin and Gogol; Poland, Mickiewicz. And this is but (in Tarquin's phrase) striking off the tallest heads of the poppies. Throngs surge behind these. It was truly a wonderful time of blossoming.

To deal with such enormous wealth of material upon any comprehensive plan, within the compass of one small volume, was not possible. In this respect Mr. Omond's task was harder than that of his predecessors. In effect, his volume resolves itself into a cursory review of the chief authors in the several countries of Europe, with a few introductory and concluding remarks on the Romantic spirit and movement. It is, doubtless, the fault of the unwieldy subject, too near for perspective, yet already fading into a doubtful semi-familiarity very puzzling to deal with; but Mr. Omond's volume does not impress us so much as others of the series. He disavows any design of novelty in his criticism; and has, in fact, adopted the safe method of adhering to the received criticism of the day on all important points. The few exceptions wherein Mr. Omond has liberated his own soul do not encourage us to wish that he had oftener departed from the beaten track. He is led into railing at Mrs. Browning's delicate phrase, "sylvan tenderness," applied to the eyes of the hare. Mr. Omond is not, in fact, a distinguished critic. But, on the whole, he is adequate, if never stimulating, and sometimes a trifle exasperating. The book is a fair book, considering the subject and its difficulties; there have, as we say again, been better in the series, but "'twill serve." And we may, at any rate, congratulate Mr. Omond that he has spared us yet another attempt to define the Romantic spirit. "For this relief, much thanks."

Other New Books.

MRS. DELANY
(MARY GRANVILLE).

COMPILED BY GEORGE PASTON.

In the second edition of his Anecdotes of Painting Horace Walpole refers to Mrs. Delany as "a lady of excellent taste, who, at the age of seventy-four, invented the art of paper mosaic, with which material (coloured) she executed in eight years within twenty of one thousand various flowers and flowering shrubs with a precision and truth unparalleled." The reader who wishes to know exactly what this work was like may turn to pages 230-231 of this volume. Mrs. Delany never wrote a book, or made herself notorious; she was neither wealthy nor learned, and yet she was a great lady—"a truly great woman of fashion," Burke called her. Mrs. Delany's Autobiography and Correspondence in six volumes, edited by Lady Llanover was gratefully received in 1861-62 by a public willing to pay five pounds. These volumes having sunk—by their own weight one thinks—out of present ken, "George Paston" has distilled some of their fragrance and interest into a volume that may hope to be read by a generation of casual readers. In these reduced pages we are still brought into the politest circles of the reigns of three Georges. We dine with Swift, and watch Madame D'Arblay bungle the bow of Queen Charlotte's necklace; we hear the "Beggars' Opera" praised, and Tristram Shandy denounced; and we see Mrs. Delany almost marry Wesley, and almost snub Johnson. This is the (abridged) book of her loves, her two marriages, her discreet friendships, her perfections of behaviour and address. Its long, busy murmur of acquaintance is in ceaseless and delightful contrast with the self-centred, socially-unerring mind of the great lady it portrays. Taken as a whole, the record is crammed, as the present editor is pleased to say, with "familiar trifles of everyday life that put marrow into the dry bones of history, and blood into its flaccid veins." (Grant Richards. 7s. 6d.)

MEMOIRS OF THE BARONESS

CÉCILE DE COURTOT. BY MORITZ VON KAISENBERG.

This volume takes its place in the entertaining "Versailles Historical Series," which already includes the memoirs of the Duc de Saint-Simon and of the Prince de Ligne. The period opened up is that of Napoleon's First-Consulship, and although the letters and diaries quoted belong to the von Alvensleben family, of Kalbe, in Altmark, the real heroine of the story they unfold is the young Baroness Cécile de Courtot, who fled to Kalbe from the very steps of the guillotine, and afterwards returned to Paris, as one from the dead, to enjoy the favour of the First Consul and the restoration of her property. The delicious quiet and garden fragrance of old German life—a life given up to "the cultivation of an exaggerated sentimentality and perfervid romance"—are mingled in the narrative with the horrors of Robespierre's reign, and the crescendo gaieties and splendours of Paris in the days when it was learning to give Napoleon carte blanche. The most striking record is of the interview granted by Napoleon to Cécile de Courtot in the matter of the restoration of her property, which had been torn from her in the Revolution. Cécile was able to remind the First Consul that they had met as boy and girl. He had rescued her from the attack of a bull at Brienne, in Champagne, in 1783; and a few years later she had shown her deliverer, by the gift of a laurel wreath at the Military College at Brienne, that she had not forgotten the service. On mention of this wreath the First Consul completely changed his manner, which had been cold and repellent:

Overwhelming emotion shone in his dark eyes and trembled in his voice when he spoke.

"So you were that sweet, kind girl, Mademoiselle? Oh, ask what you will of me, I promise you beforehand to grant it—no matter what it is. Will you accept a pension—a post of any kind? You shall have your property back—I am more than overjoyed to have it in my power to serve you!"

You may imagine, my Annaliebe, how startled and amazed I was at this sudden outburst, this rapture of kindness, from the man who, but a moment before, had shown himself so stern and unapproachable! I had no answer ready; all I could do was to falter without reflection, "Oh, Sire, what have I done to deserve this gratitude?"

"What, this too!" broke in Bonaparte in a tone of measureless excitement. "The royal title—for the first time—from your lips, my dear, infallible little Prophetess! And once more your words will come true," he continued, with the strange, far-away look of a Seer. "Yes, I shall one day wear the crown and clasp the Royal mantle round my shoulders—now I know it for certain. You set that laurel wreath on my young head in the far-off days at Brienne—the laurel crown that was to be followed by so many others. You whispered to me then, 'May it bring you good luck!' and truly it did, as you very well know. I am a fatalist, Mademoiselle, and since you have foretold it me, I feel the Crown of France upon my brow, I see the Sceptre of the great Realm already in my hand! How can I ever thank you enough?"

The translation of these curious, if not too convincing, memoirs has been made, from the German, by Miss Jessie Haynes. (Heinemann. 9s.)

MISSIONS IN EDEN.

BY MRS. CROSBY H. WHEELER.

Eden is situated in the Valley of the Euphrates, under the shadow of Mount Ararat, and at Harpoot are the headquarters of an American mission of which Mrs. Wheeler has been an active member for forty years. This book is a kind of homely circular letter to inform those who are interested in the Christianising of Armenians of the progress of the good work. Here, for example, is a passage from the description of Euphrates College at Harpoot: "At the left, as we enter the hall, we find Professor Nahigian in the chemical room teaching physics. He is busy with experiments, and his class of juniors look bright and appreciative. He married our sweet Mariam. Further along are the recitation rooms, while on the right is the college hall. . . . Teacher Nazloo is here, and in her sweet, ladylike way is teaching a class in moral science. In a recitation room just beyond, Mrs. Wheeler is teaching a class in English literature. The girls are much interested in Lady of the Lake, judging from quotations written on the blackboard. Miss Barnum is teaching physical geography in the next room." The sidelights on Armenian life and character are not uninteresting, and the zeal of the author cannot but command respect. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

THE POETICAL WORKS OF
JOHN MILTON.

EDITED BY THE REV.
H. C. BEECHING.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF
JOHN MILTON.

FROM THE EDITION OF THE REV. H. C. BEECHING.

The first of these volumes is a handsome library edition in one volume. Mr. Beeching adopts the principle of preserving the spelling, punctuation, and so forth used by Milton himself. This has been done comparatively rarely for Milton, although for Shakespeare often enough, and for many other poets in the antiquarian editions of the late Dr. Grosart. So far as Milton is concerned, Mr. Beeching makes out a good case for his method, pointing out in an Introduction that the poet evidently took pains to oversee the spelling of his works, and that upon a knowledge of it a correct appreciation of moot questions of rhythm and emphasis often depends. There are plenty of annotated Miltons, and Mr. Beeching has wisely contented himself in the present one with giving a full text, a slight apparatus criticus, and some good facsimiles of title-pages and handwriting. The general effect of the original editions is very finely reproduced. The other volume is called the "Oxford Miniature Milton," and is an elegant little edition on India paper, light and suitable for the pocket. The text is that of Mr. Beeching, but the spelling is modernised. (Clarendon Press.)

Fiction.

Arden Massiter. By Dr. William Barry.
(T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

IN this novel Dr. Barry has poured out all his intimate knowledge of Italy—modern Italy; his appreciation of that Italy which has passed, and his aspirations concerning that Italy which is to come. Arden Massiter is one of the best English novels of Italy with which we are acquainted, and certainly we regard it as measurably superior to the author's previous books. It is full of emotion and a certain cultured sentimentality which pervades and poetises every sentence. Only a scholar could have written it; only a poet could have written it; and only a philanthropist could have written it. Dr. Barry combines these three "abilities"; and decidedly, with modern Italy for an objective, they all have full play and opportunity. Arden Massiter is a Socialist journalist, who goes out to the Peninsula under the impulsion of some vague sympathy. In London he has trafficked with the underworld of Italian political intrigue. In Rome he picks up the threads again, rather against his will. Unwittingly he kills a man, and lo! instantly he finds himself the doomed butt of the camorra and other sinister agencies. He takes refuge with his friends the ancient family of Sorelli, at their immemorial castle of Roccaforte. He falls in love with Costanza, pale daughter of princes—a figure beautifully drawn, but surely drawn under the influence of d'Annunzio. Roccaforte and Costanza are singularly like the castle and Massimilla in The Virgins of the Rocks. There is the same feeling, the same still atmosphere around them.

The events of the tale are tragic and dramatic, and the tension grows till it is finally broken. Episodes of brigands, beggars, conspirators, statesmen, and high-bred women follow one another quickly, and the theatres of them are heroic—faded but superb interiors, mountain heights, and the great streets of decayed capitals. Arden Massiter is a "full" book. It teems with incident, character, suggestion; it must be read slowly, savoured paragraph by paragraph; it shines everywhere with a notable distinction. Moreover, it is a homogeneous piece of excellent craftsmanship. The sole fault we would charge to it is a lack of brute strength. It is too mild, bland, and—shall we say it?—too "cultured." It is like a suave and broad-minded Italian prelate, who knows all men, all hearts, all histories, and who would be a man were it not for an ever present finicking tendency to use the panorama of life as a spectacle, to survey it with finger-tips gently touching, and embroider it with an exquisite discourse of his own sensations:

Ancient sculpture has always affected me like music, but not as the highly coloured, deeply shadowed modern harmonies which, in their melting of many tones together, leave one vibrant, yet exhausted, as after some passionate experience. No, rather like the fine, clear settings of Palestrina, I should say, which fall upon one out of a cloudless heaven. When I spent day after day contemplating in the still palaces this divine company from Olympus, or Thebes, or Thessaly, the intense and shining quietness could not fail to equalise the pulses of my blood. It was the expression of a beauty in which sense had little share. I call to mind certain mornings at the Vatican, when I seemed to have those imperial courts and stanze to myself. The universe, I could have dreamt, was white sunshine—no refraction of its rays anywhere; but standing out fair and pure the deathless forms, each so individual, so consummately distinct, that they seemed victorious over mortal griefs by the very perfection of the attitude in which they fought and triumphed. There was a strange innocence, too, upon the youthful faces; by a miracle of art the flesh itself had all the tender purity of blossoms in their prime; gaze long enough and you had gone back to the world's childhood, when the spirit wrote its naïve desires upon a tablet of Parian marble, unstained as the snow which breath of man has never sullied. These figures had a kind of consecration, a detachment from our sorrows, that lifted me, like the tragedians' verses to which they so frequently took my thoughts, into an ever-enduring stillness beyond time and chance.

Who could find fault with such a passage? Yet it is the inmost spirit of that passage, and of a hundred others, that has somewhat marred Arden Massiter for us. We have a suspicion that, as some men are amateurs of rare books, so Dr. Barry must be an amateur of life—that he would give a high price for a rare experience and put it in a lovely binding and contemplate it for hours.

The Sky-Pilot. By Ralph Connor.
(Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

THIS tale of pioneer life, "beyond the great prairies and in the shadow of the Rockies," is well written (except where the writing becomes "fine"), and a passably sincere version of things that the author has observed. Mr. Connor knows his subject with thoroughness, and presents it dramatically. In fact, he is a story-teller. His chief fault—and we cannot condone it—is that he persistently sugars his stuff with sentiment, until the sweetness cloyes. The "sky-pilot" (minister, of course), Arthur Wellington Moore by name, who comes to take spiritual charge of Swan Creek, much against Swan Creek's desire, is one of those impossible heavenly saints that are found only in novels. A mild little man, he conquers the ranchers by the greatness of his game at baseball, humbly explaining that he "played a little at Princeton." Then the hymn-books begin to appear, and in a few weeks Swan Creek scarcely knows itself. At the end of the tale Arthur Wellington Moore dies, and the chapter is headed "The Pilot's Last Port." We might tolerate the pilot, for he has his qualities, but we certainly cannot tolerate Gwen. This is Gwen:

"Yes," assented Bill, "she's a leetle swift."

Then, as if fearing he had been apologetic for her, he added, with the air of one settling the question: "But she's good stock! She suits me!"

The Duke helped me to another side of her character.

"She is a remarkable child," he said, one day. "Wild and shy as a coyote, but fearless, quite; and with a heart full of passions. Meredith, the Old Timer, you know, has kept her up there among the hills. She sees no one but himself and Ponka's Blackfeet relations, who treat her like a goddess and help to spoil her utterly. She knows their lingo and their ways—goes off with them for a week at a time."

"What! With the Blackfeet?"

"Ponka and Joe, of course, go along; but even without them she is as safe as if surrounded by the Coldstream Guards, but she has given them up for some time now."

And so on for many chapters, just as if the Bret Harte school had never existed. It would be easy to find fun in The Sky-Pilot. Nevertheless, despite circumstantial evidence to the contrary, we are convinced that Mr. Connor in writing it was actuated by perfectly honest literary motives. He possesses much natural technical skill, but in the larger matter of attitude towards life he has a great deal to learn. Such a detail will not prevent many people from enjoying this naïve novel.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

JOAN OF THE SWORD HAND. BY S. R. CROCKETT.

A long mediæval romance, crowded with characters whose business is mainly fighting and love making. Joan, Duchess Joan of Hohenstein, ruler "of that cluster of hill statelets which is called collectively Masurenburg," is a heroine after Mr. Crockett's heart. She fences better than most, she defies an unattractive bridegroom, she masquerades as a boy, and in the end marries the man of her choice. He is a Cardinal, but that is nothing to Mr. Crockett. An interview with Pope Sixtus in Chapter LIII., some talk about ducats, and then the "sweet-voiced choristers" and "the white-robed maidens" scattering flowers. (Ward, Lock & Co.)

THE GIFTS OF ENEMIES. BY E. E. MILTON.

A readable novel by the author of A Bachelor Girl in London. A great deal hinges on a bet made by young Tim Vontris that he would marry the first girl who wore a hat trimmed with blue whom he met in the town. (A. & C. Black. 6s.)

THE PLAIN MISS CRAY. BY FLORENCE WARDEN.

If a heroine is dubbed plain we know that she will do wonders, like Paganini's single string. When, therefore, the reader is told that Miss Cray had a voice which, though neither loud nor shrill, "had a singular quality of compelling attention," he knows that she will compel the right sort of attention in due time. A readable and amusing story by the hand that wrote The House on the Marsh. (White & Co. 6s.)

AINSLIE'S JU-JU. BY HAROLD BINDLOSS.

Ainslie's ju-ju, a talisman which possessed the power of protecting its wearer from sudden death, was "a little oblong of ivory, roughly carved in representation of a serpent's head, with curious characters graven upon it, somewhat resembling the signs of the zodiac upon the Accra rings." The story deals with an expedition to darkest Africa and the disasters that attended it, but the ju-ju ensures Ainslie's happy marriage at the close. (Chatto & Windus. 3s. 6d.)

THE ANGEL OF CHANCE. BY G. G. CHATTERTON.

A comedy of a watering-place, with some neat character-drawing in it. The Angel of Chance (or Fate) brought it about that Clifford Anstey and Rachel Meredith "drifted together in so unorthodox a fashion that possibly the London County Council might have denied them a licence for it." In other words, they met in the sea, converging from their respective bathing machines. An amusing book. (Long. 6s.)

ALETTA. BY BERTRAM MITFORD.

Mr. Mitford, who is known for his South African stories, here gives us a tale of the Boer War, in which he makes a courageous attempt to portray those Boers "who do not go to bed in their clothes, who do wash, and whose persons and dwelling-houses are distinguished by the ordinary conditions of cleanliness and civilisation." It is a refreshing change from the wearisome insistence upon the other side of the case. (White. 3s. 6d.)

LOVE'S GUERDON. BY CONRAD H. CARRODER.

A typical domestic religious "romance of the West Country," compact of the Maypole Inn, Mrs. Loxton, the stony road to Netherdene Farm, and "We know from the Pauline epistles." (White & Co. 6s.)

HIS 'PRENTICE HAND.

BY SYDNEY PHELPS.

Sydney Phelps is, we suspect, a woman, and her story follows old-established feminine lines. The hero is Ralph Vivian, curate, a model of the manly graces. And in the end "Good luck to your fishing, little fellow!" says he to his wifelet: "you threw a good line and caught my heart over two years ago." "Will the line hold, Ralph?" asked Ethel, drawing closer to him. "Yes, for ever." (Long. 6s.)

THE SECOND LADY DELCOMBE. BY MRS. ARTHUR KENNARD.

Another contribution to what may be called house party fiction. The society is the society that stays in country houses, and the conversation is continuous and steadfastly smart. Here is a passage: "'He has chuckled the Army, you know.' 'I didn't know. What brought on the crisis?' 'Want of the needful.' 'What does he intend to do?' 'Go into the land agency business, I believe.' 'Poor old girl!' 'All the same a hundred years hence, I expect.'"

THE HOUSE OF HARDALE.

BY ROSE PERKINS.

Mr. Hardale was a banker, with all the outward signs which successful banking imparts. But he quarrelled with his son, and his son died. ("I have gone the pace," he wrote, "and Death, the grim old fellow who carries at no man's bidding, is coming with long, swift strides down the shadowy way to hurry me off. It's consumption, dad; rapid.") But he left a child, and she, together with an unprincipled adventuress, gives life to the melodrama. (Long. 6s.)

OUTRAGEOUS FORTUNE.

ANON.

This "Story of Evelyn Grey, Hospital Nurse," contains a seducer in the shape of a superlatively wicked High Church vicar, and other displeasing people, including the heroine, whose misfortunes seem to be at least as deserved as her ultimate happiness. (Greening. 3s. 6d.)

VELDT AND LAAGER.

BY E. S. VALENTINE.

"Some of the tales in this book are true; some have been related by the Boers themselves;" all of them are intended to bring out the chief traits of Boer character. They should be popular in the sixpenny form in which they appear. (Methuen. 6d.)

A FLASH OF YOUTH.

BY C. J. HAMILTON.

A crude story of love, unfaithfulness, squalor, hymn-verses, and death-beds, covering twenty years and enacted in two hemispheres. The scamp of a husband returns at last to find his wife playing the "Moonlight Sonata." "She always plays when it's beginning to get near sun-down." Alethea dies and forgives. (Sands & Co. 6s.)

THE EXPERIMENT OF DOCTOR NEVILL.

BY EMERIC HULME-BEAMAN.

To the fourth chapter of this pseudo-scientific novel the author prefixes the warning "To be skipped by the squeamish reader." With as good reason he might have placed these words on his title-page, for the whole novel is grim and gruesome reading. It tells how Lord Carsdale's recovery from an injury to his brain was brought about by the insertion into that organ of a portion of the brain of an executed murderer—with the drawback that his lordship promptly developed the murderer's traits. How this operation was justified, and how its evil effects were finally counteracted, and the hero's marriage with Lilian Wroughton rendered possible, we leave to the non-squeamish reader. (John Long. 6s.)

The late Richard Hovey.

An American Poet.

ALL readers who take an intimate interest in contemporary verse probably know two slim little American volumes entitled Songs from Vagabondia and More Songs from Vagabondia, by Mr. Bliss Carman and Mr. Richard Hovey, a small edition of which was issued in this country by Mr. Elkin Mathews; and all who do know them will learn with regret that Mr. Hovey is dead. He died a few weeks ago of apoplexy, after undergoing an operation, and his age was only thirty-five. Thereby America loses one of her best poets, and from the world passes a clean, resolute, discriminating mind.

Richard Hovey was not a great poet, nor had he an abundant gift of music; but he loved the light and he loved the open air and he believed in men. He was also always on the side of youth, as lyric poets ought to be. He could write:

For we know the world is glorious,
And the goal a golden thing,
And that God is not censorious,
When His children have a fling.

There is no doubt that in Richard Hovey's poetical making Whitman was a great influence, and latterly in his work there were signs that he would not be unwilling to stimulate Americans as Mr. Kipling has stimulated England; but he was more himself than anyone else, and by adopting for the most part very free and easy measures this individuality was intensified. For there is no question that, except with the greatest, severe poetical forms are capable of tyrannising over a poet's intentions. Richard Hovey was happiest in this kind of irregular ecstatic chant:

I said in my heart, "I am sick of four walls and a ceiling.
I have need of the sky.
I have business with the grass.
I will up and get me away where the hawk is wheeling,
Lone and high,
And the snow clouds go by.
I will get me away to the waters that glass
The clouds as they pass,
To the waters that lie
Like the heart of a maiden aware of a doom drawing nigh
And dumb for sorcery of impending joy.
I will get me away to the woods.
Spring, like a huntsman's boy,
Halloos along the hillsides and unboods
The falcon in my will.
The dogwood calls me, and the sudden thrill
That breaks in apple blooms down country roads
Plucks me by the sleeve and nudges me away.
The sap is in the boles to-day,
And in my veins a pulse that yearns and goads."

That is from a poem entitled "Spring." The same vein is pursued in "The Faun," which perhaps represents Mr. Hovey's best work in this manner. Here is a passage from "The Faun":

Oh, goodly damp smell of the ground!
Oh, rough sweet bark of the trees!
Oh, clear sharp cracklings of sound!

Oh, life's that's a-thrill and a-bound
With the vigour of boyhood and morning and the noontide's rapture of ease!
Was there ever a weary heart in the world?
A lag in the body's urge, or a flag of the spirit's wings?
Did a man's heart ever break
For a lost hope's sake?
For here there is lilt in the quiet and calm in the quiver of things.
Ay, this old oak, grey-grown and knurled,
Solemn and sturdy and big,
Is as young of heart, as alert and elate in his rest,
As the oriole there that clings to the tip of the twig
And scolds at the wind that it buffets too rudely his nest.

A man who writes like this, whatever his matter may be, is, we fear, to some extent shirking his responsibilities; but many readers care nothing for that provided the matter is to their mind. Mr. Hovey, however, could adhere to the demands of an intricate stanza when he liked, and in his very persuasive lyric called "The Wander-Lovers" he even invented, we believe, a new lilt. Thus:

Down the world with Maria!
That's the life for me!
Wandering with the wandering wind,
Vagabond and unconfined!
Roving with the roving rain
Its unbounded domain!
Kith and kin of wander-kind,
Children of the sea!

The poet had other moods than these. There is in his volume Along the Trail, published in America in 1898, another of those poems concerning Death, the most curious of which is perhaps James Thomson's grim fantasy entitled "In the Room" (in The City of Dreadful Night). Mr. Hovey writes in the person of a dead man awaiting burial. These are the last stanzas:

Ah, if she came and bent above me here,
Who lie with straight bands bound about my chin!
Ah, if she came and stood beside this bier
With aureoles as of old upon her hair
To light the darkness of this burial bin!
Should I not rise again and breathe the air
And feel the veins warm that the blood beats in?
Or should I lie with sinews fixed and shriek
As dead men shriek and make no sound? Should I See her gray eyes look love and hear her speak,
And be all impotent to burst my shroud?
Will the dead never rise from where they lie?
Or will they never cease to think so loud?
Or is to know and not to be, to die?

To conclude, these lines from "The Quest of Merlin," in which the Angels address the old magician, indicate that Mr. Hovey had, perhaps, imaginative triumphs before him:

Put a bit in the teeth of the storm,
And a noose on the neck of the sea;
Say to ice, "Thou shalt keep me warm,"
And to air, "Be a bridge for me";
What hast thou gained for thy toil
But a vaster gulf for prayer?
Thy bread and wine and oil,
And still the darkness there?
Thou shalt measure the stars;
Orion and the Pleiades
Shall send thee embassies;
Thou shalt chart the cities of Mars;
Thou shalt sift Aldebaran
As gold dust in the pan;
Algol shall undusk
For thee his demon trouble; . . .
In vain! All is husk,
To be cast out with the stubble.

Among Mr. Hovey's other literary work, which included a good deal of criticism, was a volume of translations from Maeterlinck, published in 1894, including "Princess Maleine," "The Intruder," "The Blind," and "The Seven Princesses," the first translation, we believe, that America saw. Mr. Hovey latterly conducted courses in literature at Barnard College.

Things Seen.

The Rabbit.

I SAT by the open door of the cottage reading Richard Jefferies, alone, save for Adam, a rheumatic antique, who came, once a week, to tend the garden. When last I looked up from my book, I observed the crown of his head below the dip in the garden, bobbing as he dug. Turning again to my book, I read this passage:

There is a slight rustle among the bushes and the fern upon the mound. It is a rabbit who has peeped forth into the sunshine. His eye opens wide with wonder at the sight of us; his nostrils work nervously as he watches us narrowly. But in a little while the silence and the stillness reassure him: he nibbles in a desultory way at the stray grasses on the mound, and finally ventures out into the meadow almost within reach of the hand. It is so easy to make the acquaintance—to make friends with the children of nature. From the tiniest insect upwards they are so ready to dwell in sympathy with us—only be tender, quiet, considerate, in a word, gentlemanly towards them and they will freely wander around. And they all have such marvellous tales to tell—

At this point a shout from Adam broke into my reading, a high-pitched, compelling shout. The bobbing head had disappeared. I ran down the garden to find him lying flat on the ground, yellow earth heaped about him, and his venerable head and shoulders thrust into a hole; his hands were outstretched into the intricacies of the burrow, and his muffled voice was crying "I'll get him yet! I'll get him yet!" Then suddenly he uttered a grunt of pleasure, and his right hand grasped a ball of fur. With an exulting cry he dragged forth the rabbit. Then—it was done in a second—he broke its neck, and held the creature at arm's length. I saw the film pass over its eyes, and its little front paws cross themselves in the act of death. I touched the small warm body, and thought: "It was not easy for you to make friends with the children of man." And Adam said: "I'm almost wore out myself, but, thank God, I've still got the strength to make war on them vermin. Yes, vermin! Let one of them get inside your wire fence—and you'll know it. Last autumn I had forty wall-flowers; they nibbled thirty-five of them right down to the roots; and as to carnations, why a rabbit will come a mile to get one. Thought they was harmless little things, did you? I knows rabbits. I'd like to have a guinea for every hundred I've killed. Why, if I hadn't caught he there wouldn't have been a bit of green left in the garden."

The Preserve.

LAST Sunday afternoon, his father being away, I told my little nephew of the benevolence of nature, and that little boys must be kind to all flying and creeping things, even as God was kind to us. Afterwards having shown him the beauty of the world from an upper window, we put on our hats and went for a walk, observing the primroses by the brook side, the shy anemones, and the tender sprigs of green shooting from every dark twig. I explained to him how all that breathed—the insects, the birds, the moles, the rabbits and the mice alike felt the impulse of the awakening of spring, towards a busy, useful, joyous life. My little nephew listened, nodding his grave head. Presently we came to a wood dark with saplings, and there we saw the first butterfly—a yellow butterfly. "Look," said little Edward, "there's a fly-away primrose." I commended the simple simile, and explained to him (the conceit was excusable) how the happy little creature carried the glad tidings of spring from one unfolding flower to another and told each flower to be good and happy for spring had come. But Edward was not listening. His round eyes were fixed on a withering crow, half-eaten by insects, whose neck had been stuck into the fork of a sapling. All along the side of the wood hung other crows—awful warnings! "Do crows like the spring, uncle?" asked Edward. "All God's creatures love the spring," I answered. "But it would never do to let them destroy the pheasants' eggs. So the keeper kills them and hangs them up as a warning to other naughty birds." Edward nodded his head. He was a wise child. We walked on. Presently he uttered a cry of delight. There, within two feet from the ground was a nest, and in it were two blue-speckled thrushes' eggs. Edward took one daintily between his fingers. "It's quite cold," he said; "and, uncle, what's the iron thing for?" I explained that the eggs were old eggs, that they tempted predatory birds, such as jays and magpies, to stand on the "iron thing," which was a trap to catch them by the leg, holding them sometimes all night. Edward reflected a moment, then he said: "Jays don't like the spring, and birds eat other birds' eggs." Presently Edward showed some inclination to examine a large squat steel trap that stood in the middle of the pathway, but I claimed his attention for a pretty, rounded sort of arbour shaped like a beehive, covered with grasses and trailing greenery. We peeped in. The floor was strewn with spent cartridges. Edward looked at me inquiringly. "That," I said casually, for he was not a boy to whom one could gloss the truth, "is where the man hides when he wants to shoot, er—er, wood-pigeons at his ease." On the way home Edward said, thoughtfully: "What lots of things they kill to preserve other things. Do they preserve them in glass cases, uncle?" "No," I answered, "they preserve them to shoot them." "Oh!" said Edward. When we reached home he told his father where he had been. "In the wood!" said his father. "Why, that's trespassing. If they had caught my little boy there they would have locked him up." "Father," said Edward, "you won't preserve me, will you?"

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

THE lady who describes herself as the author of Amitié Amoureuse has just published a sequel to that remarkable book. If it may be said that few sequels succeed, Le Doute plus fort que l'Amour is one of the most amazing failures I have ever read. We are introduced to a startling habit in fiction. The author continually jogs our memory by a footnote: "See Amitié Amoureuse." Surely the reader of the sequel of a story should be at liberty to remember or forget the former volume, and not be reminded in this authoritative and inartistic fashion in the presence of middle-aged friends who are saying nothing in particular that in a previous book they were burning lovers on the point of setting the Seine on fire. The author is no doubt a writer of considerable talent, witty, mordant, of wide culture, and of a morbid sensuality. As every chapter is headed by a translated quotation from Shakespeare, it is apparent that Mme. Lecomte du Nouy is an ardent student of that Immortal, and in her delineation of the passion of love she dots the i's with all the ruthless candour and precision of the seventeenth century. Denise and Philippe, the writers of those delightful letters of Amitié Amoureuse, here are shown in middle age of no particular charm or consequence. Hélène, so captivating as a child, is a young girl like another, sufficiently well-bred, pretty, and intelligent. That she has something of her mother's wit and mental independence is proved by the fresh and brilliant letters she can write, for the author's literary form of predilection is the epistolary, in which it must be admitted she excels. Here is a capital description of the provincial atmosphere of Tours, whither Hélène is transported after her marriage with Jacques, the officer:

Talk of the esprit de corps of the regiment! That esprit seems to me the lack of all esprit. The cavalry despise the infantry and even the artillery. The titled officer avoids the untitled officer unless a bridge of gold unites them. Among the civilians you visit some and not others. Why? Mystery. And so we sulk the prefect, the magistrate. Brave young women wear themselves out uninvited to the garden parties and hunting parties where we shine; we have the bad manners to make up cliques most haughtily exclusive; we are devilishly provincial, we are idiots, but, but in the neighbouring castles we are received because we are "born and on horseback." Don't read it "born on horseback," which is not exactly what I meant, though even such an extraordinary adventure as that would give us a distinguishing touch. . . . Mamma, humanity is furiously stupid when it is not criminally hateful. . . . To have acquired my present predominant position I had to snare them with their favourite talk. The queen, the king, my father's friends, the celebrated ambassador, as appropriately flung into the air as a bunch of hair in the soup. I launch out also grandmother de Nimerck, my uncle Gerald, mentioning his prospective admirals, who married, you know, of course, Count Suénon's daughter—the Suénons, you remember, descendants of the kings of Denmark. This I murmur disdainfully, as who should say, you'll forgive them, I hope, for no longer reigning. I really can't understand why those Suénons should inflict this little humiliation upon us. . . . On the other hand, I say little about you. Good heavens! a mother called Denise Tremors, who doesn't like society, who will not deign to be an ambassadress, who is simply a great artist, scorning honours and gold, what, in conscience, can you expect me to make of her? In you, no food for my discreet charlatanism, I declare it emphatically."

It is greatly to be pitied that the author should not have given more attention to this narrow, intolerant, and vulgar provincialism so luminously touched off in a couple of pages and then dismissed, instead of dwelling so tiresomely on the eternal details of the wedded loves of Hélène and Jacques. And the tragic note, too, misses its effect because it is not treated with largeness or intensity. It would be difficult to conceive a character more common, insignificant, and uninteresting than Jacques de Luzy, who lies clumsily, and defends himself grotesquely. He is the familiar type of officer, well-born, well-tailored, well-bred, no brains, a bit of a brute, with an inordinate and perfectly unjustifiable self-conceit. Women appear to delight in this kind of male, but in a novel, which is not a battle-field, he is a very inadequate hero. It is of so little importance to us whether Jacques killed his brother-officer or not; and the sorrows and doubts of Hélène leave us cold and unmoved.

When I saw the name of Anatole le Braz to the Gardien du Feu I hastened to read it, hoping it would prove some wild and mournful Breton legend. But no. It is a Breton tale spun round the vulgar and fatiguing theme of adultery, well told, with a sober and literary elegance, revealing the frightful ferocity that slumbers in the dreamy and good-natured Celt. This keeper of a Breton lighthouse is married to a beautiful creature he idolises, and who betrays him with his companion. When the husband discovers her infidelity, he sets himself to watch for a moment when the lovers shall be together to burn them alive. It is very Celtic and horrible.

M. Léon Daudet has written a new novel, La Romance du Temps Présent. The author, with a lamentable gravity, takes himself as a Great Man. He is exasperatingly pretentious. He has discovered his affinity in a certain unlettered Jacquemine, a creature of superlative beauty and untutored genius, born to understand him, the Great Man, the Man of Letters! Oh, for a breath of simplicity! Oh, for a genial blast of gaiety and unconsciousness! Even the cheerful blackguardism of Villon is a refreshment for the jaded readers of these endless pages devoted to the conscientious revelation of the Superior Man, the careful cultivation of the genius of the Man of Letters. He is such a deadly dull modern bore, this Man of Letters! He is never for one moment foolish, or wistful, or absent-minded, or vague, or gay. He is never, never, never anything on earth but the self-conscious, attitudinising, sermonising, ridiculous Man of Letters. Such is M. Léon Daudet, with none of his illustrious father's gaiety and charm, none of his sunny temperament, none of his wit, humour, and exquisite art. He is a bore who writes very unpleasing French, and is content to regard himself as a scientific observer of life and men and manners—bless the thing, whatever it may mean.

Correspondence.

"Stevenson Looks In."

SIR,—Mr. Brown is at vast pains to fabricate a phantom foe whom, after all, he fails to overcome. "In the literature of imagination the only irrefragable proof of genius is creative power." Has "genius" been claimed for Stevenson in the domain of imaginative literature, at least by those who appreciate him best and love him most? They are content to rest his hope of immortality upon his work as a moralist, to believe that while Browne and Steele and Lamb are read the subtler, more delicately-complex artist in life and emotion will not be forgotten. Two at least of the men I have named are assured of such chance of immortality as is open to any English writer. Is it by virtue of their "creative power"? In any case Mr. Brown should play fair. Let him overlook, if his artistic and ethical conscience allow him, the finest and most characteristic portion of Stevenson's work; let him restrict himself to that which is admittedly inferior. At least he should judge his author by what he himself proclaims that author's highest effort—Weir of Hermiston. Instead of which he falls foul of Dr. Jekyll! Ingenious? Yes. But honest? H'm!

Meanwhile is it true that in the "literature of imagination the only irrefragable proof of genius is creative power"? I presume the poems of Alfred de Musset and the novels of Honoré de Balzac are equally examples of the literature of imagination. It is easy to say which writer has the most creative power, harder to be sure which has the most genius, while it is safe betting that the poems will long outlive the novels. The creative power of Racine is immeasurably superior to that of La Fontaine, but the bonhomme is like to live as long as the author of Phèdre. There can be little doubt but that Le Neveu de Rameau displays a "creative power" in pathological psychology far transcending that of Candide. But if mankind had to choose between the masterpieces of Diderot and Voltaire, I know full well what the choice would be. Does the Æneid shine by its creative power, or, rather, is it not a supreme masterpiece in virtue of its "exquisite artistry"? I fancy, too, that Virgil (as also did Horace) "worried about the hang of the thing" quite as much as Stevenson. The whole of Horace's life-work goes easily into one volume of the Edinburgh edition. Is Horace the less one of the world's immortals in literature? Browning was certainly more careless than Tennyson "about the hang of the thing"? Is he the lesser genius in Mr. Brown's eyes?

One might go on asking such questions for ever, but it would be too cruel. The very reverse of what Mr. Brown contends for is the truth. The "radiant ones are on the heights" by virtue of "phrasemongery," by virtue simply of their saying something better than anyone else has said it. In the long run only what is "phrased" survives.

If Stevenson be held to have failed in imaginative literature, it is not because he sought too keenly for the right word, the right phrase, but because he often did not find them. Hence his poetry is the weakest portion of his œuvre; the penalty of failure to find the right word is so far greater in verse than in prose. There are half-a-dozen of his tales which would be masterpieces but for the unconvincing phrase here, the second-rate word—the “interjected finger” of Mr. Moore’s criticism—there. One tale at least, Olalla, seems to me almost flawless. Almost, but alas! not quite. With Ruskin’s music ringing in my ears, I still think the close of that noble and beautiful story the finest passage in English prose for the last half century.

Indeed, Stevenson is like to become “classic” in the true sense of the word, and in a measure denied to any other English writers of the half century save those equally careful “phrasemongers” Tennyson and Ruskin. I make bold to predict that the chrestomathies of 1950 will contain far more examples from Stevenson than from Mr. Meredith or Mr. Hardy. If creative power were indeed as Mr. Brown imagines the supreme note of genius, then Mr. Meredith might claim to rank with the highest. But mankind at large will in the future, as in the past, continue to regard expression as the chief gift of the artist.—I am, &c.,

ALFRED NUTT.

SIR,—It is difficult to understand why Mr. Vincent Brown, in a paper entitled “Stevenson Looks In,” published in your issue of April 7, should have been at the pains to reproduce the critical remarks and—if I may be allowed to say so—the rather nauseating familiarities of a certain Watchman towards someone whom he mistook for the late Robert Louis Stevenson. It was certainly a case of mistaken identity, for R. L. S. has long since—alas!—gone to his own place; and be that where it may, it is assuredly not the place where good Watchmen go to. Nor, despite the gentle kindness of his nature, was Stevenson the man to suffer a—Watchman—gladly.

So much for the manner, for the matter of the Watchman’s criticisms one can but shrug one’s shoulders and pity the poor man. Carlyle has pointed out that we can only see in anything what we have brought with us the power of seeing—and there is the whole trouble in a nutshell. But from the wordy maze of depreciation I disentangle three definite charges.

First. That Stevenson was not a genius. It is a question for posterity. Certainly, we, who still hear the voice and feel the touch of the dead man we never saw in the flesh, cannot claim to be impartial judges. But can the Watchman so claim?

Second. That Stevenson was a decadent because—’tis a strange definition, but let it pass—his work had no spiritual significance. Is there no spiritual significance in the Visitor who came to Markheim in the house of murder, in the piteous abasement of debased Huish, in the talk with the old Cevennes peasant in Travels with a Donkey, in the incident of the overturned canoe in An Inland Voyage? He that hath eyes to see let him see.

Third. That Stevenson had no creative power. This again is clearly a matter of opinion and of discernment. But the Watchman settles finally the question of his own fitness to pronounce judgment when he says it is so because all the things which Stevenson did had been done before. In a sense this is, of course, true; but any Literature Primer, or Mr. Vincent Brown himself, could have told him that this disgraceful defect was shared by Shakespeare also—to mention one name only.—I am, &c.,

That Epigram.

SIR,—Our “Bookworm” is, I think, right in rejecting the numerous claimants for the “curate’s eyes” epigram; but has he searched for it in the epigrams of the late Mr. R. E. Egerton Warburton, of Arley, co. Cheshire, of hunting song celebrity? There are numerous editions of his poems, and the above subject is treated there in a somewhat better literary form than any of those yet given to us in your columns.

Some people praise our curate’s eyes.—

Their colour I cannot divine;

He always shuts them when he prays,

And when he preaches, closes mine.

As to Mr. Crossley’s authorship, I well recollect his coming over to Arley, in the early seventies, and taking notes of what interested him there—e.g., the legend over front door:

This gate is free to all good men and true.

Right welcome thou—if worthy to pass through.

So that he may have entered the epigram in question in his note-book.—I am, &c.,

ROBERT BAILEMAN.

Benthall Hall, Broseley: April 17, 1900.

The Missing Word.

SIR,—The award in the above-named competition does not seem to me a very satisfactory one. Scotch, Irish, and Welsh people would not, I am perfectly certain, care to be referred to as Englishers. After reading Ancient Briton’s letter in the last number of the ACADEMY, I should think Briton would be a more suitable term. Why Englander should be chosen I fail to see, as that word, like Anglo-Saxon, also excludes the “Celtic fringe,” and has no more better claim to cover all British subjects than the words Scotlander or Irelander would. I am afraid, whatever word may be found suitable, it cannot be Englander, which is a name that all true-hearted Scotsmen, Irish, and Welsh would instantly object to.—I am, &c.,

H. LOGAN.

Sandgate, Prestwick: April 16, 1900.

A. J. E. writes: “In relation to Mr. Arnold White’s letter, and the words I submitted for your last week’s Competition, I beg to send you some lines for publication”:

INVOCATION!

’Tis thy glory, England—thou in the cause of Right
Hast won, and in that cause alone, would’st win, lands
Glad to yield thee empire, and for thy Empire fight:
Then, call them not thy Colonies, but—Kinlands!

Own their people kindred, forth to the world abroad,
Despite the plaint of narrow-minded Inlanders:
Yea, speak thou them as Mother, of her offspring proud:
I hail ye, loyal children, as—My Kinlanders!

In reference to this competition another correspondent suggests the word “Shakespearean.”

Maeterlinck and the “Contemporary Review.”

SIR,—If Miss Underhill works as hard at understanding Maeterlinck’s French as she has done at misunderstanding my English, even “Serres Chaudes” ought to have no mysteries for her. The phrase in her first letter to which I objected was as follows: “In all these plays [Miss Underhill had mentioned five] Mr. Ropes, while denying Maeterlinck the dramatic gift, allows his power over the chords of pity and dread—but rather thinks Mr. Kipling does it better.” What Miss Underhill really meant to refer to by the word “it” in this somewhat loose sentence I will not undertake to say; but I took “it,” naturally enough, as meaning the exciting of pity and dread generally in the minds of readers. In that case, Miss Underhill’s words, whether with or without her own intention, implied that I had compared Kipling with Maeterlinck generally, and declared the former to be the greater master of pathos and terror.

As I had done nothing of the kind, I explained what my allusion to Kipling really was. While I was discussing "L'Intruse," I, of course, mentioned Maeterlinck's method of producing an effect of supernatural horror in that play, and pointed out that Kipling, Maupassant, and others use a similar method in introducing the supernatural. But I said that to my mind the novelists were "more convincing"—or, to quote the Fat Boy, they "make your flesh creep" more than does Maeterlinck's "Intruder." This does not imply that Kipling and Maupassant are able to touch "the chords of pity and dread" with greater mastery than is shown by Maeterlinck. Supernatural horror is only one of these chords, and by no means the finest. Sheridan Le Fanu "does it better" than Kipling, some think.

But my simple explanation seems to have confused Miss Underhill entirely. "It appears," she says, "that his languid praise of Maeterlinck's use of the supernatural applies to 'L'Intruse' alone. I [Miss Underhill] credited him with perceiving the same fine qualities in 'L'Intérieur' (sic) and 'Les Aveugles.'" It was the comparison with Kipling, not the praise of Maeterlinck, languid or otherwise, that I restricted to "L'Intruse"; although, as the supernatural element comes in at the very end of "Les Aveugles," and does not come in at all in "Intérieur," I do not see what great difference that makes. I tried to do justice to "Les Aveugles" and "Intérieur" in their proper place, and Miss Underhill herself acknowledged that I had treated the latter play "with something like fairness." But no matter; Miss Underhill goes on to say, "I now gather that he did not mean to say that 'Mr. Kipling did it (the gradual accumulation of terror) better' than Maeterlinck." Let me point out that I never said that "Mr. Kipling did it better" than anybody; the words are Miss Underhill's own.

But in her first letter Miss Underhill never defined what she meant by "it"—never hinted that it referred to "the gradual accumulation of terror," or to the introduction of the supernatural. In fact, the latter subject is not even mentioned in her first letter. How was I to know that she meant to refer to the supernatural—if she did—by that accommodating "it"?—I am, &c.,

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

SHAKESPEARE THE MAN.

By GOLDWIN SMITH.

Prof. Goldwin Smith is a man of such mental range and activity that almost any serious work may be expected from him at any time. His Guesses at the Riddle of Existence has a kind of titular affinity to this guess at the riddle of Shakespeare's existence. The author does not hunt for facts. All the labours of Shakespearean biographers have produced, in his estimation, only "entries in municipal records, names on a roll, a lease, or an inventory," &c. "That orange has now been squeezed dry. It would seem better worth while to consider under what general influences—social, political, and religious—the life was passed." Prof. Smith considers this in seventy-and-seven pages, with margins wide enough for an S.T.C. to annotate every sentence. (Unwin. 2s. 6d.)

MAKERS OF LITERATURE.

By GEORGE E. WOODBERRY.

Essays on Matthew Arnold, Landor, Shelley, Lamb, Whittier, Byron, Crabbe, and others. They are reprints of articles from American reviews and magazines united by no other bond than that they "comprise all of the author's critical work which it seems desirable to reprint." Re-re-print would be the better word, since many of the papers appeared in 1890 and the title Studies in Letters and Life. (Macmillan.)

By THE REV.

THE GENIUS OF PROTESTANTISM. R. M'CHEYNE EDOAR.

This is a thick-and-thin defence of the Reformation. The following passage in the Preface seems to shut out discussion: "And between two systems which treat so differently 'the faith once for all delivered to the saints' it ought not to be difficult to decide. No thoughtful inquirer will commit himself to Rome's policy of mere expediency, when he has the alternative of a completed Canon and the promised aid of the Holy Spirit. No one, moreover, will quarrel with the Reformation who has taken the time and trouble to appreciate the Protestant spirit." It is just possible that the thoughtful inquirer will decline such partial guidance as Mr. M'Cheyne Edgar promises (Oliphant. 6s.)

THE RELIEF OF LADYSMITH.

By JOHN BLACK ATKINS.

Mr. Atkins has been representing the Manchester Guardian in South Africa, and readers of his account of the war in Cuba, contributed in despatches to the same newspaper, will be prepared for good work. In his Cuban book Mr. Atkins gave the spirit as well as the facts of the struggle, and was prodigal of anecdote and telling by-way touches. (Methuen. 6s.)

Parodied Proverbs.

Our Weekly Prize Competition.

RESULT OF NO. 30 (NEW SERIES).

THE taste of parodying proverbs seems, even at Eastertide, to be popular, and a great number of results of the wisdom of many, the wit of one, and the ingenuity of one more, have reached us. Best we like this, sent by Mr. J. J. Bell Northcote, Dowanhill-gardens, Glasgow:

A Pat may look at a Queen.

Among others are:

Competition No. 31 (New Series).

We offer a prize of a guinea this week for the best list of the twelve most popular characters in Dickens, in their order of popularity. Everyone has his own favourites—one would put Mr. Micawber first, another Mr. Pickwick, a third would vote for Mark Tapley, a fourth for Captain Cuttle, and so on. In judging this competition we shall resort to the plébiscite method, selecting for the prize the list which corresponds in the greatest number of items with the general sense.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, April 24. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the first column of p. 321, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

M. ZOLA'S New Book,

FRUITFULNESS,

Translated and Edited by ERNEST

A. VIZETELLY, will be ready on May 11. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

The following are some extracts from notices of the French original, FECONDITE:

"'Fecondité' is the triumphant song of life victorious. In it the author chants sublimely 'the poem of eternal life by eternal love'.... He sings the canticle of a whole-hearted—nay, whole-souled—union of love between man and woman."

Review of Reviews.

"Even this short review reveals how honest, how moral, how human and comely is the fable of 'Fecondité'.... It has many pages of the greatest beauty, and is a distinctly moral book. Some enterprising translator should edit it for England—and for posterity."—Manchester Guardian.

"Quite certainly there is no verbal artist working in Europe to-day who could have carried so tremendous an undertaking to so triumphant a close.... For a few hours I have laughed and lamented, suffered, triumphed, and despaired with the shadows who people its pages; and since I happen to be called upon to speak my word respecting it, I am glad and proud of the privilege of publicly thanking a man of lofty genius for a great and living book."—HENRY MURRAY, in the Sunday Sun.

AINSLIE'S JU-JU: a Romance of the Hinterland. By HAROLD BINDLOSS. Author of

"In the Niger Country." Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"It is a capital tale in every way—in plot, incident, characterization, and literary style—and deserves to be widely read."

Glasgow Herald.

"The strangeness, peril, and fascination of Anglo-African life are amply illustrated."—Dundee Advertiser.

"Always interesting and powerful; an able and attractive story, which deserves to be widely read."—Scotman.

"A powerful story, well told, full of incident, strenuously subordinated to enhance the main interest of the characters and the fulfilment of their destiny."—Morning Post.

A YOUNG DRAGON. By Sarah

TYTTER, Author of "A Honeymoon's Eclipse," &amp;c. Crown

8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE UNCHANGING EAST. By

ROBERT BARR. With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"It is a story of travel as humorous as that of Mark Twain's 'Tramp Abroad,' yet in no way a copy of that famous work, but sparkling with a fun that is all its own."—Liverpool News.

"A pleasant book of travel, likely to be read with interest and enjoyment by anybody who has gone or is going that way."—Scotman.

"Mr. Barr's book of travel is written in such rollicking spirits that one hardly likes to sit down seriously to review it. His journey was one long 'lark,' and his book might be described by the same term. The book, in short, is delightfully inspiring."—Morning Post.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

ANDROMEDA: an Idyll of the Great River. By ROBERT BUCHANAN. Author of "The Shadow of the Sword."

"This singularly powerful story.... Here is a strong and stirring story, set in picturesque surroundings and breathing the breath of life in every line of it."—Family Fair.

"In creating the shaggy sailor savage, Matt Watson, Mr. Buchanan has been forcible and clever; that much abused word 'powerful' is excusable in this case.... Altogether, the book is good reading."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE SON of the HOUSE. By

BERTHA THOMAS, Author of "The Violin-Player."

"Its all-round merit is of quite a high order, and there are times when it might not unfairly be called brilliant. Well devised, with a sufficiency of thought and stuff in it, it is skilfully and easily put together, vividly written, and full of clever workmanship. Altogether, it is a book entertaining both in matter and manner throughout."—Pall Mall Gazette.

A SECRET of the NORTH SEA.

By ALGERNON GISING.

"Of engrossing interest.... A story pulsating with life, full of energy and action, and abounding in instances of literary skill and finish."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"A strong and picturesque story.... A powerful piece of work."—Standard.

SOUR GRAPES: a Romance. By

J. F. CORNISH.

"Susceptible male readers will have difficulty in deciding whether kittenish Ruby Bashrooke or true-hearted Barbara Ashleigh is the more winsome."—Scotman.

PIONEERING

ON THE ## CONGO.

By W. HOLMAN BENTLEY,

Chevalier de l'Ordre Royal du Lion; Author of "The Dictionary and Grammar of the Kongo Language," "Life on the Congo"; Translator of the New Testament into Kongo, &amp;c.

This is a work of exceptional interest, and narrates the author's twenty-one years' experience of life along the shores of the great Congo River, and the Congo tribes which inhabit them. Mr. Bentley was one of the first missionaries sent to the Congo by the Baptist Society. He visited the Congo tribes while they were practically untouched by any foreign influence. He has lived in close contact with the people, he has reduced the Kongo Language to writing, is the well-known author of the Dictionary and Grammar of the Kongo Language, and has translated into it the New Testament. He has given in this work a full record of the triumphs of the Gospel among these savage tribes.

"It is a great story well told, and told by the man who above all others is able to write with intimate personal knowledge extending over the entire period, and with many excellent qualifications which are seldom blended in a single individual.... The type is excellent, the binding suitable, and the illustrations abundant and admirably executed.... Every public library should, by some means, be supplied with a copy. Merchants who are interested in the African trade will find many significant facts and shrewd observations; travellers and settlers in tropical countries will find many sagacious hints for the guarding of health against the deadly perils which lurk in air and soil and water."

THE GIFTS of ENEMIES: a Novel

By G. E. MITTON,

Author of "A Bachelor Girl in London,"

"Fire and Tow," &amp;c.

This is the record of a man's life from the time when he waited in half unconscious boredom for dead men's shoes, into which he was destined never to step, to the day when he discovered the richness and variety of the best that life can give. The hero, Sir Neil Hawtrey, is by turns cricket professional and journalist, and his life is by no means lacking in adventure and incident. For the first time in a novel the actual playing of cricket takes a prominent place; but it is so interwoven with the story that it will not be found tedious even by those who know nothing of the game. A clash raid in Soho is described so vividly as to suggest that the author was present at the time. Hawtrey's journalistic experiences include the exposure of a City company, a step which has a dramatic effect on his own fortunes. All who care for a vigorous and truthful account of present-day life will welcome this novel.

The Literary Week.

IN our Special Competitions, the results of which, with the prize papers, are given in a Supplement included in the present issue, eight hundred and one MSS. were submitted. They were divided thus:

Poetry Competition .....	314
Short Story " .....	128
Essay " .....	64
Things Seen " .....	157
Topographical Essay Competition .....	109
Epigrammatic Criticism Competition .....	29
	801

Our search was not rewarded by the discovery of any new writer of exceptional gifts; but the care and the industry shown is very creditable to the amateur authors who have submitted their efforts to us. The competitors hail from all over the world—India, Africa, America, and China—the majority of the efforts being by women. Six competitors will certainly be pleased. We can only express our regret that 795 must be disappointed.

MR. WINSTON SPENCER CHURCHILL has declined to hurry over the production of his book on the Natal Campaign. It will be published, we believe, this month. Mr. Churchill is also at work on a history of the whole war.

THE annual dinner of the Society of Authors will be held on May 16. Mr. Pinero will take the chair.

Two years ago Mr. J. G. Frazer, author of the Golden Bough, published his great edition of Pausanias' Description of Greece, at the somewhat prohibitive price of six guineas. Messrs. Macmillan have now included in their "Eversley" series a book of some 400 pages, which contains the introductory essay on Pausanias himself, and many finished sketches of Greek topography, scenery, and antiquities which occur incidentally in the work as Mr. Frazer follows Pausanias through his itinerary.

E. K. L. writes: "I think I noticed some while back a reference in the pages of the ACADEMY to the linguistic inaccuracies of the British novelist. The following extract is from Chapter VI. of M. André Theuriet's La Petite Dernière which is appearing by instalments in the Revue des Deux Mondes: 'Venez! je suis de l'avis des Anglais: Two is a company, three is none!' I am not a great reader of modern French fiction, and it is quite possible that slips of this kind are not infrequent, but as a faithful student of Matthew Arnold I had always imagined the Revue to be quite impeccable on points of scholarship."

MR. BERNARD K. SANDWELL writes: "The authorship of 'Illusion,' which you query in last week's ACADEMY, is by Ella Wheeler Wilcox, a poet of considerable repute in America, though whether she is known on this side I troubled not. It appeared in the Chap-Book (H. S. Stone & Co., Chicago), Vol. V., No. 2—that is, June 1, 1896. I may add that the Chap-Book was the first, and incomparably the best, of the American group of 'intimate' periodicals, was edited for a time by Bliss Carman, was a fortnightly, and died after becoming in 1897 an ordinary and respectable review."

MR. SANDWELL sends the following "corrected version":

God and I in space alone,
And nobody else in view.
And "Where are the people, O Lord" I said,
"The earth below and the sky o'erhead,
And the dead whom once I knew!"
"That was a dream," God smiled and said;
"A dream that seemed to be true.
There were no people living or dead,
There was no earth and no sky o'erhead—
There was only Myself and you."
"Why do I feel no fear," I asked,
"Meeting You here this way?
For I have sinned, I know full well;
And is there heaven, and is there hell,
And is this the Judgment Day?"
"Nay! those were but dreams," the great God said;
"Dreams that have ceased to be.
There are no such things as fear or sin;
There is no you—you never have been—
There is nothing at all but ME!"

THE Cowper celebration at Olney seems to have been very successful, and it has wonderfully freshened the poet's laurels. At Olney Cowper's characteristics were set forth in an interesting way by Mr. Clement K. Shorter, who was happy in his choice of a subject, "The Sanity of Cowper." Comparing Cowper with other poets, Mr. Shorter said:

He did not indulge in vulgar amours, as did Burns and Byron; he did not ruin his moral fibre by opium, as did Coleridge; he did not shock his best friends by an overweening egotism, as did Wordsworth; he did not spoil his life by reckless financial complications, as did Scott; or by too great an enthusiasm to beat down the world's conventions, as did Shelley. I do not here condemn any one or either of these later poets. Their lives cannot be summed up in the mistakes they made. I only urge that as it is not good to be at warfare with your fellows, to be burdened with debts that you have to kill yourself to pay, to alienate your friends by distressing mannerisms, to cease to be on speaking terms with your family—therefore Cowper, who avoided these things, and, out of the three-score years and more allotted to him, lived for some forty or fifty years, at least, a quiet, idyllic life, surrounded by loyal and loving friends, had chosen the surer and safer path.

In connexion with the Cowper Centenary an effort is being made by the churchwardens of East Dereham, in Norfolk, where Cowper died, to complete the restoration of the church at a cost of £1,400, and to erect a memorial window at a cost of £400. Contributors to the fund will have their names recorded in the parish papers, and will also receive a photograph of Flaxman's well-known monument of the poet in the church.

COWPER's life in London, before he described himself as "a stricken deer that left the herd," has naturally been little mentioned in a week when the eyes of his admirers have been fixed on Olney. A correspondent sends us the following notes on the few London localities connected with Cowper:

On leaving Westminster School, where he had been consistently bullied for eight years, Cowper was placed in an attorney's office in Ely-place, as an apprentice to the Law. Here Thurlow, the future Lord Chancellor, was his fellow-clerk, and Cowper tells us that they were "employed from morning to night in giggling and making giggle, instead of studying the law." The giggling and making giggle were redoubled when the lads went, as they often did, to the house of Cowper's aunt, Mrs. Ashley Cowper, in Southampton-row, where Cowper's two girl cousins welcomed them to mischief. The Cowper house was Number 30, and was the ninth beyond Southampton-court (now Cosmo-place), going northward. It has recently disappeared in the alterations which are preparing Southampton-row for its destiny of feeding the new "boulevard" between Holborn and the Strand.

His three years' apprenticeship ended, Cowper took rooms in the Middle Temple, removing later to the Inner Temple. His rooms in Pump-court have not been identified; but we know that he gave £250 for them, and that his windows looked into the court where, he says, "there are lime trees; and the sound of water, though passing only in pails and pitchers, is rather agreeable."

During his few years of fairly happy life in the Temple Cowper mixed with some old Westminster scholars, who dined together every Thursday, and called themselves the Nonsense Club. Their leader was the vivacious Bonnell Thornton, whose burlesque "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day" ("In strains more exalted the salt-box shall join," &c.) so tickled Dr. Johnson. Here Cowper lived in expectation that the office of Clerk of the Journals to the House of Lords would fall to him. In 1756 he scribbled a few essays for Thornton's Connoisseur, the five papers numbered 111, 115, 119, 131, and 138 being from his pen.

Everyone knows what happened when the House of Lords' pest was ready for the shyest of men. He quailed hopelessly before the difficulties of the office. Sitting in Dick's Coffee House—the eighteenth century haunt which disappeared from Fleet-street only a year or two ago—he read an article on suicide which seemed to fit his case and sanction the deed he contemplated. He walked out into the fields with a bottle of laudanum in his pocket. Fearing, however, to swallow the poison, he returned to the Temple, and ordered a coach to drive him to Tower Wharf, where he conceived there would be opportunity for another kind of exit. But the Thames tide was low, and a porter on the quay looked so forbiddingly that Cowper retreated into the coach, and was rattled through the night streets to the Temple. This wild hackney-drive to the Thames may be considered Cowper's last experience of London. His friends now stepped in.

A CORRESPONDENT writes to ask whether there is an "inexpensive edition of Jane Austen's works which is light to the hand, and printed in large, clear type. I don't want the 'dainty' editions—they are pretty to the eye, and light to hold, but the type is small. What I rather have in my mind is a volume something like the 'Standard' edition of the Waverley Novels, published by Black two or three years ago. These were 2s. 6d. each—a volume to each novel; they are light to hold, easy to read, and have a decent appearance on the bookshelf." We should say that Messrs. Macmillan's 3s. 6d. edition meets our correspondent's requirements.

THE late Duke of Argyll was a splendid figure. The aristocracy of talent and the aristocracy of birth, and vast wealth to support both, were his. A Scottish innkeeper, bewildered by the conjunction, said: "His Grace is in a verra deeficult poseetion whatever. His pride of intellect will no' let him associate with men of his ain birth, and his pride of birth will no' let him associate with men of his ain intellect." The Duke began his controversial writing at a remarkably early age. Lord Houghton said of him, "He was but seventeen when he wrote a pamphlet, Advice to the Peers, and he has gone on advising us ever since." He gave advice, too, to men of science, to socialists, and to working men. Lord Tennyson, his intimate friend, was also his sincere admirer, and his character sketch of the Duke, conveyed in the following lines, is worth recalling:

O, Patriot Statesman, be thou wise to know
The limits of resistance, and the bounds
Determining concessions; still be bold
Not only to slight praise but suffer scorn;
And be thy heart a fortress to maintain
The day against the moment, and the year:
Against the day; thy voice, a music heard
Thro' all the yells and counter-yells of feud
And faction; and thy will, a power to make
This ever-changing world of circumstance
In changing, chime with never-changing Law.

UNDER the heading "George Douglas Campbell," four pages are devoted to the Duke of Argyll's works in the British Museum Catalogue. Of these the most memorable are: The Reign of Law, The Unseen Foundations of Society, and The Philosophy of Belief. In 1894 the Duke gave the world a volume of poems, entitled Burdens of Belief, and Other Poems. These poems evoked a good deal of favourable comment, and that they were not without quality may be seen in the following invocation to Autumn:

Come burnished autumn with thy wealth of flame
And lofty clouds that float in tender blue;
Come leaves with tints too blended for a name,
And lakes resoftening lights that come from you;
Come gentle shadows on the mountains thrown,
High slopes all roseate at the close of day;
Come harvest fields by golden stubbles known,
And garnered sheaves that have been borne away;
Come perfect stillness as of sorrow born,
The passing year, as if resigned to die,
Holding reversed her sad and empty horn,
But loving yet her garlands where they lie;
Come northern wings that fly the icy seas,
Whose crash and roar break down the Polar lands—
Come fold your pinions where ye meet the breeze
From Southern tides that bathe our warmer sands;
Come lengthened shadows and the shortened day,
And night slow-passing on the ways of space,
With earlier gold that flames itself away
Into the splendours of her starry face.

A biography of the Duke may be confidently expected. Of autobiography his works contain little.

MR. VIZETELLY's version of Fécondité is almost ready. It is a translation, with certain alterations dictated by an regard for British susceptibilities. Mr. Vizetelly says:

For me the problem was how to retain the ensemble of the narrative and all the essence of the lessons which the work inculcates, while recasting some portion of it and sacrificing those matters of form to which exception was taken. It is not for me to say whether I have succeeded in the task; but I think that nothing in any degree offensive to delicate susceptibilities will be found in this present version of Fécondité.

Messrs. Chatto & Windus are the publishers.

MR. JEROME K. JEROME's sequel to Three Men in a Boat, entitled Three Men on the Bummel, will be published on May 1 by Mr. Arrowsmith. The first edition consists of 20,000 copies.

MRS. RICHARD REYNOLDS, of Cliff Lodge, Leeds, who died last Saturday, had been acquainted with some celebrated men. The daughter of Mr. Samuel Marshall, a Quaker schoolmaster of Appleby, she had formed a friendship with Wordsworth, with whom she had many a walk and talk in the garden of his Grasmere cottage. She also knew Coleridge.

MR. THOMAS B. MOSHER, the well-known publisher of Portland, Maine, sends us the following letter which has just been sent to him with a request that he would forward it to the addressee—Edward FitzGerald!

Sidney, O. : April 9, 1900.

MR. EDWARD FITZGERALD,

DEAR SIR,—I am seeking to prepare for issue soon after the close of the present year a new departure in the line of a book of Quotations.

Already there are many compilations of somewhat similar works, but all are mostly devoted to ancient or aged literature, and none entirely, if any even partially, devoted to current literature, as my proposed work, "Quotations from Productions of the Twentieth Century," vol. i., will be.

This work, if I succeed, will contain only quotations from books making their advent in the one year 1900.

The authors quoted and the works quoted from will be duly credited, and no matter will be used without proper consent being obtained.

Thus will quotations keep pace with the times, and thus will the reading public be told who are the writers of to-day and what they are writing, &c.

The work, if published, will be a legitimate book of reference.

The books of 1900 will be so numerous that no one person could be expected to read more than a very small per cent. of them; but I have provided myself with readers, and will procure more—enough to keep even with the tide.

Are you willing to devote your book, Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, to me for reading and use as per above statement?

If so, please forward a copy thereof, together with your consent to the same, to—Yours, &c.,

J. W. CONKLIN.

Mr. Mosher has recently issued a quarter-dollar reprint of the Rubaiyat, which has enjoyed a very large sale; and doubtless it is FitzGerald's fate in America, as in England, to be talked about and quoted by people who have no real appreciation of his genius. Mr. Mosher has also received communications for Miss Christina Rossetti, Mr. Walter Pater, Mr. John Addington Symonds, and Mr. Percy Bysshe Shelley!

THE Sunderland Public Library has just been presented by Mr. Field Stansfield with a letter written by Charles Dickens to his father, Mr. Clarkson Stansfield, R.A. Dickens describes various visits in one of his reading tours. The weather had been wild all over the country, "whirlwinds everywhere," and Dickens adds this postscript, interesting to Northumbrians:

I wish you could have been with me (of course in a snowstorm) one day on the Pier at Tynemouth. There was a very heavy sea running, and a perfect fleet of Screw-Merchantmen were plunging in and out on the turn of the tide at high water. Suddenly there came a golden horizon, and a most glorious Rainbow burst out, arching one large ship as if she were sailing direct for Heaven. I was so enchanted with the scene that I became oblivious of a few thousand tons of Water coming on in an enormous roller, and was knocked down and beaten over by its spray when it broke, and so completely wetted through and through that the very pockets in my pocket-book were full of sea.

It was at Tynemouth, by the way, that Dickens was tickled by the story of a poor dressmaker who, when a lady, lodging in the same house, sent her up a plate of goose on Christmas Day, returned it with a request that the lady would "disseminate her goose in her own sphere."

IN last week's Londoner Mr. Owen Seaman has these pleasant verses:

TO MR. AUSTIN DOBSON

AFTER HIMSELF.

(Rondeau of Villon.)

AT sixty years, when April's face
Retrieves, as now, the winter's cold,
Where tales of other Springs are told
You keep your courtly pride of place.

Within the circle's charmed space
You rest unchallenged, as of old,
At sixty years.

Not Time nor Silence sets its trace
On golden lyre and voice of gold;
Our Poets' Poet, still you hold
The laurels got by no man's grace—
At sixty years.

MR. J. M. BARRIE, who will attain his fortieth birthday on May 9, is the subject of an article in the Temple Magazine. The stories told of him mainly illustrate his wish not to be interviewed, anecdoted, or otherwise disturbed. When asked on one occasion to contribute an account of his life to a volume of "living celebrities," Mr. Barrie began a mock biography thus: "On arrival in London it was Mr. Barrie's first object to make a collection of choice cigars. Though the author of My Lady Nicotine does not himself smoke, his grocer's message boy does. Mr. Barrie's pet animal is the whale. He feeds it on ripe chestnuts."

AMERICAN slow humour—as distinct from American sly humour—has its points. Read the following slowly. Read it line by line.

John Henderson lay dying. He was a man of sterling qualities and fair position, a thrifty follower of life's duties, respected by all that knew him. The old family physician bent over his bedside. They had been boys together.

"John," the old doctor spoke huskily, "you are going to die. I have done all that I can. I think I ought to tell you this. I know that you are not afraid of death, but before you go there may be something that you would like to say, or something that you would like to have done. We have known each other all our lives. Tell me if you want anything and it shall be done."

The sick man was silent. He looked toward the open door of the bedroom, moved slightly, and then spoke.

"There's only one thing. And you won't think that it's trivial and foolish, will you, doctor? Fifteen years ago, just as I was becoming old enough to desire some rest and to think I had earned it, I built this house. My oldest daughter was then just coming nineteen. There are, as you know, five others. The youngest is nineteen now. Now, if you don't think it's asking too much, if you will pardon a tired old man's last request, there's just one thing I would like to have you do for me. You say I've got two hours more to live. I wish that you'd take me up and put me on the lounge that stands in the corner of the parlour. I hain't scarcely had a chance to go in there for all these fifteen years, and if it ain't asking too much, and you think I won't discommode the girls more'n I ought to, I'd kind o' like to be in there once for a little while before I die."

THE valuable Catalogue of Drawings by British Artists now being compiled by Mr. Lawrence Binyon, who besides being a poet is an assistant in the Print Department of the British Museum, has reached its second (D-H) volume. The name which fills the greatest number of pages is that of John Doyle, the "H. B." of bygone Punch numbers. But greater names than Doyle's are, of course, included, as Flaxman, Gainsborough, Girtin, and Hogarth, and, among foreign artists, Hollar and Holbein.

FROM the article on Ruskin in the April Quarterly Review: "For tender pathos and exquisite poetry nothing can surpass the touching lines with which he ended his last notes on Turner's drawings:

Morning breaks, as I write, along these Coniston Fells, and the level mists, motionless and grey beneath the rose of the moorlands, veil the lower woods and the sleeping village and the long lawns by the lake shore. Oh, that some one had but told me in my youth, when all my heart seemed to be set on these colours and clouds, that appear for a little while and then vanish away, how little my love of them would serve me when the silence of lawn and wood in the dews of morning should be completed, and all my thoughts should be of those whom by neither I was to meet more."

WHILE in Ireland the Queen accepted a copy of that excellent book Some Experiences of an Irish R.M., by E. A. Somerville and Martin Ross.

MR. JOHN LANE has this week added Browning's The Statue and the Bust to the "Flowers of Parnassus" series.

THE Gresham Publishing Company announce that early in May they will reissue Thompson's Gardener's Assistant under the editorship of Mr. William Watson. Mr. Watson is an assistant curator at Kew Gardens.

Bibliographical.

IT is impossible to gather from the accounts in the daily papers whether or not Mr. Herman Merivale's "Lyrics of Pericles" (to which I referred the other day) were used in Mr. Coleman's adaptation of the play as performed this week at Stratford-on-Avon. The said "Lyrics" were written specially for the adaptation, into which the element of music was intended to enter largely. Five in number, they do not rise to a very considerable poetic height. Take, for example, these lines in "Thaisa's Dirge":

Thaisa fair, under the cold sea lying,
Sleeps the long sleep denied to her by Earth;
We, adding sighs unto the wild winds' sighing,
With all our mourning under-mourn her worth;
The white waves toss their crested plumes above her,
Round sorrowing faces with the salt spray wet,
All are her lovers that once learned to love her,
And never may remember to forget.

This last line, I need not say, is much more Victorian than Elizabethan. Better than this is the invocation to Ceres, beginning:

Goddess of the golden horn,
Plenty's queen when man was born,
Hear us when we bend the knees,
To thine high divinity:
Hear the infant's hungering cry,
Mothers' prayer no more deny:
Shed thy store o'er field and town,
Ceres, send thy blessing down.

Altogether, this endeavour to go hand in hand with Shakespeare was not so successful as could be desired. It is not so easy to collaborate with the Bard. Mr. Swinburne once wrote a song for introduction into performances of "The Merry Wives of Windsor"; but, charming as it was (it is preserved in full in Mr. Hollingshead's Gaiety Chronicles, page 271), it was not Shakespeare: it was Swinburne, and very good Swinburne too.

Most of the literary talk this week is about Cowper, of whose Task, I see, there is a new illustrated edition. There is no getting away from Cowper. Last year there came from America a book about him by Marion Harland—one of a series called "Literary Hearthstones" (fancy!). From the same generous source we also got last year a selection from the poems. In 1898 there was an illustrated edition of John Gilpin; in 1896 came a selection from the poems and a collection of the shorter poems; to 1895 belong an edition of the poems (Aldine) and a selection from the Letters. The last-named had been preceded in 1893 by a compilation of the Best Letters, sent over here from the States. Then in 1892 Mr. Wright wrote Cowper's Life, Mr. Benham edited his Letters, and Mrs. Oliphant edited his Select Poems. The two latter additions were to the "Golden Treasury" series; they had appeared originally in 1884 and 1883 respectively. Farther back than that, I think, we need not go, except to mention Mr. Goldwin Smith's Monograph on Cowper and Mr. Neve's Concordance to the Poems (which came out in 1887).

Two more anthologies are promised—one by "Q." which is to cover the whole ground of English lyric poetry, and the other by Mr. J. L. Brennan, which is to deal only with the period From Blake to Arnold. The latter, I gather, is to illustrate "the romantic revival"; for the former I see no particular raison d'être, unless "Q." is going to make a determined effort to supersede The Golden Treasury. Moreover, is not Mr. Arber even now in the throes of producing a mammoth anthology of English verse? "Q." has already given us The Golden Pomp—the rather affected title of "a procession of English lyrics from Surrey to Shirley." Let us hope that the new collection will not be on so elaborate a scale as that.

Mr. Seaman's rondeau, addressed to Mr. Austin Dobson on the occasion of the latter completing his sixtieth year, is no doubt a neat little piece of work, albeit not very smoothly turned. I should prefer to it Mrs. E. Nisbet's rondeau in celebration of Mr. Dobson, beginning—

Your dainty muse her form arrays
In soft brocades in bygone days.

J. Russell Lowell penned a rondeau of thanks to Mr. Dobson for a copy of his Old World Idylls, but he seemed not to move quite comfortably in the shackles imposed upon him by the "form" adopted. He was hampered, too, by a prosaic "refrain."

The monograph which Mr. Hector Macpherson has written on the subject of Mr. Herbert Spencer, and which is advertised to appear to-day (Friday), is not the first attempt that has been made to popularise Mr. Spencer's career and thought. So recently as 1894 Mr. W. H. Hudson's book on the Philosophy and Life of Mr. Spencer was published here, reaching a second edition; and to the same year belongs the appearance of the first part of Mr. F. H. Collins's Epitome of the Synthetic Philosophy. The issue in 1894 of a little collection of Aphorisms from Mr. Spencer's writings may also be said to have done something to introduce the philosopher to "the man in the street."

We are to have a sixpenny edition of The New Magdalen, which Wilkie Collins published originally in 1873. Considering how large an advertisement the book has had through the medium of the dramatised version, in which Miss Ada Cavendish and (latterly) Miss Janet Achurch were so popular, it is a little surprising that the story has not had a greater vogue. I am open to correction if wrong, but I fancy there has been no fresh edition of the work since 1874, though, of course, there may have been many reprints from stereotypes.

I see that Messrs. Chatto & Windus announce the imminent publication of a story by Mrs. Pender Cudlip entitled Comrades True. Now, a tale named Comrades True was issued in 1891 by Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier, who would have, I suppose, some ground of complaint against Mrs. Cudlip if she now used the title.

"The Divine Chit-Chat of Cowper."

The Letters of Cowper. Bohn's Libraries. (G. Bell & Sons.)

Cowper's Letters. "Golden Treasury" Series. (Macmillan & Co. 2s. 6d.)

CHARLES LAMB's remark, that he could call no man his friend who was offended by the divine chit-chat of Cowper, has, after what has been already a long life of usefulness, during the current week been a good deal overworked. A Cowper Centenary such as is now raging at Olney was bound to bring it forth, for no one else has put the case so well. "The divine chit-chat of Cowper" is the exact phrase. Turning over the four volumes of the poet's Life and epistolary prattle in Bohn's Library (as we have been doing again the past few nights), the truth of Lamb's position is more and more apparent to us. Not to care much about these letters is a natural and conceivable enough state of things for many good minds to confess to; but to be offended by them? The man who should be offended by them was truly out of the Elian circle of sympathies.

While yielding to no one in affection for Cowper's letters, we admit to a conviction that a sympathetic yet strongly blue-pencilled editor would certainly do them no harm. Side by side with a pellucid stream of good sense and good humour trickles a rivulet of Huntingdon small beer which could be diverted out of the volumes without injury. We do not mean such an excellent piece of humorous writing as the account of the invasion of the poet's home by the parliamentary candidate—a passage from which Dickens may have learnt something—of which this is a portion:

Candidates are creatures not very susceptible of affronts and would rather, I suppose, climb in at a window, than be absolutely excluded. In a minute, the yard, the kitchen, and the parlour were filled. Mr. Grenville, advancing toward me, shook me by the hand with a degree of cordiality that was extremely seducing. As soon as he and as many more as could find chairs were seated, he began to open the intent of his visit. I told him I had no vote, for which he readily gave me credit. I assured him I had no influence, which he was not equally inclined to believe, and the less, no doubt, because Mr. Ashburner, the draper, addressing himself to me at this moment, informed me that I had a great deal. Supposing that I could not be possessed of such a treasure without knowing it, I ventured to confirm my first assertion, by saying, that if I had any I was utterly at a loss to imagine where it could be, or wherein it consisted. Thus ended the conference. Mr. Grenville squeezed me by the hand again, kissed the ladies, and withdrew. He kissed likewise the maid in the kitchen, and seemed upon the whole a most loving, kissing, kind-hearted gentleman. He is very young, genteel, and handsome. He has a pair of very good eyes in his head, which not being sufficient as it should seem for the many nice and difficult purposes of a senator, he has a third also, which he wore suspended by a ribbon from his buttonhole.

That is Cowper's happiest descriptive manner; happiest and least restricted. The amused satirical mind is at play and enjoying the game. But only now and then do we get anything so unusual as the visit of a candidate or the escape of a hare. A selection of Cowper's Letters does, of course, exist: the excellent little volume in the "Golden Treasury" series; but there is still much to be done to prepare a serviceable and convenient edition which should answer the purpose of the "general reader."

Yet as to what the general reader knows, or thinks, or needs of Cowper, we are not competent to speak. "John Gilpin" has fortunately become a nursery classic, so that it is impossible to avoid that; but, after "John Gilpin," who has read through "The Task"? Who knows (remember that we are speaking of "general readers") even the subject of "Tirocinium"? The exquisite lines on receiving his mother's picture are still read, few collections of poetry being without them, and the same may be said for a few of the shorter pieces, such as "The Loss of the Royal George" and "The Dog and the Water Lily," and the translation of Vincent Bourne's "Jackdaw." But in how many homes are Cowper's Poems household words to-day? And yet his message is still what it was; the world has altered not at all, except on the surface, and no one is doing his work better. The debt which English poetry owes to Cowper is considerable, for he was the first acceptable revolutionist against the artifice that held the muse captive for so long before his day. We say acceptable, because, strictly speaking, Crabbe came before Cowper, but for every one reader that Crabbe had Cowper must have numbered fifty. Cowper was the first acceptable eighteenth-century poet to go straight to nature. It is with the names of Wordsworth and Coleridge that the great revolt is associated; but Cowper came before them. Cowper's work was done almost before the "Lyrical Ballads" were talked of between the two young enthusiasts walking in the Quantock Hills. That is, of course, all right. Most, if not all, great movements have had a humble foreshadower before the critical time and the chosen force arrive, and Cowper was the last man to want public praise. "I am merry," he wrote to Newton concerning "Table Talk," "that I may decoy people into my company, and grave that they may be the better for it." That expresses his ambition. And to-day, no less than ever, it is well to be decoyed into the company of this kindly, keen-eyed, witty, poetical gentleman, whether his medium is the limpid verse of his poetry, or the easy, crystal, clear prose of his letters.

For how perfect a control of words he has for the expression of his divine chit-chat! No matter what he has to say, whether he describes an Olney neighbour, or the sudden apparition of the hunt as he walks abroad, or the health of Mrs. Unwin, or his views on Pope, or discusses a religious point with one of his correspondents, he is always the same, always deliberate and perspicuous and musical, and yet forceful. It is the prose of everyday life carried out to its highest power. Let us give a few excerpts taken almost as we find them. First, a glimpse of the poet at home (in 1782) in a letter to Joseph Hill:

How different is the complexion of your evenings and mine!—yours, spent amid the ceaseless hum that proceeds from the inside of fifty noisy and busy periwigs; mine, by a domestic fireside, in a retreat as silent as retirement can make it; where no noise is made but what we make for our own amusement. For instance here are two rustics, and your humble servant in company. One of the ladies has been playing on the harpsichord, while I, with the other, have been playing at battledore and shuttlecock. A little dog, in the meantime, howling under the chair of the former, performed, in the vocal way, to admiration. This entertainment over, I began my letter, and having nothing more important to communicate, have given you an account of it.

Such was Cowper's life for years and years, varied only by his occasional lapses into melancholia. Here is a criticism:

I return you many thanks for Boswell's Tour. I read it to Mrs. Unwin after supper, and we find it amusing. There is much trash in it, as there must always be in every narrative that relates indiscriminately all that passed. But now and then the Doctor speaks like an oracle, and that makes amends for all. Sir John was a coxcomb, and Boswell is not less a coxcomb, though of another kind. I fancy Johnson made coxcombs of all his friends, and they in return made him a coxcomb; for, with reverence be it spoken, such he certainly was, and flattered as he was, he was sure to be so.

Here is a pleasant fancy forming part of an apology for having so little time in which to write letters. Cowper wonders how the antediluvians found the days go:

I will suppose myself born a thousand years before Noah was born or thought of. I rise with the sun; I worship; I prepare my breakfast; I swallow a bucket of goats' milk, and a dozen good sizeable cakes. I fasten a new string to my bow, and my youngest boy, a lad of about thirty years of age, having played with my arrows till he has stript off all the feathers, I find myself obliged to repair them. The morning is thus spent in preparing for the chase, and it is become necessary that I should dine. I dig up my roots; I wash them; I boil them; I find them not done enough; I boil them again; my wife is angry; we dispute; we settle the point; but in the meantime the fire goes out, and must be kindled again. All this is very amusing. I hunt; I bring home the prey; with the skin of it I mend an old coat, or I make a new one. By this time the day is far spent; I feel myself fatigued, and retire to rest. Thus what with tilling the ground and eating the fruit of it, hunting and walking, and running, and mending old clothes, and sleeping and rising again, I can suppose an inhabitant of the primeval world so much occupied as to sigh over the shortness of life, and to find at the end of many centuries, that they had all slipt through his fingers, and were passed away like a shadow. What wonder then that I, who live in a day of so much greater refinement, when there is so much more to be wanted, and wished, and to be enjoyed, should feel myself now and then pinched in point of opportunity, and at some loss for leisure to fill four sides of a sheet like this?

Finally, a sentiment not without pertinence to-day, when discussions concerning patriotism often rage too fiercely:

Mr. Newton and I are of one mind on the subject of patriotism. Our dispute was no sooner begun than it ended. It would be well, perhaps, if, when two disputants begin to engage, their friends would hurry each into a separate chaise, and order them to opposite points of the compass. Let one travel twenty miles east, the other as many west; then let them write their opinions by the post. Much altercation and chafing of the spirit would be prevented; they would sooner come to a right understanding, and running away from each other, would carry on the combat more judiciously, in exact proportion to the distance.

Let us hope that the Cowper Centenary will prompt many persons to turn their attention to Cowper's letters.

A United Italy.

A History of Italian Unity: being a Political History of Italy from 1814 to 1871. By Bolton King, M.A. 2 vols. (Nisbet.)

"It is easy to demonstrate that an united Italy has had its disappointments; it would be easier to prove that a divided Italy would have had more." The reader of Mr. Bolton King's two portly volumes will cordially endorse this latter opinion. Nor will it need the eight hundred pages which Mr. King has covered to convince him. The history of Italy from the invasion of the Barbarians down to the middle of the nineteenth century is only less confusing in its complexity than the history of Germany over the same period, in that the factors were, perhaps, somewhat more permanent. It is difficult to write the history of either Germany or Italy as of an undivided whole, for the theoretical bonds which did exist were only retained because they did not bind, and the central points exercised a centrifugal rather than a centripetal influence. Hence, in any case, a history of Italy is a formidable work. The wealth of new material on which Mr. King has drawn must have greatly increased the magnitude of the task which he set himself. The result is a vast storehouse of accumulated and ordered historical facts in the history of modern Italy, put together with the consummate skill of a trained historian, and written down with very considerable attention to the form of composition. But to the ordinary reader such detailed treatment is forbidding. The whole tone of the book presupposes such an acquaintance with the history of modern Europe, and of Italy in particular, that even fairly well informed readers will probably find themselves soon out of their depth. The fact is, that Mr. King has assumed too hastily that his readers are as enamoured of the subject as he is himself, while he is also conscious that he is telling the story of the struggle for Italian unity to the British public for practically the first time at any considerable length. Thus, the author must not be surprised if he speaks only to a limited audience. The compensation will be, we fear, not to his pocket, but to his pride of authorship; for it is a book that should be possessed by every public library and every private one that can afford it, while no future historian of Europe in the nineteenth century will be able or, indeed, will want to ignore it.

Recent events have helped to cement the bonds between Italy and England. An Englishman has no thought about Italy but to wish her well. Her manifest unrest and insecure unity fill him with nothing but apprehension and sorrow. But perhaps, on the contrary, the fact that she has got so far on her road towards unity ought to give him ground for much hope. That a great deal yet remains to be done before the Sicilian and the Lombard feel themselves really part of the same nationality is quite true; but of the vast difficulties already overcome on the road towards such a consummation this book is a record. We have long ago consecrated the great names associated in idea, though by no means always in practice, with the great achievement. Mr. King does not remove any of them—Mazzini, Garibaldi, Cavour, Victor Emmanuel—from the pedestal to which popular fame has raised them, but he shows them in their weakness as well as in their strength. The hero of the first volume is Mazzini, of the second Cavour; for the note of the time to 1849 was aspiration, that of the following years achievement. "The movement," says Mr. King, "that Mazzini and Gioberti and Pius (IX.) had inspired had been essentially religious. . . . Their generation praised God; the new generation thought more of keeping its powder dry. . . . Mazzini flinched from no sacrifice. . . . The new movement . . . put its faith in discipline." Hence Mazzini in his later years descended into a vulgar conspirator, and did more harm than good to the great cause. The fact was that he was a theoretical republican. "In the Republic Mazzini saw the ideal Commonwealth, where privilege was banished, where the poor were made the State's first care, where association and education opened an infinite vista of progress." But Italy needed the strongest of monarchies, strong enough to command the confidence of the great body of the Italian people, and skilful enough to pursue a cunning and successful foreign policy. Nevertheless it is true that "it was Mazzini's faith that made a united Italy possible, that led even beyond the existing fact, beyond the schemes of federation, that till now had been the utmost bourn of national hope, on to what seemed the utopian and impossible, but which his teaching was to make the gospel of the nation. Only through unity, he believed and made them believe, could Italy be strong and democratic; only when Rome became her capital could she hold her place among the nations of Europe, and teach a nobler ideal of government." Again, Mr. King says finely of Mazzini: "He had the genius to see that men require unselfish motives to stir them to noble deeds, that they will never rise above themselves save for a great and good cause, that it needs some sacred idea which goes to the souls of men, to move them to action that means loss of love or home or life."

Cavour reaped what Mazzini and his followers had sowed. "He had his ideals, but he kept them to himself, and . . . he rarely allowed himself to be drawn a step beyond what the practical opportunities of the moment warranted. His object was to make the constitution march." "Open-minded opportunist" that he was, for him the unity of Italy was bound up with monarchy and the predominance of the House of Piedmont. The political end was to be attained somehow, and it was attained, but rather as a gift from a magnanimous patron in the shape of the French Emperor than as a spontaneous effort of the Italian people. Hence came most of the difficulties of subsequent years. For Mazzini's ideal Italy would have had to wait long generations, and it might have worked out in a shape that he would have been the first to repudiate, but one is almost inclined to believe that the resulting unity would have been sounder and more natural than the somewhat hasty and artificially created unity which we see.

It is true that outside circumstances were not propitious. Cavour's death removed at a critical moment the one man who held all the necessary diplomatic threads. Napoleon III. gave assistance which was both indispensable and deplorably mischievous. Almost the one stroke of luck was the Crimean War, of which Cavour took such magnificent advantage to assert the right of his country to a place in the councils of Europe. No less mischievous than the French Emperor was Pope Pius IX. His undignified attitude increased the sympathy for Italian unity in neutral Europe, and did untold harm to his own Church, if not to the cause of religion itself. To Garibaldi was due the union of Naples and Sicily with the rest of the kingdom. After that was accomplished, he was a restless and mischievous free-lance. Finally, Victor Emmanuel—"a rough, good-natured, bad-tempered man, of phenomenal ugliness, plain, almost boorish, in his tastes, without a trace of genius, but with a certain robust, direct common sense"—enables us to understand the limits of Italian unity. There was little idealism about the result. Victor Emmanuel, Cavour, and Napoleon III.—a less idealistic trio perhaps scarcely ever existed. But the unity has been achieved, however artificial, and common sense would seem to dictate its maintenance. Naturally the way in which a real unity shall be ultimately attained must be left to the Italians themselves, but Mr. King's excellent book will help their many English sympathisers to understand and appreciate the magnitude of the work that still remains to be done.

Old Wives' Tales.

Storyology: Essays in Folk-lore, Sea-lore, and Plant-lore.
By Benjamin Taylor. (Elliot Stock.)

MR. TAYLOR does not affect to treat scientifically the subject of folk-lore. His object is professedly popular. He has been content to present his reader with certain posies of old-world superstitions, gathered under a few broad divisions, which are largely indicated by the title. Nevertheless he cannot resist a little dalliance with the theory of myths; and he plumps boldly for the purely material view of their origin from the soil, from actual things, persons, and events. Plurality of interpretation is a scandal to him. In his modern, analytical prepossession that a single thing can have but a single significance, he overlooks the possibility that a myth may, in the mind of its inventors and early understanders, have had several meanings, all parallel or cognate. The sky may have been "an airy, infinite, radiant vault," as a matter of literal knowledge, yet symbolically a person; nor would this prevent it, for the convenience of another myth, assuming the association of "a material roof." How can they be all right? may be a natural question; but the thing is possible. It is the old story of the two sides of the shield. Only the mythological shield has many more than two sides.

Mr. Taylor does, in dealing with the rod, admit that it was obviously a sign of authority, and that its origin was symbolic; but he is far to seek when he tries to determine that origin, suggesting Noah's olive-branch, Aaron's rod, and what not. Not to go too far into the matter, the rod was connected with the tree, and so symbolised vital potency or energeia (in the Greek sense). A man's rod signified the special potency, the sap, that was in him as an individual—what we should now call his personality. With this concurred the uses of the rod or staff, as support or weapon; for a man's vital potency was alike his stay, his strength, and his source of effect or compulsion upon others—of authority upon others. The king's rod showed the divine potency in him as king. And the material of the rod showed the kind of power symbolised—gold, divine power; the reed (brittle, and growing in the waters) mere natural power, and so forth.

But we will not "consider too curiously," as Horatio says; the more that explanation is not Mr. Taylor's strong point. Let us rather gather a handful of the picturesque superstitions which he has pleasantly collated. The moon is one of his most interesting themes. We protest, however, at the outset against the unprincipled attempt of Mr. Baring-Gould to lay a mythological hand upon unoffending and innocent nursery-rhyme. Jack and Jill are wondrously traced to a Scandinavian Hjúki and Bil, who were caught up by the moon as they were carrying a pitcher of water from the well Brygir. With a refinement of sacrilege, Mr. Baring-Gould proceeds to reduce Jack and Jill to moon-spots, and to suggest that their successive falls represent the consecutive vanishing of the moon-spots. And doubtless the cow which vaulted the same luminary was the cow of Isis, nor is it dubious that the invocation to the cat may have had some obscure connexion with the puss-headed Pasht—come the fiddle whence it may!—and, in short, the possibilities are too frightful. This kind of thing, at least, must be resisted.

It is more humanising to read that country lasses sat astride stiles to greet the new moon with—"A fine moon! God bless her!" as if she were a new-born child. The Samoan man-in-the-moon, by the way, is a woman (if we may be suffered the bull). She was one Sina, who was cutting mulberry-bark for cloth, in a famine-time, with her child by her. Up rose the full moon—like a great bread-fruit, thought Samoan Sina. "Why cannot you come down and let my child have a bit of you?" she asked—rash-tongued, for the moon, irate at being considered edible, came down with a vengeance, and took the whole "show" (as our cousins say) up with her. In the full moon the Samoans still see Sina and her child's face, and her board and mallet. Now (though Mr. Taylor does not notice this) the name Sina is simply a feminised form of Sin, the old Canaanitish moon-god, who has left his name on the Desert of Sin (traversed by the Israelites) and in many other forms. It is interesting to find that "glamour" really rises from the association of the moon with magic. Glam, in the nominative form glámir, is a poetical word in the prose Edda of India, which was, it seems, an old name for the moon. There is a charming legend of Southern India, told by Miss Frere, which accounts for why the sun is blazing and avoided (by Hindoos), the wind parching and abominable in the hot weather, but the moon grateful, bright, and cool. Gluttony is at the bottom of it. They are all children of a very distant star, it appears, and one day they went to dine with their uncle and aunt, the Thunder and Lightning. (Most unexpected relatives!) Sun and Wind ate all they could, but the Moon put away bits of everything for the mother under her beautiful long finger-nails. (Heaven save the lady's husband from a predestinate scratched face, as Beatrice would say!) When they got home, Sun and Wind not only had nothing in answer to their mother's inquiries whether they had remembered her at dinner, but "cheeked" her into the bargain. Moon, however, with a bright smile, shook her hands, and showered down the finest feast ever was seen. Wherefore their mother cursed the Sun and Wind, but gave perpetual blessing to the Moon. A more home-association is recalled by the recent passage of Good Friday; for the hot-cross bun is nothing but a Christianised relic of the cakes which the Jewish exiles (in Jeremiah) offered to the "Queen of Heaven." These had the image of the goddess, instead of the cross; and moon-cakes are still made in China during the great moon-festival of the eight month.

The sea affords Mr. Taylor another plentiful crop, but, on the whole, of less interest than might be looked for. It is largely connected with odd derivations. It is odd, for example, to learn that the John Dory was supposed to be the very fish from which St. Peter took the coin for the temple-tribute; and the two marks on either side the mouth are the impressions of the Apostle's thumb and forefinger, wherewith he drew it from the sea. Now, St. Peter being the door-keeper of Heaven, John Dory is just a corruption of janitor. "Mother Cary's chickens" are from the mediæval belief that those birds were the Madonna's storm warning, "Mother Cary" being Mater Cara, the "Beloved Mother." "Davy Jones's Locker" requires a mighty deal of believing. "Davy" is traced to the Hindu Devas, regarded as evil spirits—from which root is our Devil. "Jones" is identified with Jonah, who was marooned in a desert whale; while the "locker" is (toughest of all) traced to Loki, the Scandinavian spirit of ill, who might be supposed to have his receptacle for lost souls at the bottom of the sea.

Perhaps that morsel will suffice for the reader's present digestion. Mr. Taylor's book is readable and gossipy, and will pass an agreeable hour for such as are interested in "old wives' tales" without caring to study them deeply or scientifically—if science can be predicated with regard to our present knowledge of the subject. And to more than this it does not pretend.

Edwardus Gratiopus.

The History of Edward the Third. By James Mackinnon, Ph.D. (Longmans.)

DR. MACKINNON'S monograph is based on "the investigation of contemporary evidence," and, if an apology for writing once more the history of Edward the Third is required, it may be found in the number of "new or improved sources" made available during recent years. Not only have many of the minor chronicles of the fourteenth century been issued in the "Rolls" series, or in corresponding Scotch, French, and Belgian collections, but even Froissart himself has been, as Dr. Mackinnon puts it, "re-created" in the magnificent editions founded upon contemporary texts of M. Luce and Baron de Lettenhove.

Dr. Mackinnon's volume is by no means an eulogy of Edward the Third. He realises the bigness of the man, "the incarnation of the aggressive English spirit," who had the will and the strength to make the history of England practically the history of Western Europe for half a century. But it is his final judgment, as it must surely be that of every unprejudiced student of the period, that the energy was misapplied and misdirected, and that the policy which threw France and Scotland into flames is one of the more disastrous examples of the craving of kings for aggrandisement. Dr. Mackinnon, indeed, is no drum and trumpet historian. He is a little impatient with the details of marches and slaughters; and, having lifted the veil of chivalry, holds it but in scant respect. "In the wars of Edward III.," says Hallam, "originating in no real animosity, the spirit of honourable as well as courteous behaviour towards the foe seemed to have reached its highest point." But Dr. Mackinnon somewhat grimly points out that the courtesy soon vanishes when you get on the actual track of one of Edward's expeditions, with its invariable accompaniment of wasted fields, and burned villages, and violated women. The trappings of chivalry and romance, however, are certainly not wanting throughout the reign. Imposing in appearance, and of fascinating bearing, the king himself well became a pageant. Edwardus Gratiopus—Edward the Graceful—the chroniclers call him, although history has not adopted the epithet. In the court feasts of the reign, elaborate heraldic and chivalric ceremonial roached its highest point. The establishment, in imitation of King Arthur at Tintagel, of a Round Table, and that some years later of the still surviving Order of the Garter, are familiar events. Froissart, indeed, confused them, but they are distinct. Less known is the story of the "Vow of the Heron," taken by Edward in 1337, before the Hundred Years' War began. The instigator was Robert of Artois.

One day Robert went a-hunting with his falcon and caught a heron, with which he entered the royal banquetting hall at London, where Edward was holding high festival in honour of his guest, John of Hainault. Robert presented the bird to the king, saying that he offered the most timid of birds to the least courageous of monarchs, for had Edward been a man of spirit he would ere now have laid claim to the crown of France. The king reflected a little. "It is not true," replied he at length, "that I am wanting in courage. I was maliciously deceived when I did homage at Amiens to Philip of Valois. But now I vow to God, to the heron, and to the queen, that before a year has run I shall place on her head the crown of France, even if I have but one Englishman to oppose to six Frenchmen." At this Robert laughed a loud and grim laugh, and calling a damsel from the banquetting-table, placed the heron in her hands, and besought her to aid him to bear it manfully in war, like King Porus, who long ago had sworn on a peacock, borne by a young lady fair. He then conducted her before the queen, the Earls of Salisbury, Hereford, and Suffolk, the Bishops of Durham and Lincoln, the Lord of Fauquemont and Walter de Manny, who each vowed on the heron to carry war into the kingdom of France. He next turned to John of Hainault, who would fain have excused himself, saying, with unchivalrous bluntness, that he would serve whoever would pay best. At which the English lords laughed heartily, and ultimately John of Hainault took the vow with the rest, the queen adding that, with the sanction of her husband, she vowed to God and the heron that if the king crossed the sea to vindicate his rights, she would follow him in his travels.

Dr. Mackinnon, we think, takes this picturesque narrative rather seriously as history, but at least it illustrates the temper of the fourteenth century chroniclers and their public.

We find in Dr. Mackinnon's book a learned, a judicious, and not an unentertaining treatment of its subject. The style is, perhaps, a little uncouth, more particularly when he gambols. Carlyle would appear to have still his hold upon the Scotch imagination, and you recognise him, but how far off, in such a passage as the following:

Once more, what a fool of a world is this misguided fourteenth century. Clearly lunatic, and, as is always the case with lunatics, unconscious of the fact. Otherwise we should not find sanguinary clerics ascribing to "our Lord" the honour of such savage orgies, and giving thanks to God accordingly. Heigho! what a perverted moral sense sometimes lurks under stole and tunic.

Nor can we commend the absence of an index, and of what is rapidly becoming recognised as no less essential in a work of erudition than an index, a bibliography or hand list of authorities.

Discreet Satire.

The Trials of the Bantocks. By G. S. Street. (Lane. 3s. 6d.)

It is Mr. Street's pleasant way to assume in his books, with unusual skill and verisimilitude, objectionable characteristics that are really foreign to his nature. In his Autobiography of a Boy he played at being a hateful and very kickable little decadent pig. In the present work he is a social parasite, a tame cat, a flatterer attached to a wealthy upper middle-class family. This position enables him to see all that passes and afterwards to record it. As, for the most part, there is nothing to see but selfishness and paltriness, snobbishness and greed, the result would be monotonous indeed were it not for Mr. Street's happy equipment of the historian with a gift of toadyism that causes him to view such displays with approbation. His unassailable belief in the perfection of Mrs. Bantock in spite of every evidence to the contrary, and the naïve manner in which this belief is stated, save the situation, so that what is a merciless indictment of the indulgence and spiritual apathy of the unthinking and self-righteous rich is also a work of amusing humour.

The book is, however, too long. Two, at least, of the episodes might well have been omitted. The man who slapped Mr. Bantock on the back is a stage figure not worthy of a place in Mr. Street's first-hand gallery, and the account of the athletic sports is singularly unprovocative of laughter and not in the least convincing. We can neither believe that Mr. Bantock would have joined the sack race nor that he would have won it. Mr. Street might also have deleted certain repetitions, and we doubt if the chapter entitled "Moss" is quite necessary to the picture. But for the rest we have nothing but praise. Perhaps the best thing in the book is the "Ordeal of Russell Bantock." We quote part of the description of Russell Bantock which serves as preamble to his great trial:

His private income is at present only two thousand a year, and in his opinion that is an insufficient sum on which, in his position, to marry; in a few years it will be considerably increased, and then, I believe, he will add his influence to the institution of matrimony; in fact, I know that he has already fixed on his future house, though not yet on the lady. In this matter he is wisely careful not to commit himself, being aware that in the course of a few years his inclinations might change—unless, indeed, a peculiarly desirable person (in point of rank or money) were to be attainable, in which case he has told me in confidence that he might hurry matters to an earlier issue. I need hardly say that he belongs to two irreproachable clubs. He has little time for literary cultivation, but keeps up an acquaintance with contemporary letters by reading the reviews of new books in the Times, and he has told me that he would be quite charmed to meet a few of the better-known writers of the period, simply as writers, and not counting those whose social position would make them in any case people one likes to know. In fact, Russell is an accomplished and admirable example of English young manhood: he is business-like and far-seeing, and not disdaining the amusements natural to his years, he pursues them with unvarying discretion.

The ordeal was the necessity, one Sunday morning in the height of the season, to walk up Piccadilly in a frock-coat surmounted by a pot hat. Another member of Russell's club had accidentally taken his tall hat, leaving only the pot hat in place. Russell would have taken a cab had not Lord X. suddenly accosted him and asked him to walk his way for the purpose of discussing the conditions attaching to the grouse moor which Mr. Bantock thought of renting from his lordship. As Mr. Street says, "You see the tragedy."

I have always admired the Spartan boy who said nothing of the fox that gnawed his vitals, but what was he to Russell Bantock? I watched him; his face was calm; every now and then he made an intelligible reply to Lord X. But, of course, when he had an opportunity, he stopped for a moment to explain his distressing costume to his friends. And even that slight mitigation was presently denied him. After the third occasion Lord X., with almost inconceivable brutality, exclaimed: "If you mention that hat again I shall smash it in; I'm sick of it." Russell bit his lip, but took the brutal hint. Not a word of reproach did he say, and he was only twenty-six years old!

A Melancholy Economist.

The Psychology of Socialism. By Gustave Le Bon. (Fisher Unwin. 16s.)

M. GUSTAVE LE BON in this volume bases his whole case against Socialism on the assumption that Socialism is a religion, differing from most religions in that immediate material gain takes the place of the hope of immortality. But as he believes that it is vain to try to suppress a religion, we are at a loss to understand why he has written a book of over 400 pages to prove the contrary. Perhaps the explanation is that he cannot reconcile what is logically, on his hypothesis, inevitable with the meliorism which his study of politics has forced upon him.

This self-stultification continually appears. For example, permitting himself to hope that regeneration might come to the Latin bureaucratic nations by way of education, he forgets for a moment his fatalism; but, suddenly recovering, he adds characteristically that a reform of education "would imply this veritable miracle—the transformation of the national mind." Again, after beseeching his readers to do their utmost to keep Socialism from being tried in their country, he smiles at his own counsels, knowing that they "are perhaps as vain as the vows made to an invalid whose days have been numbered by fate." The interest of the volume is in the revelation it gives us of M. Gustave Le Bon's philosophic bias.

The truth is, that Socialism is much less a faith to-day than it was at the time of the French Revolution, and consequently it is much more reasonable in its demands. M. Gustave Le Bon does not think that there is any considerable Socialistic faction in England. He forgets, probably, that the democracy here uses its "dangerous" men and puts them into positions of trust—a more excellent way than thrusting them into prison or suppressing free speech. We must not forget to mention that M. Gustave Le Bon does not find that Democracy tends towards Socialism: on the contrary, he believes that the liberty and free competition which are the characteristics of the Democracies of England and America make for individualism. This is very loose thinking; collectivism and individualism must necessarily in complex Democracies run side by side. It is difficult to realise that at any stage of the political evolution either individualism or collectivism could be perfectly eliminated. So long as human nature has a social as well as an individual element so long will it surround itself with institutions which shall express this duality. A better title for the book would have been "Economic Facts and Fancies"; the Socialism here treated is decidedly obsolescent, and the Psychology—the little there is of it—is superficial.

M. Gustave Le Bon in his last two books, The Crowd and The Psychology of Peoples, showed his mastery in what might be called "drag-net" psychology. He has a fine intelligence for seizing and contrasting racial characteristics; for analysing the emotions and elementary concepts of a crowd; but he lacks the dexterity and microscopic sight which is able to distinguish slight variations between group and group. "When people are gathered together to consider a question of politics, religions, or morals, they are the dead, not the living, who discuss. They are the souls of their ancestors that speak from their mouths, and their words are the echoes of the eternal voices of the dead, to which the living are always obedient." It is in such writing as this that M. Gustave Le Bon is at his best.

THE GREAT GAME.

BY EDWARD SPENCER.

Edward Spencer is the name on the cover, but the title-page lets us into the secret that this is but a mere private appellation, the name by which the author is known to the postman and Kelly's Directory. Publicly Mr. Spencer is Nathaniel Gubbins, of the Sporting Life or Pink 'Un, and in that capacity numbers readers and admirers who are as the sands on the seashore for multitude. The Great Game seems to represent the first skimming of the milk-pan of Mr. Spencer's recollections of the turf during the past thirty years, for it cannot by any means exhaust his memories or impressions. Not a dull page, not a dull paragraph, is there in this cheery, slangful work. The whole turf is mirrored here: its good humour, its cynicism, its philosophy, its easy morality, its enthusiasms, its jokes. Here is a glimpse of Leviathan Davies, one of the old bookmakers who had the grand manner:

It is safe to prophesy that we shall never again see the like of Davies in a betting-ring. Possessed of an unusual stock of energy and unusual powers as a ready reckoner, a stranger to fatigue and fear, he was absolutely unique as a layer of odds. Amongst the earliest recollections of the writer's is a day on Newmarket Heath in the fifties. And as I write I can see the stiff, portly figure of the then Marquis of Exeter, as, mounted on a bald-faced cob, he entered the outer circle of what was then the betting-ring. At that period there was hardly a suspicion of the tumult which now prevails on the reserved lawn; and fielders, for the most part, instead of bellowing their wants, used to wait till a customer approached them.

"Is Mr. Davies here?" inquired the Marquis, in most courteous tones; and very soon the Leviathan was facing him on the other side of the railings.

"What can I do for you, m'lord?"

"What odds do you offer against my horse?" inquired the noble owner of—, I forget the animal's name, but it was one of the family of "Knights" who used to carry the Stockwell colours.

"D'you want it to money, m'lord?"

"Certainly," said the marquis.

"I'll bet you £10,000 to £3,000, m'lord."

"Write it down, then," said the white-chokered noble, who turned his cob's head and cantered off.

Mr. Spencer's chapter entitled "Under the Seat" should be valuable to students of current slang. Altogether an amusing and entertaining book. (Richards. 5s.)

EVOLUTION.

BY FRANK B. JEVONS.

Whatever he writes upon, whether it be primitive religion, Greek archaeology and literature, or metaphysics, Dr. Jevons never fails of being at least interesting. His present volume, which appears in "The Churchman's Library," and may be said to belong to the metaphysic of apologetics, is no less thoughtful and no less ingenious than its predecessors. That it is logically sound we cannot bring ourselves to think; and the margins of our copy are peppered with signs of interrogation and dissent. It is Dr. Jevons's desire to show that the processes of evolution in the physical world are not, as Huxley urged, indifferent to man's ideals of the good, or, as he puts it theologically, that "the process of evolution is a revelation of Divine love." He attempts to prove this by an analysis of religious faith, which he regards as having precisely the same amount of logical justification as the "faith" which he asserts that men of science place in the "Uniformity of Nature," and which is presupposed in the scientific theory of evolution itself. This seems to us very hazardous reasoning. The faith in Uniformity, so far as it is an intellectual necessity at all, is only justified so long as the fact of Uniformity remains uncontradicted. A single well-authenticated miracle would destroy it at once. Faith in the omnipotence of good is, on the other hand, contradicted daily by the existence of evil. We do not, of course, speak in either case of subjective faith, but only of its logical or pseudo-logical basis. We do not find Dr. Jevons convincing, but his book deserves the careful consideration of all who are interested in such metaphysical problems. (Methuen. 3s. 6d.)

A HISTORICAL COMMENTARY

ON ST. PAUL'S

EPISTLE TO THE GALATIANS. BY W. M. RAMSAY, D.C.L.

Prof. Ramsay, who has the rare merit of combining with his profound scholarship a certain grace of style and the fire of real enthusiasm, is concerned mainly with the question who those Galatians were to whom St. Paul addressed his letter. Commentators have been as unanimous as it is in the nature of commentators to be in holding that St. Paul's converts dwelt in the cities of Northern Galatia. The Aberdeen professor, whose knowledge of historical Asia Minor is unrivalled, exhaustively examines the evidences bearing, however remotely, upon the status and conditions of Northern Galatia with reference to the phrasing of the Epistle. And he clinches his argument in favour of the South Galatian communities by two or three striking considerations. What was the effect of the letter? On the North Galatian hypothesis, nothing: for the silence of the author of the Acts can be explained only by the supposition that these churches were lost to Paulinistic Christianity and that in kindness the painful episode was passed over lightly by the historian. This Dr. Ramsay refuses to believe of "this unique and marvellous letter, which embraces in its six short chapters such a variety of vehement and intense emotions as could probably not be paralleled in any other work." To suppose it unsuccessful were "to despair of Paul."

The letter, with its commanding and almost autocratic tone—though I feel and confess that these adjectives are too strong and ignore the emotion, and sympathy, and love which breathe through the words and take much of the sting from them—is one that could be justified only by success. If it failed, then it deserved to fail. No man has any right to use such a tone to other men unless it is the suitable and best tone for their good; and the issue is the only test whether it was suitable and best.

It will be seen that Dr. Ramsay has the precious power of imagination. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

TENNYSON AS A

RELIGIOUS TEACHER. BY C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.A.

Mr. Masterman's elaborate contribution to the "copious literature" that has gathered round Tennyson is perhaps hardly justified by the importance, in itself and for itself, of the poet's religious thinking. He lived, indeed, in a current of ideas, and always regarded himself as a thinker. But ideas were of importance to him mainly as they affected his imagination, and he was capable of holding contradictories in solution without any very great mental distress. He was carried along with, rather than led, the stream of contemporary thought. Mr. Masterman's liberal quotations make it clear, moreover, that the poems in which Tennyson was most occupied with ideas are by no means those in which he reached his highest pitch of literary excellence. The book, however, is a serious and a thoughtful, and a well-reasoned book. Mr. Masterman comprehends the scheme of Tennyson's religion and personal and social ethics probably more lucidly and justly than he ever comprehended them himself: and the study, just because Tennyson was so little removed from the plane of thought of ordinary men, becomes of interest as an account of tendencies and compromises of thought common to many more or less speculative minds of the last generation. They are not the tendencies or the compromises prevalent just now, because we are of another generation. But they helped to make us, and have at least an historic interest. (Methuen.)

BOOKS OF TRAVEL.

In giving to the world a number of letters, and a mass of Notes on Sport and Travel (Macmillan), written by her father, George H. Kingsley, Miss Mary Kingsley sketches in her pleasant, hearty way the characteristics of the three Kingsley brothers, Charles, Henry, and George. They were all remarkable men; but Miss Kingsley claims that her father was "certainly the happiest of the three brothers." He was a born wanderer, and it was his delight as a medical student to be done with the term's work at the hospital, shoulder a knapsack, and be off for a long, solitary ramble through Germany, Switzerland, or Austria, the Rhineland or the Thüringen Wald, and the remote Carpathians. He had wide, quick sympathies, and asked nothing of life but variety and freedom. His power of adapting himself to all surroundings and companies was intuitive and remarkable. "He could listen with rapt attention to the poems of a German school-master, comparing them to every effort of the Teutonic lyre, from Anne Mariechen up to Bekrantz mit Laub. He could talk about guns with the foresters; he could crack jokes with Herr Wirth and flirt with his rosy-cheeked daughters; and doubtless, even in those immature days, he put into practice his favourite precept for travellers, and also for men who stay at home: 'Always make love to the old ladies.'" In later years George Kingsley's wanderings took a world-wide range; he was much in the South Seas, much in the Canadian forests; he cruised on a British warship, and indulged in "sub-glacial angling" far north, Labrador way. This record completes a trilogy of fame, and for its own sake was well worth giving to the world, for it is the portrait of a true Englishman.—The Caroline Islands: Travel in the Sea of the Little Lands (Methuen). Mr. F. W. Christian gives us a learned and voluminous description of the islands forming the great Caroline group. His book is a serious ethnological and scientific account of islands which have hitherto been familiarised to us in the books of Stevenson and Louis Becke, from both of whom he received valuable advice. But Mr. Christian's master in South Sea exploration is the German traveller and naturalist J. S. Kubary, who, although little known to fame, spent many years in unobtrusive painstaking work among the islands of the Pacific. Mr. Christian's special theme is the lonely island of Ponape, with a mysterious ruined city on its east coast—a South Sea Pompeii—which he will not believe was the work of pirates or early Spanish voyagers, but to which he ascribes an interesting and complex native origin—supporting his views by ethnological and philological arguments, which can probably be rightly weighed only by a few German students. Mr. Christian's book is a mass of rare information, of patiently accumulated detail in archæology, folk-lore, natural history, and geography. But the glamour of the islands is not lost on him: "Like Stevenson in Apemama 'I heard the pulse of the besieging sea,' sound sweet to the ears of those who dwell in the little sea-girt lands."—To all who are contemplating a tour in the lovely and richly interesting valley of the Rhone, we can commend Mr. Charles W. Wood's In the Valley of the Rhone (Macmillan). Mr. Wood's book is written on the old-fashioned lines, is full of talks with guides and peasants, little historical digressions, and miscellaneous chit-chat. It is also admirably illustrated. At Chillon, Arles, Le Puy, Avignon, Vaucluse, we have the same inexhaustible flow of pleasant travel talk and lively retrospect.—A Narrative of Crimes in the Mediterranean (Oliver & Boyd) is a journal kept by William Black, a naval surgeon, during the Greek War of Independence (1822-1826). Mr. Black was surgeon on H.M.S. Chanticleer, and his journal is now issued by his nephew. The book consists of good travel descriptions, illustrated from the author's sketches, and criticism on the fighting between the Greek and Turkish fleets. It is admirably produced by the publishers.

Fiction.

The Rhymers. By Allan M'Aulay. (Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

THIS is a bold attempt for a beginner, as we suppose Mr. M'Aulay to be. It is nothing less than to construct a novel of which the secondary plot turns on the love-affair of Robert Burns and Clarinda—otherwise Mrs. Maclehose. The book has decided promise. The characters, if none of them very original or subtle, are drawn with decision and clearness; they live and have their being. Herries, the hero, is a very irritating prig, and the author did not mean him to be; but he lives: Mrs. Maclehose lives, pretty, sentimental, good-natured, vivacious, and slipshod of principle; Burns himself lives, if not as he lived some hundred years ago. The story is conventional, but it is well and freshly told: it is studiously simple, and moves in a simple atmosphere; there are but four chief characters in all. It is something to have treated such a theme, and made it nor dry, nor pretentious, nor unreal. Mr. M'Aulay, one may well expect, will do better work than The Rhymers.

For it has many shortcomings, besides those which we have already implicated. Some of the traps which are set for the historical novelist the author has avoided. He has skilfully indicated the local colour of the place and period by unobtrusive side-touches, eschewing the pedantry of formal description; we realise the old Edinburgh, its old fashions and pleasantly ancient ways, without being called upon to stand aside from the story and observe. But the language has been a stumbling-block; his speech bewrayeth him. Mrs. Maclehose, for instance—for chief instance—talks now very pretty eighteenth-century talk, perfumed with "la's!" and the like, as with old lavender; and presently she is gossiping unashamed modern Scots—nay, falls sometimes upon jarringly present-day phrases. "Nature has been kind to me in some respects, but one essential she has denied me utterly; it is that instantaneous perception of the fit and unfit, which is so useful in the conduct of life." Why, this is some critical article in a Victorian weekly; it is certainly not Clarinda. Even the Scots, to a Southron judgment, seems to show a similar tendency to ebb and flow into plain English. Better had Mr. M'Aulay altogether abandoned the effort to tincture his dialogue with archaisms, and contented himself with keeping a distance from obtrusive modernity.

Nancy Maclehose herself has been very plausibly conceived and sketched from the indications of her correspondence with Burns. But the great feat which obviously insists on our judgment is the prominent introduction of the ploughman-poet as a realised personality. Here the author has failed—but failed mildly. As mirrored in the attitude of others, Burns is too modern. "The world's poet, the singer for all time and for all hearts!" Nancy calls him. Not only the attitude, but the very phrases are modern. Fashionable Edinburgh flattered and raved about Burns as a peasant-prodigy, a poet of new and striking genius. But that he was a singer for all time even his female devotees had scarce formally conceived; and if the idea of his becoming a "world-poet" had ever entered their heads—as there is little likelihood and no evidence that it ever did—they would have lacked the epithet to utter it. For that matter, few but Scotsmen would now give him the title. "Ye may glower," says the working-man in the Edinburgh street, "and your eyes be fu' o' pride—for that is Robert Burns!" And the working-man is again an anachronism, for the universal, boastful peasant proprietorship in Burns is modern, a plant of slower growth than Mr. M'Aulay would have us imagine.

In Burns himself the author has essayed a task nigh impossible: to depict the union in one man of the satyr and the angel, the sensualist and the genius. The result, as it was bound to be, is lop-sided. To depict the satyr was easy, to suggest the genius difficult. For the genius can only be suggested, not delineated. Genius is too elusive an attribute for that. As a consequence, we get the satyr very vividly, but a very faint image of the genius. The latter fails to impress himself. The touches employed for the purpose are too obvious, too conventional. Burns in these pages is a robust and virile young farmer with strong and unrestrained passions and a taste for ballad music. Worse still, the artifice to which he is made to lend himself for revenge upon Herries, and from which issues the calamity of the somewhat conventional heroine, is of inexcusable dastardliness. We get no sufficient palliation from the circumstance that he was drunk, and worked upon by his boon comrade Nichol. The thing remains unpardonable, unthinkable. It is a fault in art. But if Mr. M'Aulay has not succeeded, he might easily have done worse. For Burns, at any rate, is a personality, and (that one touch apart) a conceivable personality. Mr. M'Aulay, we repeat, has shown considerable gift, and it is likely he may show more.

Two Summers. By Mrs. J. Glenly Wilson. (Harper.)

Of the two summers, one passes in an unnamed island of the South Pacific, the other in an English country house. The story is of the simplest. Tells how Edward Lindsay, a middle-aged barrister, finds in Julia a girl to whom years before he had rendered a service—a loan of money to release her from an embarrassment not wholly unconnected with the attentions of a foreign nobleman. Tells of Julia's secret betrothal to Theo Ashby, the undistinguished author of Friends of Aunt Maria's. Tells of Lindsay's escape from treacherous breakers. Tells of a lady who "spoke in a low, sweet, throaty voice, in short sentences—matters of fact and direct questions—which she handed to her guest at intervals, as if she were cutting pieces of bread from a very plain loaf"; of a curate who played "incuratical" music. Drops incidentally into criticism, thus:

"Yes, I think George Eliot is very pretty, but I don't think her characters are very nice always. I do like really fine characters in a book. Now, with Miss Brown-Smith's people one has so much to admire; they are so true and noble. . . ."

This is Mrs. Wilson at her best:

Every peak and buttress and precipice was wrapped in a lovely garment, shading from deepest purple to fading lilac, like the iridescent plumage of a pigeon's breast. The foothills were darker in their impenetrable sheath of forest; but the plunging cliffs and the great shoulders of the middle range floated and trembled and almost breathed in living intensity of colour. Quick as the light ran over the ridges the hurrying shadow followed it. Moving isles of veiled sunshine, shafts of golden air, were building and casting down and building up again their beautiful house of dreams, all through the amber peace of the quiet autumn afternoon.

At her worst, facetious and ungrammatical, she shall not be quoted at all. The story is so slight that it has seemed not worth while to repeat it here; but it is told with a kind of tea-table smartness that gently detains the attention.

A MOUNTAIN EUROPA.

By JOHN FOX, JUN.

This little story (it is a short novel with wide margins), by the author of The Kentuckians, secures the reader's confidence at once. Capital is the opening description of the meeting between the polished Clayton and the heroine, riding on a bull in the Jellico Valley in the Far West. The bull shied at Clayton, and, some meal being spilt, the girl was angry. But afterwards she reflected on this, to her, new type of man: "He was mighty accommodatin'." "But whut," she asked herself as she rode slowly homeward—"whut did he take off his hat fer?" (Harper & Bros.)

OUTSIDERS, AN OUTLINE.

By R. W. CHAMBERS.

The struggles of two young men in New York, by the author of Ashes of Empire. One of them hawks a book round. It is refused by Messrs. Klaw Bros. "Our Mr. Gouge" explains why: "Yeth, thir, becauth you are unknown. . . . There are other publishers in town. . . . There are Harperth, Stokeths, Scribnerth, Appletonth, Holth, Macmillanth, Putnamth— all of them thome-timeths take bookth from unknown authors. . . . Then there are cheap publisherth. . . ." A GAY CONSPIRACY.

By R. W. CHAMBERS.

Mr. Chambers is prodigal of novels this week. Here we have a romance of the court of Luxembourg—spies, diplomatists, lovers, grand duchesses and Excellencies. Are not such dramatis personae being done to death? But this story promises well, and is well illustrated. (Harper & Bros. 6s.)

LITTLE LADY MARY

AND HER BEST FRIEND.

By HORACE G. HUTCHINSON.

Lady Mary is a social pet who can do anything she likes—kiss her hand to a man in White's Club as she drives past in her mail phaeton, and become the wife of a Prime Minister. A story of social life—gay and touching and entirely readable. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

STEVE, THE OUTLANDER.

By ARTHUR LAYCOCK.

"A Romance of South Africa." But first it is a romance of a Lancashire village and factory life. After that the veldt, and Eland's Laagte. "The surgeon gave the bride away." (Digby, Long. 6s.)

WITH THE GRAND ARMY TO MOSCOW.

By THOMAS HENRY TEEOAN.

An historical novel closely following Napoleon's march to Moscow and his disastrous retreat. Illustrated. (Simpkin, Marshall. 6s.)

THE TREASURE TEMPLE.

By BRUCE HACKING.

We find nothing credible in this eighteenth century story of Jacob of Bristol and Felix Hannington, who hate each other like poison, draw up Shylockian bonds, and call each other "Jew" and "Christian" in ordinary conversation. There are adventures of the hidden-treasure-silent-valley-Brahman-temple order. (Digby, Long. 6s.)

A FIGHTER IN KHAKI.

By RALPH ROOD.

"A Romance of the Present Boer War," but the war comes in late when Lance Tyndal has enjoyed and lost a fortune. The story ends with the relief of Ladysmith. (John Long.)

OUR REMARKABLE FLEDGER.

By HARVEY BUXTON.

Frederick Horatio Fledger is a schoolmaster whose "menticultural activities were of a prosilient and desultory nature." We spend much time in the schoolroom, and the author, infected perhaps by its atmosphere, flings about words like "consociated," "colligate," "trans-animated," "droiled," "scholical," and "disploded." (Digby, Long. 6s.)

ADMIRAL KENNEDY'S REMINISCENCES.

HURRAH FOR THE LIFE OF A SAILOR!

FIFTY YEARS IN THE ROYAL NAVY. By Vice-Admiral Sir WILLIAM KENNEDY, K.C.B., Author of "Sport, Travel, and Adventure in Newfoundland and the West Indies." With numerous Illustrations from Sketches by the Author. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d.

"Sir William Kennedy's book is a pearl of price. Bright with humour, gay wisdom is found on every page. It is beyond the power of any reviewer to condense such a book. It must be read to be enjoyed.... Altogether this is a most delightful book."—Daily Chronicle.

"Among the most interesting and amusing books of its kind... Written with an unsophisticated freshness and a sense of humour which keeps us either in laughter or on the tip-toe of expectation.... We only wish that everyone who undertakes to write his reminis-cences had half the literary faculty of Admiral Kennedy, half the sense of humour, and half the same power of combining perspicuity with brevity in his descriptions and anecdotes."—Standard.

SYDNEY GRIER'S NEW NOVEL.

THE KINGS OF THE EAST. A Romance of the NEAR FUTURE. By SYDNEY C. GRIER, Author of "Like Another Helen," "An Uncrowned King," "His Excellency's English Governess,"

"In Furthest Ind," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The intelligent reader will quickly perceive the possibilities of this plot in the hands of an expert like Mr. Grier. The story keeps up its interest all through."—Spectator.

"The Kings of the East" should win the somewhat rare distinction of interesting the public by careful work. It is dramatic in the best sense."—Saturday Review.

"It is impossible to give an idea of all that this book contains—of the adventures, of the different love stories, the high hopes, and deep disappointments which are related without padding of any sort."—Sunday Times.

ANDREW LANG'S HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

A HISTORY OF SCOTLAND FROM THE ROMAN

OCCUPATION. By ANDREW LANG. Vol. I. With Photogravure
Frontispiece and 4 Maps. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

"Mr. Lang is justified in undertaking the ambitious task which he has set himself. He possesses undoubted mastery of the best qualifications for it—amazing industry and power of hard work, originality and independence of judgment, a critical temper with a saving sense of humour, insight into character, and a bright and facile pen.... He is always suggestive an stimulating.... He is by no means a mere narrator, for he has a gift of seizing and presenting with lucidity certain leading ideas which light up the whole history."—Athenaeum.

"He has proved master of his task; all doubt about that must be dispelled by his first volume.... He excels in reviving the seeming and sentiment of the middle ages. We do not remember to have read a synthetic sketch of social conditions of any given period at once so faithful and so vivid as that of twelfth-century Scotland.... We have no hesitation in pronouncing the latest history of Scotland to be the most readable, and, taking account of the use that has been made of recent specialist research, the most complete."—Literature.

THIS DAY IS PUBLISHED.

ABERDEEN AND BANFF. Being a New Volume

of the "COUNTY HISTORIES OF SCOTLAND." By WILLIAM WATT, Editor of Aberdeen "Daily Free Press." With Maps. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"It is a model of what such a book should be, it is always to the point, selection and compression are observed with mastery skill, and practically the history of Aberdeen is almost a study of what is essential in the making of Scotland."—Daily News.

"The British Weekly" Edition

Bohn's Libraries

Over Six Million Volumes of Bohn's Libraries have been sold since Mr. Bohn first introduced his series of English Classics to the English public. In all probability you have some of the volumes already on your book-shelves. You know their value. They are what Ruskin called "The books of all Time," the real classics, the books worth buying. They are books of enduring worth, an inexhaustible treasure for the mind, books whose value you cannot fully appreciate until you have read and re-read them, "loved them and loved them again."

The Best Books of all time and how you may obtain them.

In Bohn's Libraries you have a collection of some 800 volumes of the very best of the world's literature. Bohn's Libraries contain only first-class editions of really standard works. They are honestly complete; they are edited by the first authorities; they are carefully printed on good paper, and are bound in a new, strong, and serviceable binding.

You have only to glance at the complete list of "The British Weekly" Edition of Bohn's Libraries to see how wide, indeed, how universal, is its scope. The great feature of the special offer is that the purchaser may choose for himself his list of one hundred or of fifty volumes from the complete catalogue of nearly 800 works. You will readily appreciate the advantages of such an offer. You need not purchase one single volume for which you have no use, of which you are not in need. With every fifty or one hundred volumes of "The British Weekly" Edition of Bohn's Libraries there is presented free a copy of Webster's great International Dictionary, a dictionary which surpasses all others in accuracy and utility. Or if you already possess the Dictionary you may choose in its stead any ten volumes from the complete list of "The British Weekly" Edition of Bohn's Libraries.

The Terms of the Special Offer of 100 or 50 Volumes of BOHN'S LIBRARIES:—

100 Volumes, chosen by the purchaser from a List of nearly 800 of the World's Standard Books, together with a copy of Webster's magnificent International Dictionary (Price £2 2s.), or 110 Volumes of Bohn's Libraries without the Dictionary ... .. £12

50 Volumes, chosen by the purchaser from a List of nearly 800 of the World's Standard Books, together with a copy of Webster's magnificent International Dictionary (Price £2 2s.), or 60 Volumes of Bohn's Libraries without the Dictionary ... .. £7

"The British Weekly" Edition of Bohn's Libraries may be purchased on The Times Instalment Plan, all the volumes being delivered on receipt of First Payment of 21s.

FULL PARTICULARS, WITH A LIST OF VOLUMES FROM WHICH TO SELECT, WILL BE SENT POST FREE IF YOU MENTION THAT YOU READ THIS NOTICE IN "THE ACADEMY."

Competition Supplement.

SATURDAY: APRIL 28, 1900.

Our Special Competitions.

The Results.

WE offered six prizes of five guineas each to the successful competitors in the following literary exercises:—

FIVE GUINEAS for the best original short poem. Not to exceed twenty-four lines.

FIVE GUINEAS for the best original short story. Not fewer than 1,500 words, and not more than 2,000 words.

FIVE GUINEAS for the best original essay on a non-literary, light, every-day subject. Not to exceed 2,000 words in length.

FIVE GUINEAS for the best original "Things Seen," in the manner of those published in the ACADEMY during the past year. Not to exceed 350 words.

FIVE GUINEAS for the best original paper on a British or foreign city, town, or village. It should take the form of a personal, impressionistic description, and must not exceed 2,000 words in length.

FIVE GUINEAS for the best original set of epigrammatic criticisms of six British or American living novelists. No single criticism must exceed 100 words in length.

The Awards.

POETRY COMPETITION.

"The Mocking Dawn," by Miss A. de Alberti ("A. D. A."), 43, Cotleigh-road, West Hampstead.

SHORT STORY COMPETITION.

"He, She, and It," by Miss Emily Hughes ("Ser Hughie"), 96, The Grove, Ealing.

ESSAY COMPETITION.

"On Wood Fires," by Miss H. M. Russ ("Brynach"), Braunton, North Devon.

THINGS SEEN COMPETITION.

"A Case of Conscience," by Miss Lorimer ("Dinna Forget"), 1, Bruntsfield-crescent, Edinburgh.

TOPOGRAPHICAL ESSAY COMPETITION.

"Rye of the Marshes," by Mrs. Stepney Rawson ("Joan Symple"), 21, Greycoat-gardens, Victoria-street, W.

EPIGRAMMATIC CRITICISM COMPETITION.

Six Epigrammatic Criticisms by Mr. Ernest A. Baker ("Sterne"), Midland Railway Institute, Derby.

To each of the above a cheque for Five Guineas has been sent.

Poetry Competition.

THIS competition has disappointed our expectations in all but numbers. Judging from the quality of the verse occasionally sent us in response to competitions of more specialised kind, or that which has in other ways come before us for judgment, we had a right to hope that a chance so unfettered in all but length would evoke a certain amount of poems of more than average quality. But such has not proved to be the case. Three hundred and fourteen poems were sent in to us for judgment. Of these a surprisingly large number were put out of court from the beginning by the perverse neglect of our plainly printed statement that no poem must exceed twenty-four lines. The contributors acknowledged no limit but their own sweet will. A very few neglected our instruction that the poems should be typewritten. None of these, however, we may add for their comfort, was disqualified on that ground alone. With regard to the rest, the level of achievement was unencouragingly low. It was remarkable what a proportion of competitors had not even attained a good technique of verse. Few reached the level of fair magazine poetry. There was, as might be expected, a considerable sprinkling of poems inspired by the present war, and it must frankly be said that these were the worst of all.

"The Mocking Dawn," by Miss A. de Alberti, to which we have awarded the prize, has some strong imagery in the last two stanzas. "The Crocus," by Miss Alice Archer Sewall, of Ohio, U.S.A., shows considerable fancy and a choice diction (though "leave" for "put forth leaf" is vile), but she too obviously exhibits her study of Coventry Patmore, while the final image of "The Crocus" is borrowed from Mr. Aubrey de Vere's "Ode to the Daffodil." Mr. Dolf Wyllarde's "Diana," though not markedly original, deserves commendation for a certain elegance and delicacy; and Miss Herbertson's "Our Lady of Sleep," on account of its technique and completeness.

The Mocking Dawn.

BY MISS A. DE ALBERTI.

Through the sweet watches of the mellow night,
By kindly Nature decked for love's delight,
While earth lay sleeping drugged by summer's breath,
And lovely hours sank slowly to their death,
I kept my lonely vigil, all in vain,
Till Nature's smile seemed changed to chill disdain.

Then, as the bride whose bridegroom tarries long
Shrinks from the biting jest and vulgar throng,
I shuddered that the day should see the shame
That stung my ashen cheeks to crimson flame;
While stealthy dawn crept up, and loud and free
The jeering cocks shrilled their malicious glee.

With smiling insolence, the dainty morn
Stared at my haggard face in silent scorn;
I heard the whispered mockery of the trees
Nudging each other in the morning breeze,
With gusty laughter shaking all their leaves,
And cynic sparrows tittering in the eaves.

Then like a red-faced jester rose the sun
Reeling above the clouds, and one by one
Sent wide his shafts, as if in drunken mirth,
Pointing derision, till the waking earth
Grew one broad smile that mocked me standing there,
Making a spectacle of my despair.

Short Story Competition.

THE short story is a tempting form of art. It looks easy; a few days, or even a few hours, may complete the attempt. We were not surprised, therefore, to receive a good deal of immature work, much of it quite destitute of promise: what disappointed us was that we found so very small a number of stories that, on the first reading, could be set aside as possible candidates for the prize.

It is not easy to account for the gloom which pervades the one hundred and twenty-eight efforts. Gloom, that is, pertaining to the essence of the subject-matter; for sorrows and horrors are treated so largely as matters of course that we do not find ourselves regarding them as evils so much as proper material for literary experiment.

Not but that in the heap we found some light and humorous stories—a few. Of them, however, it shall suffice to say that alike in subject and treatment they are conventional. The war has furnished forth two or three writors, but the subject seems hardly to be ripe for imaginative treatment. And the pretornatural is not altogether neglected. A death-wraith and a thought-vampire are treated with the seriousness proper to an age of scepticism.

On the whole, that which we find lacking is vision. Not more than half-a-dozen of these tales leave on the mind a mark of a day's endurance. Many show signs of diligent attention to the sense of words and to their sound; few carry conviction either of sincere observation or of vital selection. The writer of the short story that is to be something more than the hashed-up reminiscences of other men's creations must look for himself, must listen, mark, remember for himself, and for himself must search out the secret things of the heart.

We should have awarded the prize for the Best Story to Mr. Andrew Deir for "A Heart of Hemp" if it had conformed to our conditions in the matter of length. But it considerably exceeds the maximum of 2,000 words for which we stipulated. Mr. A. Myron's "Murgot" stood next in our favour, but it also exceeded the 2,000 words. We have therefore decided to give the prize to Miss Emily Hughes for her story, "He, She, and It." We should have preferred to reward a study of real life. This, however, has not seemed possible.

He, She, and It.

By MISS EMILY HUGHES.

HE started from the west, She from the east, and the question was whether they would ever meet. They did not expect to meet, for neither knew of the other's starting. Neither even knew of the other's existence, for that matter. Yet it was very desirable that they should meet.

I shall say nothing about the two journeys, eventful as they were, until that crucial day when they had both reached the same wood, and when the momentous question of their meeting would be decided according to the roads they both chose.

That day was one of the loveliest which even the wood had ever seen. In it every springing thing wore such a festive face that She almost forgot her Song which She could not finish, and His frown relaxed over the Problem He could not solve. The birds were so hilarious that you had to laugh, the bees so fussy over their business that it made you hot; on the green moss the little white flowers looked for all the world like pearly smiles, while the dance of the leaves with shadows for partners was nothing less than ecstatic.

She, on Her side of the wood, noting all this, said: "I feel like the sea when it ripples in sunshine!"

And He, noting it on His side of the wood, said: "I think the sun is in the Crab to-day; it is the first of summer."

Then simultaneously She remembered Her Song and He His Problem. And they said together, at separate ends of the wood:

"But surely I shall finish it to-day!"

"But to-day I'm certain to solve it!"

So they sat down to rest, to listen, and to look.

Before them each were two roads—one, of course, north of the other. But the northernmost road before Her met the southernmost before Him. If He turned north He would never meet Her, for that way led out of the wood toward a fathomless lake. And if She took the south road She would miss Him, for it led into a pitiless desert. All three roads were a day's journey long.

As She sat on the moss in Her blue gown, not wondering at all yet about the way, an old man came upon Her from behind, he also about to enter the wood.

"Which is the way to go?" he said.

"To go? Oh, where do you want to go? Not that I know the way either!" She laughed under the leaf-shadows.

"There are two roads," he said, pointing with a stick that made Her shudder. It was spotted and knotted like a stiffened snake.

"Yes, I see," She said, "but both go through the wood——"

"No, they don't!"

"——Both are beautiful——"

"No, they're not!"

"——And as many butterflies are going along the one as the other—with bees and birds," She persisted, looking the path up and down from the tree-tops to the pink soil.

He shook his stick along the south road.

"Go that way," he said, "if you want to meet no other passengers. Butterflies, bees, and birds, forsooth!"

There were no less than a hundred inflections of scorn in his voice as, flourishing his ugly stick, he passed on along the north road.

She looked along the south road. And, though it seemed to her that every bee had suddenly begun to attend a funeral, every butterfly to have fallen faint by the way, and every bird to have sent every other to Coventry, She said to Herself:

"Ah, I will not follow you—better your counsel!"

At about the same time, to Him on the opposite verge of the wood, came a gay young maid, swishing the grass where He lay with her skirts. She almost passed Him—He was dressed, like the forest, in green and brown.

"Oh!" she said, and they stood looking at one another.

But she looked at Him less than at the Book of His Problem held like treasure in His hand, yet most of all at something He wore by a long chain from His belt.

"What is it?" she asked, lifting the chain and separating the two things slung upon it. "A little box of gold and a broad silver key. May—may I open it?"

"You cannot. The key does not fit."

"Oh, what a pity! What is inside?"

"The Secret," he replied gravely.

"An important secret?"

"Very."

"Why, then, I should break it open."

"I shall find the key some day. It is of gold, like the casket."

"Why do you keep the silver one? Do you expect that to change to gold one day?"

He started, seeing mockery in her eyes and on her lips. He firmly withdrew from her the casket and key, putting them out of sight.

"No, hardly," He replied; "it is true I do not know why I keep the silver key. But—I have kept it."

"Give it to me," she said; "please give it to me." She touched His hand with her hands and looked beseechingly.

"But——"

"It is of no use to you." She tried to find it. But He drew back.

"It was born with me," He said; "I cannot give it to a—a-stranger." He turned His back on her and heard her pass sobbing into the wood.

Almost with a flush of pity He followed her—she took the south road—but in hesitation His fingers clutched the Book of His Problem. Then He said:

"No, I will not follow her. She may ask me next for the casket. I shall perhaps lose the Secret to her tears and my Problem will never be solved."

He was about to turn by the north road when the old man—who must have ridden his ugly cudgel as a broom-stick through the wood—met him, emerging. He accosted Him, chuckling, and shook his stick toward the north.

"That is a good road," he said. "Good and solitary; but both are safe—quite safe—quite safe!" and passed on his way crackling.

"Gratuitous advice," said He, looking now along the south road as a child looks upon forbidden things, "teaches resolution to flounder, not to swim. To cross such an old fellow's impertinent counsel and captious footsteps at the same time is a great temptation." Then He began to study His Problem.

By this time She had been accosted in turn by the gay maiden who, having gone through the wood, was quite gay again.

"Dance with me!" she said to Her, catching fingers as they met. And up and down they flitted and whirled, and swayed together in the faint, fluttering lacework of shadow and shine, until both fell panting on the sward, when out from Her bosom sprang a casket and a key hung by a long chain about Her neck. They were in the hands of the gay maid in a moment.

"A silver casket and a tiny golden key," she said; "but the key does not fit."

"Why, no," She answered, "but some day I shall find the key that will."

"But why do you keep this little key of gold?"

"It is so beautiful," She said.

"But no use."

"Well, for one thing—a thing so little as this—it is enough to be beautiful. Do you see how it is shaped like a bird—how the wards are wings? I always think it a bird carrying a Secret like my casket. Not that Secret, but another, and I wear them together."

"Give me the key—or the casket!"

She caught back Her chain with its treasures and sprang away.

"Give!" She cried, "I would rather give you my life; but I don't give away even my life to—to strangers!" She braced Herself against a tree-trunk, caught up Her blue gown, and actually prepared to fight.

The gay damsel stood with arms akimbo, laughing.

"Well done!" she cried; "but the fight would be hotter than the dance. I decline. Only tell me the Secret of your casket."

She drooped Her head and whispered:

"It is the Secret of my Song."

"Ha-ha-ha! Tral-la-la-la!" laughed the gay maid, and skipped back into the forest. Her laugh went on, ripple, ripple through the wood like the very rustle of the leaves, until at last it faded far off among the branches.

She stood listening until the wind and the bees were all She heard. Then She began to sing Her Song, for it was nearing noon. But, as always, She could not finish it. The music snapped, like a brittle twig—ran suddenly dry, like a spring drained by the noonday. She fingered Her silver casket, sighing:

"Oh, for the key!" Then She prepared to take the path that ran southwards.

But suddenly there rang a cry from the depth of the wood—a cry so piteous that She stopped with Her hand on Her heart.

"What is it? Oh, what is it?" She listened. It rang again, making a shivering track along the branches.

"Ah, it is that way," She said, looking along the north road. She caught up her gown and ran swiftly, swiftly, full of pity, that way into the wood's heart.

She had not finished Her Song. Nor had He solved His Problem. He, too, fingered His casket.

"I must find the key," He said, "I am tired of this. Ah, which road to take!"

He weighed many pros and cons with his usual nicety. The scale dipped for the north road. So He turned His face thither. At that very moment the piteous cry came to Him too, but more faintly, for the wind was from the west.

"Some helpless thing in a plight," He muttered, and plunged into the wood by the southern path.

So of course they met—very near the middle of the forest, for She ran as fleetly as He almost.

They met, flushed, breathless, with chains and treasures dangling.

"Oh," He cried, holding out His hand, "you have the golden key!"

"Why," She cried in the same breath, tendering it, "you have the golden casket!"

But He did not take it. He doffed His cap.

"I beg your pardon," He said; "you have the silver casket. We therefore exchange keys." And He loosened His from its chain.

"Of course," She said; "and then we shall know the Secrets—or at least I shall know mine and you yours. How exciting it is! But really now I am to know I am quite afraid of knowing. I dread it. Indeed, I would rather know yours than my own. Oh," She cried with inspiration, "let me discover your Secret for you and you mine for me? It will break the news!"

Her eyes sparkled. She clasped Her hands. He looked dubious, but agreed.

"We therefore exchange caskets, not keys," He said.

They did and walked a little apart, standing with their backs to one another, opening the caskets.

He heard Her laughing—a little gurgle of pleasure.

She heard Him cry, "Hurrah!"

"Well," She called out mischievously, "be quick! Tell me the Secret of my Song."

He turned quickly.

"What! You hav'n't the Secret of my Problem too?"

"Indeed, no, but something much nicer—the Secret of my Song," She cried, flourishing the bird-like key. "How very funny! It was the wrong caskets we carried all the time, not the wrong keys."

Then She sang Her Song and He solved His Problem. Then they looked at each other.

Suddenly they remembered the cry they had followed into the wood.

"What was it?" they asked together. "Hark! There it is again, close by."

She stared up into the branches and laughed.

"It was just a mocking-bird after all!" She said.

Essay Competition.

SIXTY-FOUR essayists contended for this prize. The following is a list of the titles of the papers:

Beauty.	A Leak in the Roof.
The Magnetism of Beauty.	The Angler.
Woman Old and New.	The Amateur Tramp.
Heredity.	"Robert."
Proverbs and Maxims.	A Study in Natural History.
Bullying at School.	The Virtue of Silence.
The Weather.	On Talking.
Points for Parvenus.	Truth for Half-a-Crown.
The Relation between Sex and Tobacco.	Common Sense and the Sense of Humour.
At Homes.	The Visionary Delights of Spring.
The Suburban Young Man.	On Going to Bed.
Questions of Taste.	All Fools' Day.
The Interest of the Common-place.	The Influence of Soap.
Interesting Social Role Played by Pet Dogs.	On Prejudice.
The Philological Invasion.	"P.P.C."
Edgar Allan Poe.	Inertia.
Champéry.	Moustaches.
Unwelcome Knowledge.	Forest Folk.
Railway Travel.	Wanted—a Rustic Revival.
On the Joys of Railway Travelling.	The Scandinavian Domestic.
Straw.	In Praise of Prigs.
A Rigmareole on Stupidity.	On Wood Fires.
A Railway Waiting Room.	On Hats.
Tenderboy, the Scornor.	Lotus Culture.
On Shaking Hands.	On the Deplorable Decay of Egotism.
Going to Town.	An Early Train.
Door Knocks.	Our Hobbies.
Door-Knocking Nuisances.	A Plea for Queen Anne.
The Land of "Might Have Been."	The Mobile Man.
Smoke Fancies.	The Delights of Dreaming.
"Non-Literary Subjects."	Moral Advice.
	Forficula Auricularia.
	The Pig.

The qualities of a good essay? Well, the more of wit and fancy and grace it has the better. It must be refined, and it must be original. It must be spirited, and it must be correct.

Subject matters little in essay writing; treatment is all. Nevertheless certain treatments have been so long wedded to certain subjects that the amateur should be forewarned. We seem to hear back numbers of All the Year Round and Household Words rustle their dusty leaves when we find disquisitions on "Door Knocks," "Shaking Hands," and "Moustaches." These things are solemnly classified in the good old facetious way; we have the "long silky drooping moustache," the "short crisp moustache," the "heavy moustache" and, of course, the "nondescript." Door-knocks are aristocratic, democratic, and official, and so on. Railway travellers, landladies, and other social types have also been classified to death. If the old method is to please it must be cleverly renewed. An essay is nothing if it is not clever. Also, somehow, and somewhere, it must go pretty deep. When it is ended, we must feel that an angel has stirred the pool. It may deal with trifles, but must not wholly spend itself on trifles; it may tickle with a straw, but it must relate the straw to the universe.

We must confess that very few of the essays we have received approach these ideals. A great many exhaust themselves in facetious observation which ends with itself, which opens no window into the world or the heart of man. Real themes and thoughts are not evolved. Or, where they are, the transition from the particular to the general, the material to the moral, is usually too clumsy or abrupt. Some of the best written essays are too serious, and lack the relief of good quotations, apposite stories, &c.

Much of the writing is tortured, and represents what we may call the churning style: "Oh, the placidity, the soft soul-soothment of living in the country—in secluded, breezy Arcady! Phyllis and Corydon in a back-lane cottage, their crooks exchanged through the Bazaar for bicycles, the whilom oaten pipe turned to a briar, while a pig or two in the rear represent the fleecy flocks of ante-nuptial days." Thus begins an essay on "Door-Knocking Nuisances." The author of an essay called "Tenderboy, the Scorned," has been studying Lyly's Euphues unwisely, or the drear punsters of forty years ago—we are not sure which. Anyhow his churn produces a particularly clotted kind of nonsense. Thus: "To judge by the traveller's observant eye—at times, perhaps, too observing to pay due observance to charity of mind—nine-tenths of accepted debtors to the bank of Tenderness keep the tendering of their acceptances until the approval-signing blushes of the cashier are sympathetically witnessed by the veiled light of a fleecedraped Dian."

We need not say that these specimens of style do not represent the average performance in this competition.

Among essays which we can praise are Mr. Edmund Forbes's "Smoke Fancies"; the Rev. T. Constable's "Non-Literary Subjects"; Mr. Lewis Longfield's "The Angler"; Miss Maude Blundell's "Forest Folk"; Miss B. C. Hardy's "In Praise of Prigs"; Miss Emily Hughes's "On Hats."

The essay to which we award the prize, "On Wood Fires," by Miss H. M. Russ, is in the true essay vein, though it does not perform all that an essay may. It is well constructed and embellished.

On Wood Fires.

By Miss H. M. Russ.

Hazlitt sang the praises of the coal fire, and grew eloquent as he summed up the list of fireside joys. He makes his readers thrill with him over such a moment as "gently levering up the coals, and seeing the instant and bustling flame above! . . . That ardent acknowledgment, as it were, of the care and kindness of the operator." But Hazlitt was scarcely an epicure in fires, notwithstanding his affection for the poker. He evidently praised the best he knew, and he conjured up such a vision of comfort and well-being that we almost forget any fire can have greater fascinations than one of "glowing coals." Then comes the recollection of the less fierce but softer warmth of the wood fire, the intimate, caressing sound of the crackling logs, and we are its partisans at once, and certain that, as long as our wood-basket can be kept well filled, our coal-scuttle may remain empty.

A wood fire has one fault, but does not a little flaw in a friend's character endear him to us the more as proving him to be human? It will not suffer neglect, and is inclined to sulk if we do not give it our constant attention. But it is so much less effort to throw a log on the hearth than to take up a heavy scuttle, or to shovel in the depths of the inconvenient box, that we do not complain of the extra services the wood fire demands. Even if it grow sullen under neglect a little coaxing and a careful choice of the best-shaped logs will soon charm away its ill-temper, and make it bright and cheery again.

And it is such a companion—at once soothing and suggestive. A lichen-covered, gnarled log from an old apple tree blown down by an autumn gale fills the mind with spring thoughts. Once it was clad in pink, and outlined against a clear blue sky. Perhaps a chaffinch's nest hid there, exquisitely decorated with lichen to look like the branch itself, and only betrayed by the white underfeathers in the tail of the little sitting bird showing over the edge. Ilex and laurel burn well. Shall we not always, when throwing a branch of laurel on the fire, think of the birth of Virgil as told in the beautiful legend lately given to us? "The Queen of the Fairies cradled him in a cradle made of roses. She made a fire of twigs of laurels; it crackled loudly. To the crackling of twigs of laurel was he born." Fir gives forth an aromatic scent, and brings to the mind a picture of tall, straight trunks, with slanting rays of light and blue distances. Seasoned wood burns more brightly than raw green logs which have lately been hewn, but even these will make a good fire if skilfully managed. A clear, hot foundation must be kept, and the wood piled high above it, fresh fuel being continually thrown on the top to take the place of the vanishing logs beneath. It has a charming effect; the brilliancy below, with tongues of flame reaching up to the dull, damp, fizzling wood above. Pride uplifts the heart of the builder of that fire as he sees what a good result can be obtained from unpromising materials. One rule must be carefully observed, never to turn a log. The temptation is great, to see the sudden flash and the shooting flames, but the glory of it swiftly passes, and the rest of that log's career will be a blackened, charred, and smouldering disgrace.

Again, what glamour about a fire of wreck-wood! The round holes in the beams through which the blue flame comes leaping; the clear, delicate colours, green, orange, and the blue of a southern sea. Sailors' yarns should be told round a wreck-wood fire. If the sailor is absent, and Treasure Island not to hand, imagination will weave some tales on its own account of distant seas and adventure, of the perils and the fascination of a seafaring life.

But a fire is not always conducive to peace and comfort. It may be as delicate a subject of contention as religion. Our own article of belief as to the most effectual way of applying the poker is, in our opinion, necessary to the fire's salvation. Our neighbour's treatment will be only too likely to be the means of casting it into outer darkness. Two ancient ladies living in a quiet village had the last years of their life poisoned by continual quarrels over their fire. In summer time they were the most gentle of women, but winter left them ripe for murder. Even young people are not altogether free from this baleful influence, as may be seen at a picnic when part of the game is the building and lighting of a fire. It begins in play, but it ends in deadly earnest. Each helper is so certain his is the only method, but the furtive poke of an enemy undoes his schemes, and recrimination is the order of the day until the welcome singing of the kettle restores good humour. When boiling water is wanted no longer, and the last stragglers are climbing the steep paths homeward, the fire as likely as not shows what it can do. The flame rises steadily against its background of sandstone cliff; an Arabian Night's effect on the desolate, forsaken shore, with the fading light turning the rocks black against a wan sea.

A fire in the open carries our thoughts to camp-fires and gypsy-encampments; to Mumper's Dingle and that summer evening when Lavengro and Isopel Berners sat by a fire of green ash with the kettle hung above it.

Ash when green
Is fire for a queen,

she told him.

Then Lavengro made the one compliment he ever seems to have achieved.

"And on fairer form of queen, ash fire never shone," said I, "than on thine, O beauteous queen of the dingle."

Poor Isopel! She did not want to be a queen.

"Something less would content me."

But Lavengro had not yet made up his mind to call her wife. He must first exasperate her by making her decline "master" in Armenian. Then came the storm, and the hissing embers warned them that their fire would soon be extinguished. It seemed a prophecy of the dying out of the fire of hope in Isopel's heart.

Was it a green ash fire again which Lavengro kept burning all night that the Dingle should not look dark and dreary if Isopel returned? And the next evening, to reward him for his kind thought, she had the fire and kettle ready for him; that memorable evening when they conjugated the Armenian verb siriel together.

Perhaps we all have our own little personal fads with regard to fires. For myself, I have not often accomplished my ideal: it needs a happy combination of time and circumstances not always available. First, it must be Sunday afternoon, with that peculiar soothing hush inseparable from the country day of rest. Then I must collect the materials for my fire: it is only so I shall reap the full enjoyment of the masterpiece I have in mind. Besides, I love the labour of my trade, which is fire-making; therefore, Stevenson would say, the gods have called me to that work. The house I am thinking of is on the side of a hill with a little wood rising behind and sloping down to a holy well and a winding stream. It is there I must go first for my faggot of green ash. How still it is on this clear winter day! A sudden scurry as I pass tells of some wild creature running to earth, and a clumsy blackbird here and there resents my presence with a scramble to wing and clamorous scolding. A robin sings, perched on the lower branch of a beech-tree, its breast the colour of one of the faded leaves not yet fallen. Blue tits are busy, and call incessantly. The more graceful long-tailed tit is also to be seen, but its bell-like call-note will not be heard just yet. How pleasant it is to scuff along amidst the clattering leaves!

The high year's flaunting crown
Shattered and trampled down.

My faggot is soon ready, but although I have learned a little of my trade from Borrow, he has not taught me the whole. Green ash is the foundation of my fire, but its crowning glory will be the large cones from the fir-trees on the crest of the wood. There it is not so still as in the lower sheltered parts. A fresh breeze from the sea is blowing over the hill, making music among the pine-needles. Gold-crests are busy; their thin, high-pitched call-note, the tinkling cymbal of the birds—giving the charm of bird-melody that is seldom entirely lacking in the woods.

When my basket is filled with the great cones, I wander slowly back, picking up my faggot on the way, and feeling that I have earned by an hour's work a long, luxurious, lazy time. The wood-fire has died down, and on the bright embers I pile the green ash, covering it with fir-cones all set up in right order to show their exquisite form when the flames shall reach them. Then for a comfortable chair, some favourite books, and a time of pure enjoyment! The green ash crackles and hisses; the little flames go creeping in and out until they reach the fir-cones. These burn steadily in one great glow of intense firelight, unfolding until they look like branched trees in a forest on fire. Subtle aromatic scents are wafted from them, and my Sunday afternoon sleep will surely be visited by dreams of the East. My slumbers, however, are shortened by the necessity of throwing on fresh cones from time to time. I have a fancy, too, for a little reading from St. Francis of Assisi, "Christ's poor little one," that ascetic with the tender heart and gentle ways towards all his fellow-creatures, from the rulers of the land to his "little sisters, the birds." And as the afternoon wears on, my supply of sticks and cones dwindles, and is presently exhausted, and my ideal fire becomes a memory only.

Perhaps a wood-fire is never more satisfactory than in its last moments. If the logs have been piled high during the day, the glowing embers which they leave give out an intense and brilliant heat. It is difficult to tear oneself away from such grateful warmth. Raking the embers seems to make them glow the more. We are tempted to linger on and watch the brightness fade. How beautifully the fire dies! Not like Hazlitt's coal fire, sullenly cooling into the hardness of cinders—"the fading embers tinkle with a gaping dreariness"—but vanishing softly into white ash and nothingness.

Things Seen Competition.

ONE hundred and fifty-seven manuscripts were submitted for this competition, of which nearly fifty were selected for a second examination. Many of them showed good observation, and reached a very fair degree of excellence. The war was the most popular topic, several of the efforts describing the departure of "gentlemen in khaki." A large number were tragic, the percentage of gloomy and morbid "Things Seen" being quite as large as the percentage of gloomy manuscripts in the Short Story Competition. "A Case of Conscience," by Miss Lorimer, to which we have awarded the prize, is an uncommon incident told with point. The following are worthy of mention: "The Automatic," by Miss Marie Taylor; "A Lady and Gentleman," by Miss Constance Glasby; "Ending," by Mrs. Curry; "A Certain Priest," by Miss Ethel Ashton; "Juggernaut," by Mrs. E. Underhill; "The County Workhouse," by Mr. B. McEvoy; "The Beggar," by Miss Lois Barraclough.

A Case of Conscience.

By MISS LORIMER.

THE mid-day Russian express had started, and was already speeding through the undulating country which girdles Vienna. The fruit trees were in bloom, the ditches golden with irises, and every streamlet sparkled in the sunshine. In my compartment were two women, each bound on a longer journey than myself. The first, an Austrian of the small shop-keeping class, had with her a boy of three years old and a baby. The other was a young unmarried English lady.

Presently the guard came to examine our tickets. The Englishwoman's and my own were returned without remark, but over the Austrian's there was demur. She was entitled to take one child free, but for the second she must pay. The young mother was obviously distressed—perhaps had not the fourteen florins demanded. The guard looked sympathetic. He was sorry, he said, but the money must be paid unless—and he turned with an insinuating smile to the Englishwoman—"unless when the Ober-Schaffner comes round the Gnädige would say the little boy was hers?" For the moment the Englishwoman was silent; a struggle raged within her. Could she tell a lie, pose as a mother, on a foreign strand and in the presence of foreigners? Besides, the boy, in his choap, ready-made suit and imitation lace collar, was not quite—quite—. But she looked across and caught the mother's imploring glance. "Very good," she said. "When the Ober-Schaffner comes I shall say the little boy is mine."

Ten minutes later appeared an awe-inspiring official in blue and gold uniform, and with waxed moustache. The daughter of Albion did not flinch. She put an arm round the little vulgar boy and drew him maternally towards her. But Providence was kind. The social leap which in her own eyes she had taken was not apparent to the Ober-Schaffner; he took the situation for granted. "How old is the boy?" was his only question; and mustering her best Viennese accent, and without a blush, the Englishwoman answered: "Three years old."

Topographical Essay Competition.

For this competition we received one hundred and nine topographical sketches, of which a very large number are well written and interesting. A geographically-arranged list of the subjects chosen by competitors may have interest.

THE BRITISH ISLES (43 papers).—St. Andrews, Norbury (Derbyshire), Selby, Whitby, A Devonshire Village, Oxford, Cambridge, Bristol, Morningside, St. Ann's, Rye (2 papers), "It is my native place," Richmond, Worcester, Bath (2 papers), Stratford-on-Avon, Ambleside, Aberusk, Scilly Islands, London (3 papers), Lewes, Windermere, Oxford (2 papers), Yarrow, Arrochar, Shrewsbury, Ardvassar, Lamorna, Liverpool (2 papers), Loch Gail Head, Staithes, St. Helens, Shanklin, St. Fillans, Winchelsea, Instow Quay, Whiston.

FRANCE (12 papers).—St. Briac, Douarnenez, Rouen, Ay-waille, La Rochelle, Mont S. Michel, Nîmes, Malines, Paris, Boulogne, Tréguen, Village near Dinan.

NORTH-WEST EUROPE (10 papers).—Bolsward (Holland), Homburg, Bruges, Amsterdam, Heidelberg, Antwerp, Bygland, Rudolstadt-Schwarzburg, Hamelin, Lewenberg.

SWITZERLAND AND ITALY (19 papers).—Zinal, Guipuzcoa, Siena (3 papers), Florence, Gubbio, San Gemignano, Varallo, Zurich, Teregino, Davos Platz, Gorisch, Laon, Assisi, Venice, Capri, Montreux.

THE NEAR AND FAR EAST (14 papers).—Nanuoya (Ceylon), Delhi, Peshawur, Poona, Colombo (2 papers), Rosetta, Damascus, Cairo, Constantinople, A Burmese Jungle Village, Nicosia (Cyprus), Bangkok, Singapore.

AMERICA (6 papers).—San Francisco, Manchester Minor (Canada), Concord, Weston (Canada), Chicago, Boston.

ELSEWHERE (3 papers).—Durban, Old Novgorod, Sydney, Punta Arenas, Nejadvo.

It is obvious that in offering a prize for the best account of a town or village we did not intend to invite bald guide-book descriptions, however full and accurate. Nor has any single competitor submitted such a description. All have striven to write on a higher literary plane. And yet the failure to achieve a good literary plane is the conspicuous feature of these essays on places. In a sense, the essays are too conscientious. The writers have considered how much they could convey in 2,000 words, instead of considering how much the reader could plausibly receive.

There has been too little selection and suffusion; the place, and the impressions created by it, have not been sufficiently related to the rest of life. The writer himself has not been sufficiently the master of his subject; we see him as a diminutive stranger entering a place and beckoning us from our arm-chair to follow him in all his detailed trudgings, errors, and inventories. Whereas we want to remain in our arm-chair and be charmed.

The definiteness that wearies—as distinct from the definiteness that charms—is the prevailing vice of those Place essays. It infects many well written, well packed essays, which, for this cause, lack wine, life, enchantment—call it what you will. There is a type of essay in which this definiteness and multiplicity take the more literary form of a well-arranged mosaic or catalogue of sights and sounds, these following each other in sharp succession. An account of Singapore, by Mr. Hugh Clifford, fails of the prize because, though excellent in its way, it wants more of the relief of comment and reflection; it is not sufficiently fused. When this fault is associated with poor observation it is, of course, simply maddening. Thus in an account of Liverpool we read: "Now taking our course to the best streets, the traffic changes its character: trams, omnibuses, cabs, hansoms, gentlemen's carriages, and electric trams are the chief vehicles. The passers-by are also in keeping. Be the weather wet or fine, there is always at certain hours of the day a stream of well-to-do and struggling middle-class people, ladies in equal proportion to the men."

Having thus indicated the sort of condemnation under which most of these essays fall—of course, in very different degrees—we may add a few notes on individual performances. Among British subjects certain essays on small towns and villages deserve notice as being inspired by long acquaintance, or nativity, rather than by a single visit. Miss H. M. Russ, who takes the essay prize, sends a pleasing sketch of a Devon village. Miss M. H. Linacre's "Norbury" (a Derbyshire village), Mr. A. Alexander's "Selby," Mr. E. A. Baker's "Bath," are all good in their way; and Mr. Wilfrid C. Thorley's description of a sleepy village is quite good, though too much limited to scenery.

Among foreign subjects is a gay little picture of Heidelberg, by Miss Gina Hoffmann. Bolsward, in Holland, is pleasantly described by Miss Marie Westenberg; and three papers on Siena, by Mr. L. Villari, Miss Anita MacMahon, and Miss Mabel M. Rich, are all commendable efforts.

Several descriptions of cities and villages in the East are noteworthy. Miss Swan Scott-Moncrieff's "Rosetta" is distinctly good. Peshawur is described well by Major-General L. H. E. Tucker.

The prize essay, by Mrs. Stepney Rawson, on "Rye" gives the spirit of the place by a wise choice of a few striking features. There is a proper fusion of statement and comment, and the details of the writing are good.

Rye, of the Marshes.

By Mrs. STEPNEY RAWSON.

HAVEN in the rich centuries that have taken wing, borough—half village, half townlet—of to-day, Rye, erstwhile of the Company of the Five Ports, stands ever on her "little hill," even as she stood in the days when her loving townsman, the astrologer Samuel Jeake, wrote so graciously and curiously of her. Of that splendid rage of the sea about her feet, that "flux and reflux" on which her historian dwells, we have now but scant pledges. The sea walls and dykes crumbled long ago. There remains, at least on her seaward front, that green space, the name of which—"The Salts"—has all the tang of brackish regret.

To come upon Rye from the land side—that is, from the heart of Kent—is to see her but imperfectly, with half-averted vision. The train, a handful of trucks, halts at the foot of a sleepy mound. With the poor approach suggested by modern workmen's cottages and the cheap masonry of a station the beauty of the upper roofs on the hill is but dimly apprehended. Not yet, not until the iron roadway is left and the height below Playden is scaled, do you see her wholly, as she lies like a rich reddish stone embedded in dusky green enamel. I would have you come upon her so at sunset in spring, when there is yet light enough by which to drink in the wall-flower petal hues of her tiled roofs, the dear irregularity of her outline, which shows how the grey church of Rye, with its wide tower, outstrips the rest. Just as in the ages when the Church was guardian of her conscience does this House of the Virgin outsoar the other houses of Rye. No dwelling has been more tenderly adorned by Franciscan and Flemish artist and English artificer; none has been more strenuously scoured of ornament at the will of men. The very tongues of the tower were torn out by invaders, but the bells that jangled unwillingly at Dieppe in the ears of their captors came back by the hands of brave men to Rye. So, since the dumb so rarely recovers his speech, and miracles are few, is it not fit that St. Mary's voice should sway the town, while the grotesque "quarter-boys"—corpulent cherubs on either side of the clock—should beat the quarters on the dial in the borough which no longer knows the curfew?

On the spring evening on which I would have you look from Playden on Rye there must be no wind, so that the still, straight smoke from the red roofs at the base of the slope may cast a bloom over those above. And thus your eye may pass to the long line of green flats to the left, beyond which lies the sea, sullenly beating behind dunes. At that glance there flashes to mind a phrase in which Elise Reclus pictures a sister town of the "mershe." "Faubourg délaissée au milieu des marais," he calls Romney. Délaissée! The word is untranslatable; it is carved upon every stock and stone in Rye. To-day she is like a soldier left by the roadside, who raises himself on his elbow to shade his eyes and watch his troop vanish in the dusk. So does Rye gaze after the sea that has turned his back upon her. He lashed her feet, he gnawed her hem; he was a fierce lover, but, though the Gaul could pillage and outrage, she never yielded to the sea. He lashed her skirts. Yet, by the same token, Rye was always thirsty; she always lacked pure water on her "little hill." The rain streams patter from her sides into the marsh to-day; her cisterns are hard to fill. The waterings and "lavants" from the hills leave her arid, for the Rother and the Tillingham and the Brede suck in greedily all the runnels in the flat, green country by the sea.

A magnificent romance is that of the still marsh, a history of sluice and flat (the old maps double the "t") and channel and "leuell," of wall and dyke and meeting of streams. A horrid strife was between men and men, ship-owner and landowner, landlord and tenant, because of it. Why pay rent for land encrusted with brine? Again, the merchant coveted a hollow in which his navies, holding French silk and wine, could rock in deep water. By stealth he dredged, and, when the owner of that spit of marsh below the Rye walls came in the morning, lo! he knew that no spring tide could have carved so smoothly. And he made a dam to spite his enemy. But the work of both was undone in an hour by the jeering sea, that had still puckishness enough to return upon its steps at seasons of the tide and moon. How strange and pitiful it is! There are no sluices any more. There is shingle, blue and mauve; and the Rother splits and winds itself out in the "slub" on the "Winshalse" side of the town. There are patches of blue thistle on the shingle, where the fishing-rod of Glaucus hangs over the yellow sea poppy, and there, too, are quivering larks and restless grey wag-tails.

Winchelsea two miles away, or from the straight white road that goes between the two? That road runs through the flat marsh, sheep-dotted, with tossing reed plumes that show the sunken ditches here and there. So still, so lovable is Rye from the white road; so rich the clustering roofs of red, and dove colour, and deep cobalt, rising from that green sea of marsh. Everywhere marsh: to the right, till it meets the sea; to the left, till it touches the hills of Udimore where the woods are deep, the lanes high-hedged, and the smoke of the red and white oast-houses goes up in white columns against an evening sky.

Rye is indeed like a soldier, for she was ever the centre of war. The sea attacked her in fierce tenderness on this side, and then, when she put on fresh buckram with a sea wall, he besieged her anew on that. And she did not know her good fortune while it lasted, for, so long as her lover's arms encircled her on three compass points, he was her defender from the side of Gaul, but, when he sulkily loosened his hold, a man, born a king, and third of the Edwards, was forced to give her, as duenna, a fort in the green place that the sea had bared.

The wars have gone over her head, but she is still the same Rye, with the same alleys, the old sites, the old names. Her two hundred and seventy-one rods contain her still, as when Jeake planned his horoscopes in his black and white house with the two gables in Mermaid-street, and saw, in a vision, the letters C.R. and I.R., by which he knew that after Carolus Rex II. should come the Nazarene Himself.

Upon the salts and in the alleys you will find russet-skinned and rosy children. Some of them have strange names. They are little Huguenots, in blood, from crown to heel. But they know nothing of the toil of their refugee sires, of the tireless fingers of forgotten men and girls in the cellars and crypts. Catch a brown-eyed boy and ask him what he does here. He looks at you in shy scorn. "Pl-ay," he whispers, and then blushes because you ask whether it is the salt damp wind that makes lashes curl. Not even the permanent way can bring back to Rye her old business of the days when the sea was about her. She is occupied certainly, like an anxious housewife, with a tender joy in methods that are old and circuitous. There is corn to buy and thresh, and barges to unload in the Rother, and ale to brew. And people get married, or fall out, and make bargains, as before; so that the town lawyers behind their flat fronts of Georgian brick, in which their doors stand level with the cobbled street, have sufficient to keep their waistcoats filled and their seals active. Yet, though the golfer hurries boisterously through the alleys to the toy train that runs to the links on the marsh, there is no other haste in Rye. She is the seat of contemplation and of gentle gossip and of neighbourliness. Her citizens woo and marry as Jeake did. He has written, as if contemplation and nicety held him in chains, of the moment when he took Elizabeth Hartshorn, witty and virtuous, to wife. "I was married," he writes in his diary, "to Mrs. Elizabeth Hartshorn by Dr. Bruce, about thirty-five minutes past nine a.m., in the presence of Mr. Thomas Miller, Nathaniel Hartshorn (brother to my wife), and the sexton, we going, though in the daytime, yet so much incognito, that there was no concourse or notice taken. The day was cloudy, but calm. The sun shone out just at the tying the nuptial knot, and also just at its setting."

If he were not frightened by that strange psalmody that echoes in his own storehouse to-day—for Rye supports at least five distinct and mournful things called Sects—that gentle bridegroom would surely sit purifying his heart and seek to combat by prayer and discipline those "malefique rays" of the stars that were to him an unending fairy tale. To know Rye best is to know it through him, and, fresh from his gentle science, to creep softly past her houses by dawn and dusk. To watch the young moon over a garden wall in the tufty leafage of a mulberry; to climb the rugged Ypres Tower and plumb its dungeons; to walk under the Landgate and contrast its huge masonry with the petty dwellings beyond, and these again with the austere façade of Peacock's School that Thackeray knew; to trace the Wishe, the dry Conduit, the Mint (where Rye made her own pence), the Court House (with its ghosts of rubicund "jurats" and relics of torture and chastisement), the Watchbell-street (where hung once the alarum that told of French inroad), to dip your fingers in the cool, small well under a silver maple by which Queen Elizabeth rested—this is to learn Rye stone for stone.

Once under the light of lanterns hanging from rowan trees in a garden where the townsfolk of Rye danced on the grass for sheer midsummer frolic, I had the happiness to draw Henry James aside and ask him where the ancient greatness of Rye lay buried. He thought that she had not the dignity of her continental equals, because her feudal relics are less massive, and so the less able to overawe the petty buildings, the petty commerce of our time. In this, the contrast between old and new being less perpendicularly accentuated, she lacked, in his eyes, the mere zest of such juxtaposition. But the secret of her charm he could not, or would not, tell. So I triumphed, and left him to gaze once more at her across the wet sand and lilac beach and one deep pool, belted with stunted trees, in which her opalescence was mirrored—the woman who was cold to love, the forsaken borough entrenched upon her "little hill"—Rye, of the Marshes.

Epigrammatic Criticism Competition.

THIS was the least popular of the Competitions. It entailed an acquaintance with the life-work of six living novelists, also a capacity for good epigrammatic writing, which is not a common gift. In many of the sets submitted two or three of the criticisms were good, but few of the competitors were able to sustain a level of excellence throughout the set. Mr. Ernest A. Baker, to whom we have awarded the prize, approached nearest to an all-round level of intelligent and searching criticism. Among the writers of the remaining twenty-eight sets submitted we may mention Miss Katherine N. Elwes, Miss Dora G. McChesney, Mr. Herbert Jamieson, and Mr. Martin Hobson.

MEREDITH.

His poetic comedy shows men evolving their destinies. Life he interprets as an ordeal—the fool passing through spiritual failure, through laughter and misfortune's chastening unto wisdom. He philosophises on the present beholding a splendid epoch, whereto his heroes and radiant heroines belong—magnanimous creatures, passionate, chaste, divinely strong.

Their Olympian speech; the lyrical diction his muse requires, scorning pedestrian prose; the wit, tropes, aphorisms would astound an Athenian audience.

Humour lurks in the minor characters, tragic irony in the situations.

His idealism rests on clear knowledge, humane tolerance, an open-eyed, patient optimism, finding plenary satisfaction in righteousness.

HARDY.

His dramas charm most by their scenery, woodlands, heaths, hamlets, skies, blended in Theocritean harmonies. The tragedies inflame oftener than soothe; the pathos is an accusation.

Philosopher, he finds a philosophy of life impossible. Deifying Chance, he blasphemises his fetish.

His characters are generalisations or sheer ideas, vitalised by emotion. The rustics of the comic interludes deliver his less sardonic witticisms

Most unequal of geniuses, he descends from the poetry of country life, from sublime ideals of insensate will and nemesis, to Zolaesque animalism. Technicalities clog a limpid style. The inspiration of his serener paganism was, alas! transient.

KIPLING.

Man in action is his theme, combatting, subduing, governing nature, animals, men. Loving civilisation little, he worships courage, enterprise, obedience. His strenuous tales are an epic of manhood and of Empire.

The intolerable glare of his realism illumines all indiscriminately, ugly and bestial things, tender and heroic; muscularity sanctions grossness.

His fables are above allegory, the animals more than symbols. His the vernacular of brutes, Brahmins, Hooligans.

Youthful cynicism sobered, he reads the eternal in human doings, sees conscience invoking fiends, but eschews neat generalisations.

Prejudiced, impatient of thought, restlessly inquisitive, from Whitechapel to Cabul he garners literature for Demos.

JAMES.

Microscopic analyst of the cultured mind, curious observer of human phenomena, artist delighting in technique.

Momentous themes he avoids; a connoisseur, hunting far and wide preciosities of conduct, which he registers dispassionately, discovering intangible graces, delicate pathos, subtle humours, unmarked of the common understanding.

Forsaking passion and sensuous beauty, he grows sophisticated, coldly intellectual in his investigations into social tendencies, which he pursues to speculative regions. Laying shade on impalpable shade, his style becomes abstruse, allusive, overburdened, eloquently reticent.

Evil and ugliness he esteems for their æsthetic value; fineness of breeding is the desirable virtue in this Novel of Manners.

BARRIE.

Born humourist in the age when wit and the funny man are eliminating humour, yet not quite free from mannerisms of the comic paper.

Lacking constructive art, his books are collections of anecdotes, sketches of real people, heightened by the fancy and fondness of a lover. Autobiographer, historian of his own kin, he discovers his own heart in the story of literary aspirants and exiles from Thrums; his Scotch tenderness exploits feelings that the Southron conceals. Such humour and pathos are begotten of the same sympathetic insight, the same exaggeration marks both.

GISSING.

Patient explorer of social conditions, movements, and maladies. Whole sections of society are his personages, their atoms studied as products of environment, with the observant care of a determinist.

He addresses the intellect, rarely the emotions; yet the Science subserves Art: the literary epicure relishes the subdued beauty of style, the Zolaesque grandeur of this nether world in its multitudinous details. Nor does he underrate character and will; his Kirkwoods and Idas, less credible than the unillustrious many, betray an intuitive faith in mankind.

His pessimism jibes not at Providence, but, indicting Civilisation, uncovers both petty sins and criminal enormities.

THE BOOK of the HOME. A Practical

Guide to General Household Management. Produced under the general Editorship of H. C. DAVIDSON, assisted by over One Hundred Specialists. Copiously Illustrated by Coloured Plates and Engravings in the Text. In 8 divisional volumes, super-royal 8vo, bound in cloth, coloured edges, price 5s. each.

The contents of the book may be grouped under four heads. The first deals with all matters concerning the House—the choice of its site, laws regarding landlord and tenant, sanitation, furnishing, removals, artistic decoration, &c., and also the garden. In the second the daily routine of the Household is considered—the duties of servants, the management of kitchen, laundry, and store-room, house-cleaning, &c., together with plain, fancy, and invalid cookery. In the third are discussed such subjects as the legal and customary duties of Master and Mistress, insurance and the making of a will, account-keeping, shopping, dress, home occupations, visiting and entertaining, and indoor and outdoor amusements. And in the fourth sound, systematic, and practical advice is given as to the management and education of children from infancy to the time when they are started in life on their own account.

A Birthday Tribute to Herbert Spencer.

MR. HERBERT SPENCER has just completed his eightieth year, having been born on April 27, 1820, and, though it is not customary to celebrate the birthday of a philosopher, an exception may fittingly be made in favour of one who towers above all others in the realms of thought. But though a tribute to Mr. Spencer will undoubtedly be generally considered appropriate at this time, it is somewhat difficult to produce a garland which will be pleasing to the general reader. For Mr. Spencer exists only in his books, and as these abound in sweeping generalisations and close reasoning, they are not quite so popular as the writings of Rudyard Kipling or Marie Corelli, and they have not yet reached the édition de luxe stage, as have the philosophical works of Mark Twain. With the majority of people the acquisition of new ideas is a difficult process, and the exercise of the brain is extremely fatiguing. Sir Walter Scott's humble friend and trusty henchman, Tom Purdie, used to declare that the reading of the Waverley Novels was a great comfort to him, for whenever he was off his sleep, which occasionally happened to him, he had only to take one of Sir Walter's novels, and before he had read two pages he was sure to fall into a refreshing slumber. It is much to be feared that, for producing exhaustion and bringing on drowsiness, profound philosophical books will be regarded by most people as immensely superior to anything which bears the name of the "Magician of Abbotsford."

But though Mr. Spencer's birthday is an interesting event, and will this year be more generally noticed than it has ever been before, it certainly will not bring forth anything in the way of those light gossiping personalities which the general public so much delights in. There is only one Spencer, the profound thinker and laborious worker, and he cannot be made to figure in any other character. It has been very different with one or two other philosophers. David Hume, for instance, as depicted in the pages of his biographer, John Hill Burton, and his clerical friend, "Jupiter" Carlyle, was at all times fond of le mot pour rire, and a regular frequenter of convivial gatherings like those of the "Poker Club," while he could roll off playful letters such as no philosopher has written before or since. He even carried his playfulness so far that on one occasion he wrote to Robertson, the historian, that he could not swallow certain expressions in the History of Charles the Fifth, adding the startling words: "No; I will see you d—d sooner!" One is scarcely prepared for that from the author of the Treatise on Human Nature. John Stuart Mill also had a personal side which was striking enough, for he had for many years a platonic affection for another man's wife, which moved his father to wrath and estranged him from many friends; while after his platonic affection blossomed into matrimony he was never weary of singing his wife's praises in an absurdly high key. These "anomalies" have greatly exercised the grave and learned gentlemen who have acted as Mill's biographers. Then the ascetic Auguste Comte had his Clotilde, and the grave Descartes his Princess Elizabeth, while Voltaire, whom M. Levy-Bruhl, following the example of Kant, includes among the philosophers, appeared in absurd enough attitudes. But with Mr. Herbert Spencer the case is totally different. For we may safely dismiss as mythical those smart epigrammatic sayings and amusing anecdotes which are associated with his name, and of which the present writer has made a goodly collection. Doubtless these products of the imagination will possess some value at a future date, as affording interesting evidence of the way the popular mind believed that a profound thinker should speak and act under all conceivable circumstances. But Mr. Spencer bears no resemblance to his mythical portrait. In him we have the philosopher who has kept his door closed, and been entirely absorbed in his task, a huge one, demanding keen scientific perception, accurate observation, and precise generalisation. Made painfully aware in early manhood that his tenure of life was precarious, obliged for long periods to abandon work altogether, and at other times able to accomplish only an hour or two of work per day, he has been compelled to husband his resources and keep himself aloof from the distractions of the world. His Synthetic Philosophy is the greatest intellectual task ever accomplished by man, and yet it is the work of one who for fifty years has been more or less an invalid, and obliged from time to time to utter in the prefaces to his books despairing notes about his feeble health, and the uncertainty attending his future. There is nothing like this in the annals of literature. M. Taine approaches it, for when that gifted thinker settled down to his monumental work, Les Origines de la France Contemporaine, he was aware that his time was short, and that he must labour with might and main to accomplish his task. But just as he neared the end he passed away, and we can only guess what his final summing up might have been. In magnitude, however, M. Taine's work, the entire work he had mapped out, falls far short of Mr. Spencer's. There is, indeed, no comparison that way, his Synthetic Philosophy being unique among the efforts of men.

The general public is undoubtedly aware that Mr. Spencer is a truly great man, and has learned something about him; but its knowledge of him has been caught on the wing, and is, therefore, superficial; and the real man and his work are known to only a very select audience. And from the nature of the case it could not be otherwise. For he has worked out a profound all-embracing formula of evolution, and he has applied that formula to every branch of phenomena; and he who believes that we have arrived at the age of reason, and that humanity is to be fashioned and led by knowledge and reasoned thought, has observed humanity to little purpose. As Renan puts it: "On subit le raisonnement, on ne le croit pas." In general, people are mostly influenced by feeling, and have merely a nodding acquaintance with reason. The result, in the case of Mr. Spencer, is obvious enough. He has acquired name and fame throughout the entire civilised world, and his name is truly "familiar in our mouths as household words"; but this familiarity is with his name only, and does not extend much further. His teaching has reached the public largely through the medium of opponents and hostile critics, who have distorted and misrepresented him, and made him appear ridiculous enough. Theologians, who, according to Buckle, are "remarkable for the certainty of their knowledge on subjects about which nothing is known," have treated him with the unfairness common to them; metaphysicians have refused his peace-offering, and mangled and mutilated him; and the teachers of the "new religion of the stomach" have poured out boiling hot vituperation and abuse. And these are not things of ancient history. Mr. W. H. Mallock has devoted a volume—Aristocracy and Evolution—to the work of demolishing a purely imaginary Spencer; while Prof. Paulsen, of Berlin, has lately been displaying an ignorance of Spencerian ethics which is truly amazing. Even so recently as in the March number of the Fortnightly Review, Prof. Ward, of Cambridge, closed a long Brutum fulmen by declaring that "However great Mr. Spencer's personal merits may be, his philosophy, I sincerely believe, deserves the worst that has ever been said of it." Truly, "it is a mad world, my masters"; and Mr. Spencer has had painful experience of the profound depth of his own philosophical doctrines.

Mr. Spencer's admirers are not always free from blame, and occasionally make statements which are inaccurate and misleading. There are writers who, like M. Gustave Le Bon, declare quite ex cathedra that Mr. Spencer's teaching is admirable so far as it goes, but that it requires at certain points to be supplemented by profounder views which have escaped the English philosopher. But whenever M. Le Bon condescends to pass from generals to particulars in support of his allegations, we find that "the profounder views" have all been fully elucidated by Spencer, and even clinched according to his custom by striking analogies. There are others who, like Prof. W. H. Hudson, would have us believe that Spencer's writings are "couched in a singularly condensed and unattractive style." But surely such individuals have paid little attention to authors and the styles appropriate to different kinds of subject-matter. From historians who mostly treat of the crimes, follies, and misfortunes of men, we expect the free gait of a Macaulay or a Froude, and from prophets who generally pass large judgments on the universe without being at the trouble of trying to ascertain what it consists of, we look for the tingling rhetoric of a Ruskin or a Carlyle. And Spencer has always been careful to vary and adjust his style according to circumstances, using clear measured sentences when engaged in exposition, becoming at times placidly severe when dealing with critics, playfully ironical when handling palpable absurdities, and rising to grave and sober eloquence when face to face with the mystery which lies at the heart of things. There are passages in his writing as stately as anything in Milton's prose, while there are occasional little side-thrusts which pierce as deeply as any of Voltaire's winged arrows. The infinite eternal energy which underlies all phenomena, the awful periodicity of the universe, and are never far from his thoughts, and prompt him at times to utter words which are not far removed from the emotional language of the poet. His lighter side is equally effective. Nothing could be neater than the passage where, after contrasting the conduct of rude tribes with that of Europeans during the greater part of the Christian era, noting in the one case the peaceful daily life and the resulting virtues, and in the other the political burglaries to acquire territory, and the long list of individual and national sins, he exclaims, "What a pity these heathens cannot be induced to send missionaries among the Christians!" If Spencer's profound views fly over the heads of most people, it is not for lack of style in presenting them, but simply because the road to the popular mind is so obstructed that bolts of close reasoning cannot be driven into it no matter how deftly the bolts are moulded.

The moving row
Of magic shadow shapes that come and go,

And yet Spencer has triumphed, and triumphed unmistakably. When he finished his task, four years ago, he expressed surprise at his audacity in having undertaken it, and still greater surprise at having completed it. He might fittingly have added his surprise at the deep mark his teaching has made. For, notwithstanding misrepresentation, ridicule, and abuse, and in spite of the hostility shown to him in our halls of learning and strongholds of tradition, his dominant note has caught on and leavened the thought of our time. It is true he is a philosopher, and the world is apt to dismiss philosophers and philosophies after the manner of Byron's lines:

When Bishop Berkeley said there was no matter
And proved it, 'twas no matter what he said.

But Spencer cannot be dismissed in that summary manner, for he is not a philosopher after the manner of a Hegel, a mere resuscitated schoolman, spinning meaningless jargon and empty verbal symbols; and still less is he a philosopher after the fashion of a John Stuart Mill, an analyser of old theories and conceptions and a master of logical acuteness, but without any fresh gospel for humanity. Logical acuteness and power of subtle analysis Spencer possesses in a pre-eminent degree; but he has something more valuable—a distinctive message, and a distinctive message founded on the bed-rock of science. He has enriched us with a flood of new ideas, for he has given us the philosophic formula of evolution, and from that all-embracing base he has worked out the evolution of the solar system, of the totality of life upon the earth's surface, of conscious intelligence and the products of conscious intelligence. He has placed philosophy on a new foundation, and, relying solely on the materials furnished by science, he has raised a vast superstructure which covers the entire field of knowable phenomena, and includes what men are all interested in, the great questions of conduct, society, and religion. The old fanciful metaphysics are steadily disappearing in spite of the efforts bestowed upon their renovation, and the new Spencerian philosophy is steadily rising, for it has a message to mankind about the practical affairs of life and action. The extravagancies of the old metaphysics have had their day, and the philosophy of the imagination is being steadily supplanted by the philosophy of science, because the new philosophy is enriched with notes which must make it more and more acceptable to humanity. And the author of this new philosophy, this fresh message to mankind, which is destined to supplant the barren negations of a bygone age and the absurdities of the schoolmen and their descendants, has done his work well, and has played a great part. He has proved himself a daring explorer and skilful pathfinder and a profound interpreter of that complex phenomenon called civilisation. He has laboured to reconcile conflicting schools and creeds, to eliminate what is mere dross and meaningless words, and put men in possession of what is true and eternal. His gospel is essentially one of construction, of healing and of reconciliation. And the very criticism he has been subjected to is conclusive proof of how powerfully he has stirred the hearts of men.

In Memoriam R. A. M. S.

You are not here, and yet it is the spring—
The tide you loved, compact of sun and rain,
And all sweet life and colour wakening,
Losing your touch the world falls grey again.
With you we strayed through faëry palaces,
Threaded green forests dark with ancient trees,
Solemn with pomp of immemorial shade,
Where by still pools the wood-nymphs bathed and played:
Unconscious as a happy child at play,
Of all forgotten splendours you were free,
And all the present wealth of night and day—
O, you, and you alone, could lead the way,
Yours was the key.
Yours was the golden touch, O loved and lost,
Or ever the wintry years that bring the frost
Could blur your radiant spirit, you are fled.
Eld shall not make a mock of that dear head,
Nor Time account you with his tempest-tost.
Young with imperishable youth you sped:
Yours is the peace, ours the unnumbered cost.

An Index Expurgatorius of Words.

IN a very interesting article on "English, Good and Bad," in last week's Literature, Mr. James R. Thursfield referred to a list of words and phrases which William Cullen Bryant forbade his contributors to use, when he was editing the New York Evening Post. The list is quoted by Mr. Fraser Rae in his book, Columbia and Canada, with no comment save a mention of Bryant's zeal for purity of speech. As it seems probable that many readers of the ACADEMY may like to have such a list by them, it is given below almost in full—a few needless Americanisms being omitted.

Which .....	in "which man."
Would seem .....	seems.

Although this list is interesting and helpful, it may be compared to a bag filled with bones of contention—and these fairly rattle. Take Bryant's first objection: "Above" is not to be used in the sense of "more than." That is to say, we may not write: "There are above a hundred misprints in this edition." Well, we should prefer "more than" a hundred here, but we dare not insist in face of the Bible sentence: "He was seen of above five hundred brethren at once." Swift, in Gulliver's Travels, has "I heard a knocking for above an hour," and there are many other sanctions. For "over" in the sense of "more than" there can be no justification. The objection to "afterwards" for "afterward" seems fantastic. Aggregate is certainly often used when "total," "entire," or "whole" would be more correct. "Aggregate" pre-supposes that the elements forming a whole are separately visible, or are being contemplated. Hence, we think, one would say "the aggregate shipments of tea," but not the "aggregate export of tea."

"Artiste." Vile word, say the purists. But it and other vile words have something to say for themselves. It is said that you may not write:

artiste for artist,
official for officer,
scientist for man of science,
lengthy for long, as if "artiste," "official," "scientist," and "lengthy" were vulgar synonyms for "artist," "officer," "man of science," and "long." They are not; and it is the fact that many words which appear to be corruptions of other words are really rude but healthy offshoots, doing special duty. It is idle to contend that "artist" ought to be used in all cases where "artiste" is heard. "Artist" is one of the least precise words in the language, yet with all its breadth it can rarely be trusted to indicate the commonest types of artist—persons who are proficient in a small minor art, as distinct from one of the fine arts. A ballet-dancer, a hair-dresser, or a cook, is called an artiste because in such cases it has been found that "artist" requires a context or a qualification. In short, "artiste" is a useful, if ugly, variation of "artist," and it was improvised to do the work which "artist" failed to do. Coin a better word if you will, but meanwhile "artiste" has a right to exist. Similarly "official" is not usually used for "officer," as Bryant's injunction implies. There is a difference. An "officer" of the P. & O. Steamship Company is a captain or mate, in uniform; an "official" of the P. & O. Steamship Company is a man from the office, in a tall hat. No doubt journalists write of "officials" where they might write "authorities"; but there is a general and frequent need to distinguish between the "officer" with his badges and known duties and the "official" with his more disguised and indefinite power. "Scientist" may be a horrid word, but the circumlocution "a man of science" becomes too cumbrous in a scientific age. If people need a word, and their language has it not, they will make one in a hurry. They will adapt a cognate word according to some simple analogy or fancied law, and there is your word—not born, but manufactured. Can you complain that it exists, or expect it to be beautiful? "Lengthy" has been a good deal reviled, and its invention has been charged to Americans. As a matter of fact it is found in Gower. The justification of "lengthy" is that it relieves "long" of certain duties. So many things are long that, in the myriad action and interaction of daily speech, it was found convenient to describe some things as "lengthy." And so we say a "long pole" and a "lengthy argument." You may certainly speak of a long argument; but, if so, do you not imply in a subtle way that the argument, though long, began and ended on one occasion and without interruption; whereas "lengthy" suggests tedium, intermittence. Surely "lengthy annotations" is usually more exact than "long annotations." A "lengthy dispute" conveys more than a "long dispute"—you see that the quarrel rose and sank and wandered until everyone was sick of it. It becomes clear that many words rejected of the purists are really rough-hewn corner stones, filling crevices in the language.

One of Mr. Bryant's most doubtful prohibitions is that of "in our midst." Yet Mr. Thursfield is particularly glad to see this expression banned. Bryant gives no equivalent for "in our midst," and Mr. Thursfield excuses him by saying: "I suppose he thought that anyone with the slightest sense of grammar would see that a collective possessive pronoun cannot in such a collocation be substituted for a discretive genitive case." This sonorously begs the question. Surely there is room for argument. If we may not say "in our midst," meaning "in the midst of us," it must be wrong to say:

"in our absence" for "in the absence of us,"
 "sing your praises" for "sing the praises of you,"
 "to his dismay" for "to the dismay of John,"
 "on his behalf" for "on behalf of him."

Mr. Thursfield thinks that "in the midst" is always used in the Bible with the genitive case, never with the possessive. Perhaps. But Milton wrote in Samson Agonistes:

And in my midst of sorrow and heart-grief
 To show them feats.

On the whole, there seems to be no sound objection to "in our midst."

"Average" is no doubt abused, but we should defend it in the expression "the average man." It may be used for "ordinary" in many ways which we cannot stop to define. Enough to quote Browning's "Bishop Blougram's Apology":

We mortals cross the ocean of this world
 Each in his average cabin of a life—
 The best's not big, the worst yields elbow-room.

What is the objection to "collided"? "Aspirant," "commence," "balance" (for a remainder not expressed in figures), and "claim" (for "assert") are all very properly condemned. "Couple" is too freely used, and "decease" as a verb is abominable. But "endorse" for "approve" has something to say for itself. You approve a course of action not yet carried out; you endorse an action already completed. In this sense endorse is a good word; nothing could be more significant. But when a speaker rises and says: "I endorse all that Mr. So-and-So says," he justly falls under Bryant's wrath. "Freshet" for "flood" is a leader-writer's word—a piece of professionalism. "Hardly" and "scarcely" should be discriminatively separated in one's mind. "Leniency" is not required, "lenity" being identical in meaning and nearer to the root. "Partially" is often used when "partly" would be better; and yet there is a distinction which often justifies the selection of "partially." "Partly" suggests that the part indicated is known and measured by the writer; "partially" suggests only a general incompleteness. "Record" for "character" or "reputation" is not pleasant.

"Retire" as an active verb (he was retired on a pension) is not unpardonable in connexions where it is almost a technical term. "Rôle" was adopted because it was needed; and métier was brought in to reinforce it. It is our own fault that these words are rife. "Transpire" has never been defended; and "vicinity" seems to us to be the least useful word in the language. "Would seem" is a curious phrase. It is milder than "it seems"; but instead of "it would seem" write, if possible, "it almost seems." "Try an experiment" is nonsense. "Subsequently" is original sin.

Correspondence.

The Missing Word.

SIR,—May I give Mr. Logan my reasons for preferring Englander to Briton as the generic title of a subject of the Empire? In the first place, it makes no vain attempt to be inclusive. The compliment which the word "Briton" pays to Scotland and Wales is an insult to Ireland greater than any seeming slight given by "Englander." Again, "Briton" has a territorial and racial significance; Englander was coined with no such connotation. For the phrase "Little Englander" means one who would circumscribe the Empire, not one who would exclude Wales, Scotland, or even Ireland. Being a new word, its general adoption could be prefaced by the statement that it refers only to the centre of unity of the Empire. Having no racial significance it is better suited than Briton as a title of our Dutch and Indian fellow subjects. A great advantage would follow its use in that the term Briton or Englishman would be free from all ambiguity and would be confined to a native of that particular province.—I am, &c.,

Suggestions Wanted.

SIR,—I wish to form a small library in country quarters which will include the best twenty novels published in the last ten years. Will you and your readers kindly assist me in making a selection? I would prefer that each year of the decade should be represented by one or two books. This point, however, is not essential. I simply wish in my small library to get the very best novels published in the ten years.—I am, &c.,

The Etymology of Beagle, &c.: The Effects of Gutturalization.

SIR,—The etymology of "beagle," the name of the small hunting dog, has baffled all our leading lexicographers—Murray (1888), Whitney (1889), Webster-Mahn (ed. 1890), Skeat (ed. 1898), who respectively label the word "derivation obscure," "origin unknown," "perhaps of Celtic origin" (absurd), "of unknown origin"; yet it seems to be capable of a very simple explanation. A free exercise of the element of comparison upon which Brachet was so fond of laying stress leads one inevitably to the conclusion that "beagle" is nothing more than a gutturalized form of "beadle."

It may be laid down as a phonetic law that the dental explosives (voiced d, voiceless t) when immediately followed by the dental liquid l are liable to conversion into the corresponding gutturals (g, k). Thus, if "beadle" be uttered very quickly the hearer will find it impossible to distinguish the sound from that of "beagle"; while the lower classes frequently call a fiddle a "figgle"; beetles, "beekles"; a whitlow, a "wicklow"; fettle, "feckle," &c.

Bearing this law in mind, we are now able to explain such surnames as Pegler and Biggle or Bickle or Bickell (where not representing Bighill), which are merely gutturalized forms of the original names Pedler and Biddle (Beadle) respectively; and also to state why, from a mistaken notion that the pronunciation was at fault, the brook Arkle Beck in Yorkshire has been turned into Artle Beck in Lancashire.

A clear testimony to the real existence of gutturalization is found in Joyce's Irish Local Names Explained (p. 4). He says that d is often changed to g, as in Drumgonnelly in Louth, which should have been Anglicised Drumdonnelly; compare also the use of k for t in the Doric dialect of Greek.

We first hear of the beagle in the fifteenth century. It seems plain, then, that the rough peasant youth of that period began to sportively apply to the hunting dog the name of the individual by whom they were frequently hunted—viz., the beadle, whose functions corresponded to those of the modern constable or detective; "beadle" in their coarse pronunciation becoming "beagle," which crept into the literary language as a separate word, to the confusion of etymologists for centuries afterwards. It is something more than a mere coincidence that "beadle" and "beagle" (fig. sense) stand in our dictionaries with practically the same significations.

We are now able to give the origin of another etymological puzzle: "beak," the slang word for a magistrate. Formerly, like "beadle," it meant a constable, an officer of justice. It is merely a shortening of "beagle," as "tec" is a slang abbreviation of "detective"; and, touching upon still another etymological uncertainty, it is not too much to claim that after all the Anglo-Saxon verb bedian (or, perhaps, biddan), "to beg," "to pray," is, under concession of French influence (O. Fr. begard), the ultimate source of "beg."—I am, &c.,

George Wishart.

SIR,—I am much interested in the statement of the reviewer of Dr. Mitchell's Scottish Reformation to the effect that George Wishart's "coming" was in 1559. This destroys the scandalous old story that Beaton had Wishart strangled and burned in 1546. That Knox in childhood had been a pupil of Wishart's, "of him he learned the little Greek he knew," is also novel information. I know not whether more to admire the docility of Knox or the miraculous precocity of Wishart: for Knox was eight or nine years old when Wishart, his Greek tutor, was born. This, at least, is the view of Mr. Hume Brown, and Laing was of the same opinion. That Knox, "strangely, took to the law" is, perhaps, not so strange, most notaries being clerics at that date, as I understand.—I am, &c.,

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

HERBERT SPENCER:

THE MAN AND HIS WORK.

Y HECTOR MACPHERSON.

On Mr. Spencer's eightieth birthday appears this study of his philosophical work. The author's aim is to "present to the reader Spencerism in lucid, coherent shape"—an excellent aim in which he has had the approval of Mr. Spencer. At the same time, Mr. Spencer "does not stand committed to the detailed treatment of the subject." (Chapman & Hall.)

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF JOHN

CHARLES MOLTEÑO.

By P. A. MOLTEÑO.

Sir John Charles Molteno was the first Premier of Cape Colony, and this biography, in two handsome volumes, scarcely needs other justification at the present time. It is full of matter for the reflection of politicians of all shades. Sir John Molteno was closely associated with Sir Bartle Frere, whose actions figure largely in the narrative. Mr. Molteno challenges some of the statements in Mr. Martineau's biography of Frere. (Smith, Elder. 2 vols. 28s.)

HURRAH FOR THE LIFE OF A SAILOR!

By VICE-ADMIRAL
SIR WILLIAM KENNEDY.

This is not, as its title might indicate, a rollicking song or a jaunty little book of impressions; it is a vice-admiral's solid autobiography of nearly 350 pages. But the title has the right ring about it, and what follows it is the good old stuff about three-deckers and cutters, about China Seas, and wreck and battle; in short—fifty years of the Navy. (Blackwood. 12s. 6d.)

PIONEERING ON THE CONGO.

By THE REV. W. HOLMAN BENTLEY.

Mr. Bentley is a Baptist missionary of twenty-one years' experience on the Congo. While his narrative is essentially a missionary's, it contains much ethnological and political matter. Mr. Bentley writes with admiration of the "courage and enterprise" with which the Belgians have developed the Congo State. His two volumes are profusely illustrated with photographs. (Religious Tract Society. 2 vols. 16s. net.)

CARNATIONS AND PICOTEES FOR GARDEN AND EXHIBITION.

Y H. W. WEQUELIN.

A very charmingly produced little book on a branch of horticulture which has its devotees in a noisy world. The chapter on "The Carnation in Town Gardens" will be useful to London amateurs. (Newnes.)

The Twelve Most Popular Characters in Dickens.

Our Weekly Prize Competition.

RESULT OF NO. 31 (NEW SERIES).

IN this competition for a list of the twelve most popular characters in Dickens, we stated that in judging we should resort to the plébiscite method, selecting for the prize the list which corresponded in the greatest number of items with the general sense. The list submitted by Mr. John P. Rapsey, 10, Glaskin Road, Hackney, contained eleven out of the twelve characters chosen by the popular vote. Mr. Rapsey's list is as follows:—

- |                    |                     |

Competition No. 32 (New Series).

ALTHOUGH Cowper's "History of John Gilpin" is artistically complete, it is still a tale unfinished. Gilpin, pursued by "six gentlemen upon the road," wins the race to town and arrives safely home. But what of Mrs. Gilpin and the children? They are still at the Bell Inn at Edmonton. How did they return? And what passed when the Gilpin family, reunited round their own table in Cheapside, reviewed the adventures of the day? We offer a prize of One Guinea for the best attempt to supply this information in four or five stanzas which might properly precede the last (existing) stanza of the ballad. Cowper's four final verses run:

Stop thief! stop thief!—a highwayman!
Not one of them was mute;
And all and each that pass'd that way
Did join in the pursuit.

And now the turnpike gates again
Flew open in short space;
The toll-men thinking as before
That Gilpin rode a race.

And so he did, and won it too,
For he got first to town;
Nor stopp'd till where he had got up
He did again get down.

[Here insert the new stanzas.]

Now let us sing, long live the King,
And Gilpin, long live he;
And, when he next doth ride abroad,
May I be there to see!

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, May 1. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the first column of p. 376, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

THE SECOND THOUSAND AT ONCE CALLED FOR.

AN IMPORTANT WORK BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE ROMANCE OF ISABEL, LADY BURTON."

THE LOVE of an UNCROWNED QUEEN. Sophie Dorothea, Consort of George I., and her Correspondence with Philip Christopher, Count Königsmarck (now first published from the Originals). By W. H. WILKINS, M.A. In 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth gilt and gilt top, 36s. With Photogravure Portraits and 40 other Full-Page Portraits and Illustrations.

"This highly interesting work."—Athenæum.

"These singularly spirited and dramatic volumes will help in future to relieve the tedious interval between Pepys and Walpole."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Wilkins is cordially to be congratulated. He has made a valuable contribution to a neglected department of history. He has written a book which is as exciting as an historical novel by Dumas, and to the judicious reader a good deal more interesting. His picture of life at the Hanoverian Court is graphic and complete; his story is romantic, not to say sensational."—Literature.

"It is the most human, therefore the most attractive, romance my Baronite has read for many a day."—Punch.

READY ON MONDAY NEXT. THE FIRST BOOK ON THE SIEGE OF KIMBERLEY.

BESIEGED by the BOERS: a Diary of Life and Events in Kimberley during the Siege.

By E. OLIVER ASHE, M.D., F.R.C.S., Surgeon to the Kimberley Hospital. In crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. With 24 Illustrations.

THIRD LARGE AND POPULAR EDITION OF MRS. HUGH FRASER'S GREAT BOOK ON JAPAN.

A DIPLOMATIST'S WIFE in JAPAN. With over 200 beautiful Illustrations.

One large vol., handsome cloth gilt, 12s. net.

"Never before have the more charming aspects of Japan been so attractively presented."—Athenæum.

JUSTICE to the JEW. The Story of What he has Done for the World. By Madison C.

PETERS. In demy 8vo, 7s. 6d.

"In the course of his able and strenuous defence of the Jews, the author presents in concise and well-arranged order many interesting and valuable facts, which should make the book of considerable worth."—Glasgow Herald.

By IMBERT DE SAINT-AMAND, Author of "Famous Women of the French Court."

Each Volume in crown 8vo, cloth gilt, with Portraits on Plate Paper, 6s.

LOUIS NAPOLEON and MADEMOISELLE

DE MONTIJO.

[Third Edition.]

THE COURT of the SECOND EMPIRE.

[Second Edition.]

NAPOLEON III. and HIS COURT.

[Second Edition.]

FRANCE and ITALY.

[Second Edition.]

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE FARRINGDONS. By Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler.

[30th Thousand.]

"The Farringdons' appear to us to mark a real artistic advance in the writer. Elizabeth Farringdon is certainly Miss Fowler's chef d'œuvre. We know few characters in recent fiction so consistent and so human. The book will be highly praised, and it thoroughly deserves it. We have not for a long time read a book so fresh, so sincere, so truly humorous; a book which so enthralled the reader by its wit and by its vivid realisation of character."—Literature.

A DOUBLE THREAD. By Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler.

[50th Thousand.]

THE MINX. By "Iota."

[Second Edition at press.]

Mr. W. L. COURTNEY, in the Daily Telegraph, says:—"In 'The Minx' 'Iota' shows insight, a knowledge of how a good story is constructed, a clear management of her detail, which make the novel as a whole the best thing she has ever done. It is a pretty theme which Mrs. Caffyn proposes to herself, and she carries it out with no little skill and graphic effect."

GARTHOWEN. By Allen Raine.

[Third Edition.]

"Charming alike in conception and execution, 'Garthowen' should add largely to the number of this delightful writer's admirers and also to his growing reputation. Mr. Raine will be hard put to it to better this his latest and finest work."—World.

THE TEMPTATION of OLIVE LATIMER. By L. T. Meade.

[Next week.]

KIDDY. By Tom Gallon.

[Next week.]

FORTUNE'S YELLOW. By Ella MacMahon.

"Miss MacMahon deserves all the credit that attaches to the accomplishment of a difficult and delicate task. No ordinary tact and sympathy are required in handling a theme fraught with so many possibilities. Miss MacMahon emerges with distinction."—Spectator.

A WOMAN of SAMARIA. By "Rita."

"The romance is cleverly conceived and cleverly executed."—Scotsman.

THE HEART of the DANCER. By Percy White.

[Third Edition.]

The Pall Mall Gazette says:—"The impalpable Thackerayan atmosphere of good breeding is one of the charms of Mr. White's style. In short, 'The Heart of the Dancer' is a book to be read, and, when read, to be put away among the books which it will always be a pleasure to read over again."

A CORNER of the WEST. By Edith Henrietta Fowler.

[Eighth Edition.]

Messrs. HUTCHINSON & CO. would like to call attention to THREE NEW NOVELS by NEW WRITERS, 6s. each.

THE DEAN of DARREN-A KENT SQUIRE. By F.W. THE SECOND

DALE. By WYNTON EVERSLEY.

HAYES.

LADY DELCOMBE.

By Mrs. ARTHUR KENNARD.

"The 'Dean of Darrendale' is a remarkable book. It deserves unusual consideration, and it reveals the writer's possession of intellectual and moral qualities of a rare order. The strong human interest commends this work, which is something more than a novel, to serious attention."—World.

"A novel of unusual excellence, depicted with exceptional power."—Outlook.

"Quite a remarkable book in many ways. It introduces the reading public to a new writer of great dramatic power. Mr. Hayes has been long before the public as an artist. He is responsible for the sixteen beautiful illustrations which illuminate the pages. Of the book itself one can truly say that it is entitled to rank with the best historical novels of the day. Those who have followed with breathless interest and mingled emotions the fortunes of Ambrose Gwynett will await with impatience the publication of the sequel which Mr. Hayes has promised us."

Liverpool Post.

"Rita Frost is one of the best and most pathetic little heroines we have met with for some time; she stands out vivid and life-like from first to last, making excellent comedy. The scene in which Lord Delcombe proposes to her is simply a brilliant bit of workmanship. It is a book to be read."—Standard.

"A very remarkable piece of work."

FREDERICK WEDMORE'S NEW NOVEL.

THE COLLAPSE of the PENITENT. In cloth, gilt, 3s. 6d.

FIRST REVIEW.—Mr. W. L. COURTNEY, in a column review in the Daily Telegraph, says:—"The Collapse of the Penitent' is brief, succinct, graphic, with no unnecessary detail, and all the high lights duly accentuated—a very remarkable piece of work, delicate as well as clever; assuredly a book worth reading."

OLD TESTAMENT THEOLOGY;
Or, The History of Hebrew Religion.

Vol. II. The Deuteronomical Reformation in Century VII. B.C.

By ARCHIBALD DUFF, M.A., LL.D.,
Professor of Old Testament Theology in the United College, Bradford.

A continuation of the Author's "History of Hebrew Religion," which seeks to present in order the religious thinking of each writer, to note the significance of the sequence, and the constant rise of religious problems and efforts for solution.

NOW READY.—Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s. net.

EVOLUTION AND THEOLOGY.

By OTTO PFLEIDERER, D.D.,
Professor of Theology at the University of Berlin.

Edited by Dr. ORELLO CONE, Lombard University.

In collecting and publishing these essays, with the permission of the distinguished author, the editor has been actuated by a desire to place before English readers, in a convenient form, some of the occasional writings of one of the foremost theologians and scholars of this century.

THE EPISTLES OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

In Current and Popular English.
By Rev. HENRY HAYMAN, D.D.

This is an attempt to exhibit in the garb of language of our own day the Epistolary portions of the New Testament. The author has endeavoured throughout his work to keep in view, not merely the question, what is the most apt, or felicitous, or most nearly equivalent English phrase in exchange for the original, but the question which lies further back: how would an inspired writer have expressed the thought, if the current vernacular, with all its resources and all its defects had been the medium through which he had sought to give that thought expression?

NOW READY.—Crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

OUTLINES OF THE HISTORY OF RELIGION.

By JOHN K. INGRAM, LL.D.,
Author of "A History of Political Economy,"
"A History of Slavery," &c.

"It bears the character of a solemn profession of faith, the profession of a faith deeply pondered and long held in silence, but now in advanced years disclosed and commended to the thoughtful and open-minded of mankind."—Aberdeen Free Press.

NOW READY.—Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

INTERPRETATIONS OF POETRY and RELIGION.

By GEORGE SANTAYANA,
Author of "The Sense of Beauty."

In the introductory Essay the author deals with the imagination and its relation to the understanding on the one hand and to mysticism on the other. The way is then scientifically cleared for an exaltation of its functions in the world of thought and emotion, and this constitutes the keynote of the essays which follow—viz., the inadequacy of any view of life un-illuminated by the imagination.

NOW READY.—Demy 8vo, cloth, price 12s. 6d. net.

SEXUAL DIMORPHISM IN THE ANIMAL KINGDOM.

A Theory of the Evolution of Secondary Sexual Characters.

By J. T. CUNNINGHAM, M.A.,
Containing 32 Illustrations.

"It is a thoughtful work, and if only a fragment on account of the future literature of a great subject, it forms a sound basis for the commencement of a valuable course of study, and one that may be pursued by most intelligent persons."—Science Gossip.

NOW READY.—Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

THE GIFTS OF ENEMIES: a Novel.

By G. E. MITTON, Author of "A Bachelor Girl in London," "Fire and Tow," &c.

"The smartness of the dialogue, the variety of incident, and the strong interest of the story itself all contribute to make 'The Gifts of Enemies' eminently readable, and as it shows a distinct improvement in technique over its predecessors, its final acceptance by the reading public can hardly be in any doubt."

The Literary Week.

SINCE the foundation of the Royal Literary Fund in 1773, nearly £130,000 has been distributed "unostentatiously, secretly, and sympathisingly," to quote Lord Russell of Killowen's words, who presided at the annual dinner on Wednesday. The income of the Society is £2,000 a year, and its expenditure £3,000 a year. Mr. Anthony Hope Hawkins, who responded for "Literature," remarked that they had to face the fact that to the mass of the people literature was a blank page. In his opinion the duty of the author was to choose, not the most exalted audience, but the best audience that he was capable of reaching, and when he had chosen it to do the best work he could. The duty of the critic was to recognise what audience the author was capable of reaching, not to take him too seriously, and not to tell him that, because he could not achieve the highest of all things, therefore he was not worth anything at all. It is a new experience to find an author saying that critics should not take authors too seriously.

NOTHING seems to affect Mr. Bernard Shaw's high spirits. To embellish an amusing interview in Sketch he has permitted himself to be photographed as a vagrant on crutches begging by a wayside. The picture is called "Mr. George Bernard Shaw supporting himself in the intervals of play-writing." But there does not appear to be much interval, as we are told that he is now working on "a very daring play on the subject of 'Don Juan,' and preparing for the press a volume to be called Three Plays for Puritans, the plays being 'The Devil's Disciple,' 'Cæsar and Cleopatra,' and 'Captain Brassbound's Conversion.'"

"COUNTRY MOUSE" asked last week in our Correspondence columns for the names of "the best twenty novels published in the last ten years." "I would prefer," he added, "that each year of the decade should be represented by one or two books." Messrs. James McGeachy & Co., of Glasgow, send us the following in answer to "Country Mouse's" appeal: "When we consider that during a decade several thousands of novels are published it is not surprising that a very large percentage of these pass into oblivion in a few months after date of issue. The romance that may be read more than once is not often met with. Those novels that survive must have qualities which appeal to the constantly changing novel-reading public. The following list is made up chiefly of such as have stood the test of several years and are still in demand:

- 1889. Robbery Under Arms, by Rolf Boldrewood.
- 1890. Lady Baby, by Dorothea Gerard.
Kirsteen, by Mrs. Oliphant.
- 1891. The Little Minister, by J. M. Barrie.
Thé White Company, by A. Conan Doyle.
- 1892. Lord Ormont and his Aminta, by George Meredith.
Children of the Ghetto, by Israel Zangwill.
- 1893. Many Inventions, by Rudyard Kipling.
A Gentleman of France, by Stanley J. Weyman.

- 1894. Prisoner of Zenda, by Anthony Hope.
The Raiders, by S. R. Crockett.
- 1895. The Honour of Savelli, by S. Levett-Yeats.
- 1896. The Sowers, by H. S. Merriman.
On the Face of the Waters, by F. A. Steel.
Tess of the D'Urbervilles, by Thomas Hardy.
- 1897. St. Ives, by R. L. Stevenson.
The Nigger of the Narcissus, by Joseph Conrad.
Aylwin, by Theodore Watts-Dunton.
- 1898. The Forest Lovers, by Maurice Hewlett.
John Splendid, by Neil Munro.
- 1899. Young April, by Egerton Castle."

THE Daily News, in a leaderette the other day, made two disturbing statements:

We are told that the robberies of show-cases at public institutions, one of which occurred at the Natural History Museum, Kensington, last Sunday week, date from the appearance of a certain story by a famous novelist.

We are informed that the diffusion of Stalky & Co. among schoolboys is apt to increase the difficulties of maintaining discipline and a respect for school regulations. The Headmaster of a large public school tells us that he attributes a recent misdemeanour of a pupil directly to the influence of that work.

Who is the popular novelist of the first paragraph, and what is the title of the story?

MRS. STEPNEY RAWSON, who won our prize for the best topographical essay, has lately finished a long novel dealing with the Regency period, which Messrs. Hutchinson & Co. are publishing this spring under the title of A Lady of the Regency.

APROPOS of Dr. Jessop's outspoken and somewhat depreciatory article on Borrow in last Monday's Daily Chronicle, Mr. Lowerison sends the following interesting fragment to our contemporary:

The landlord of the Ferry Inn at Oulton Broad knew George Borrow very well. I remember five years ago asking him how he liked the author of Lavengro.

"Didn't like him at all," was the gruff response.

"At least," I said, "he was a scholar and a gentleman."

"Scholar be d—," replied Boniface, "an' gentleman he weren't; never came into my bar but he quarrelled with everyone there, and crack'd 'em out to fight, An' when he weren't fightin' himself he were egg'in' others on to."

And that was George Borrow.

But all the same I'll e'en take down the Romany Rye and talk with the gipsies ere I sleep to-night.

MR. THEODORE ANDREA COOK has resigned the editorship of the St. James's Gazette, and has entirely ceased his connexion with that paper. Mr. Cook, it will be remembered, succeeded Mr. Hugh Chisholm last autumn.

WE regret to hear that Mr. Eden Phillpotts has been obliged, as the consequence of overwork, to cease writing for a time. His new novel, Sons of the Morning, is almost completed.

Messrs. Duckworth publish this week Prof. Herford's metrical translation of Ibsen's Love's Comedy, which he pronounces to be "without doubt the finest of the few plays of Ibsen which still remain inaccessible to the English reader." A portion of the present translation appeared in the February number of the Fortnightly Review, and we then quoted some of Prof. Herford's lines. Love's Comedy is a satire on Marriage as the fulfilment of Love. Ibsen's attitude is pithily defined by Prof. Herford in his Introduction, in which, after laying down that there are two men in Ibsen, the idealist and the critic, he says:

Love, for the idealist Ibsen, is a passion which loses its virtue when it reaches its goal, which inspires only while it aspires, and flags bewildered when it attains. Marriage, for the critic Ibsen, is an institution beset with pitfalls into which those are surest to step who enter it blinded with love. In the latter dramas the tragedy of married life is commonly generated by other forms of blindness—the childish innocence of Nora, the maidenly ignorance of Helena Alving, neither of whom married precisely "for love"; here it is blind Love alone who, to the jealous eye of the critic, plays the part of the Serpent in the Edens of wedded bliss. There is, it is clear, an element of unsolved contradiction in Ibsen's thought—Love is at once so precious and so deadly, a possession so glorious that all other things in life are of less worth, and yet capable of producing only disastrously illusive effects upon those who have entered into the relations to which it prompts. But with Ibsen—and it is a grave intellectual defect—there is an absolute antagonism between spirit and form. An institution is always, with him, a shackle for the free life of souls, not an organ through which they attain expression; and since the institution of marriage cannot but be, there remains as the only logical solution that which he enjoins—to keep the soul's life out of it. To "those about to marry," Ibsen therefore says in effect: "Be sure you are not in love!" And to those who are in love he says: "Part!"

It is well that Love's Comedy should have its English readers. We may remark, however, that its publication just now will probably increase the feeling of pause and bewilderment which is coming over Ibsen's disciples in this country. For the effort to understand the later Ibsen will hardly be helped by this new inrush of the Ibsen of 1862.

SOME of the unpublished Cowperiana, of which Mr. Thomas Wright gave an account at Olney last week, are interesting. Take the following passage on women, from a letter to Mr. Samuel Rose in 1790. Speaking of Lady Hesketh, Cowper says: "To a person indifferent to her, or to whom she bears a dislike, she is all smiles on all occasions, but not such always to those whom she loves and values. Then, if she feels herself inclined to scratch, she scratches without ceremony, and this is the manner of all the ladies I ever knew, and I question if you will ever meet with an exception." If Cowper knew women, he also knew children, and with these he could play games by the hour. One little boy, who always called him Mr. Toot, gave Lady Hesketh a sprig of box one morning, requesting her to hand it to Mr. Toot as a present from himself. Cowper acknowledged the gift in a couplet:

Dear Tom! my Muse this moment sounds your praise,
And turns at once your sprig of box to bays.

Desiring Hayley's portrait he writes to him:

Achilles and Hector and Homer and all,
When your face appears shall come down from the wall,
And mine, theme of my picky angry remark,
Shall then hide its picky pocket looks in the dark.

MR. LAURENCE BINYON's forthcoming study of Thomas Girtin will, we may hope, do much to secure to the memory of a brilliant young artist the reverence that is its due. Girtin is little more than a name to the ordinary lover of pictures, but those whose sympathies are especially with the old English landscapists, with Crome and Constable and Bonington and Prout, are aware that Girtin took to his early grave the seeds of greatness. In the introductory essay which will accompany the book Mr. Binyon says:

The circumstances of Girtin's life, his companionship with Turner, his early death, would render him always interesting. The fate which in that same period removed from poetry Shelley, Keats, and Byron, in their youth or in their prime, removed from painting one who, though his name could never have the splendour which attaches to these names, inasmuch as the field he worked was in itself less glorious, exalted, and conspicuous, yet had developed his powers in a life as brief as Keats's, with a perhaps surer and completer progress. His promise was wonderful, yet his performance showed already many noble and satisfying works, works of real maturity.

The book will be issued by Messrs. Seeley.

THE Dedication Fanciful is exemplified by Mr. Jerome K. Jerome in his new book Three Men on the Bummel:

TO THE GENTLE GUIDE,

WHO LETS ME EVER GO MY OWN WAY, YET BRINGS ME RIGHT—TO THE LAUGHTER-LOVING

PHILOSOPHER,

WHO, IF HE HAS NOT RECONCILED ME TO BEARING THE TOOTH-ACHE PATIENTLY, AT LEAST HAS TAUGHT ME THE COMFORT THAT THIS EVEN WILL ALSO PASS—

TO THE GOOD FRIEND,

WHO SMILES WHEN I TELL HIM OF MY TROUBLES, AND WHO, WHEN I ASK FOR HELP, ANSWERS ONLY "WAIT!"—

TO THE GRAVE-FACED

JESTER,

TO WHOM ALL LIFE IS BUT A VOLUME OF OLD HUMOUR—TO GOOD MASTER

Time

THIS LITTLE WORK OF A POOR
PUPIL IS DEDICATED.

The Bummel, by the way, is not a river, as its sound somehow suggests.

"It has been a pleasant Bummel, on the whole," said Harris; "I shall be glad to get back, and yet I am sorry it is over, if you understand me."

"What is a 'Bummel'?" said George. "How would you translate it?"

"A 'Bummel,'" I explained, "I should describe as a journey, long or short, without an end, the only thing regulating it being the necessity of getting back within a given time to the point from which one started."

THE Dedication Incomprehensible is exemplified in Miss Fiona Macleod's new book, composed of three "studies in spiritual history," called The Divine Adventure, Iona, and By Sundown Shores. Miss Macleod's dedication runs as follows:

THE WIND, SILENCE, AND LOVE
FRIENDS WHO HAVE TAUGHT ME MOST:
BUT SINCE, LONG AGO, TWO WHO ARE NOT FORGOTTEN
WENT AWAY UPON THE ONE, AND DWELL, THEMSELVES
REMEMBERING, IN THE OTHER, I DEDICATE THIS BOOK

WHOSE LOVE AND SPIRIT LIVE HERE ALSO.

A VALUABLE collection of autograph letters, the property of the late Chevalier de Chatelain, will be sold by auction at Sotheby's on Saturday, May 5. Several interesting letters of George Eliot's are among the number. To Dr. Alexander Main, the editor of the "George Eliot Birthday Book," she writes, with curious punctuation:

I have just learned from Messrs. Blackwood, that they have agreed with you concerning the Birthday Book. When your letter came I had already referred the decision to Mr. Blackwood. Mr. Lewes and I having no acquaintance with this new mode of serving up authors. Since then Mr. Blackwood has sent me the Tennyson specimen, and I must say that I think it exceedingly ill done. The extracts are too numerous and too short. The effect is dotting and feeble. This is not the Poet's fault, and I think the presentation of our beloved Tennyson in this book is cruelly inadequate. It is probably too late now to mention Mr. Lewes's wish that there should be a good sprinkling of the best quotations from my Poems and poetical mottoes. But I confide in your having done something very different from the work of Tennyson's Editor. I should like you to remember for a Spring month, the motto in Deronda, beginning "Fairy folk a listening" and for a Winter's month, the motto in Middlemarch beginning "Surely the golden hours are turning grey." And will you permit me to say, that the only peccant tendency I can accuse you of, as a selector, is a not always strict obedience to that precious rule. Nothing too much? Perhaps it would have been better not to have made the volume of "Sayings" quite so bulky. Not that this is any business of mine.

THERE was really no need for Mr. Shorter to apologise, as he does, for annotating Mrs. Gaskell's Life of Charlotte Brontë, the seventh and concluding volume of the "Haworth" edition (Smith, Elder). It would be strange indeed if the labours of Brontë enthusiasts had not rendered some annotation absolutely necessary. No one is more competent to apply it than Mr. Shorter, who, however, makes generous acknowledgment of his debts to other investigators. One of the attractions of this edition will be found in a number of unpublished letters written by Charlotte Brontë to her publisher, Mr. George Smith, of Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. Another prize—the letter in which Mr. Brontë definitely asked Mrs. Gaskell to write the biography of his daughter—has been unearthed, and is given by Mr. Shorter. We take the liberty to transcribe it:

TO MRS. GASKELL, MANCHESTER.

Haworth, near Keighley: June 16, 1855.

My dear Madam,—Finding that a great many scribblers, as well as some clever and truthful writers, have published articles in newspapers and tracts respecting my dear daughter Charlotte since her death, and seeing that many things that have been stated are untrue, but more false (sic); and having reason to think that some may venture to write her life who will be ill-qualified for the undertaking, I can see no better plan under the circumstances than to apply to some established author to write a brief account of her life and to make some remarks on her works. You seem to me to be the best qualified for doing what I wish should be done. If, therefore, you will be so kind as to publish a long or short account of her life and works, just as you may deem expedient and proper, Mr. Nicholls and I will give you such information as you may require.

I should expect and request that you would affix your name, so that the work might obtain a wide circulation and be handed down to the latest times. Whatever profits might arise from the sale would, of course, belong to you. You are the first to whom I have applied. Mr. Nicholls approves of the step I have taken, and could my daughter speak from the tomb I feel certain she would laud our choice.

Give my respectful regards to Mr. Gaskell and your family, and Believe me, my dear Madam,

Yours very respectfully and truly,

P. BRONTË.

We shall deal with this volume, which is admirably illustrated, at an early date.

We understand that the History of the Boer War now being issued in fortnightly parts by Messrs. Methuen, and noticed by us in another column, is being written by Mr. F. H. E. Cunliffe.

IN a well-reasoned article in the Cornhill Magazine, on "The Modern Parent," Mr. Stephen Gwynn stands up for old-fashioned methods in the training of children as against the kindergarten system and the advanced theories of the Sesame Club:

By Froebel's system even the rudiments are expressly prohibited till a child is six, and, so far as I can make out, reading is discouraged afterwards. A very clever parent was explaining to me not long ago that his very clever little son was not taught to read because little boys invariably put themselves into unhygienic attitudes over a book. They read doubled up, and that is bad for their digestions; or they read lying on their stomachs, and that is bad for their eyes. For my own part, I would risk the hygiene for the sake of the education. . . . It is rare for boys to go to school possessing anything that can really be called knowledge; but those who do have invariably got their knowledge by miscellaneous reading in books which they only half comprehended. It is not a habit that is acquired at school, where every hour has its fixed occupation—that is to say, that the average child has only five or six years, say from six to twelve, in which to form it. And I confess that I should be unwilling to postpone the chance of acquiring this habit even to the most scientific instruction in building bricks or in making mud-pies. In short, I would teach a child first of all how to read, because by teaching him to read you put him in possession of the employment which of all others is the most delightful to many children, and those the most intelligent; because you enable him to amuse himself quietly; and because you give him the best chance to find out what sort of things really interest him in life. You open the door to that cultivation of his own mind by himself which is the most important of all.

THE report of the Librarian of the Bishopsgate Institute for 1899-1900 has some interesting features besides its general cheerfulness. The library now contains more than twenty thousand volumes, and about nine thousand borrowers' tickets are in circulation. A list of the occupations of borrowers is curious, its peculiarities being fairly well represented in the following selection:

Beadle .....	1	Nurses .....	3
Barnmaids .....	8	Oil and Colourmen .....	3
Carman .....	1	Pew Opener .....	1
Cigar Sorter .....	1	Railway Guards .....	4
Commercial Clerks .....	2242	Railway Ticket Sorters ...	10
Solicitors' Clerks .....	177	Schoolmasters .....	4
Cook .....	1	Students .....	13
Editor .....	1	Tailors .....	8
Investigating Officer .....	1	Telegraphists .....	22
Lift Attendants .....	6	Valuer .....	1

The reference department of the library contains more than seven thousand volumes and a valuable collection of prints of old London.

MR. ALFRED W. BENNETT, who has been a subscriber to the ACADEMY from No. 1 (i.e., from 1869), suggests the following additions to the Bryant list of words wrongly used by many popular writers:

DO NOT USE	FOR

OF Edmond Rostand's home surroundings an interesting account is given by an "occasional correspondent" of the Daily News. And Rostand himself?

There is no portrait which one sees that gives the true Rostand. . . . The forehead now loftier than ever, the features are perhaps more pinched, and there is a wrinkle here and there. A cigarette between the fingers always. A nervous, tired, anxious air at all times, the shy look of the man who is self-centred, or, rather, always preoccupied with some ideal. A soft, low voice which in its rare moments rises rich and full, eloquent above others. No gestures. Only now and then a weary wave of the hand, as the fine head rolls from one side of the Voltaire chair to the other. An extreme, a polished courtesy. Manners which go better with the Louis XV. cartel than with the Louis XVI. furniture. In the sleepy eyes occasional flashes which show who there is behind this mask of extreme fatigue.

MR. J. POTTER BRISCOE, F.R.H.S., F.L.A., of the Central Free Library, Nottingham, writes: "For Mr. Sandwell's information, I may state that Ella Wheeler Wilcox was made known in England a quarter of the century ago. About January, 1875, there was published by Mr. Kempster a volume of temperance verses from that lady's pen. This was entitled Drops of Water, and had been previously published in New York under the same title—in 1872. At this period she was Miss Ella Wheeler. In 1884 she married Mr. Robert M. Wilcox, when she wrote under her husband's surname but retained both her maiden names.

Bibliographical.

PRACTICALLY no notice has been taken of the Dryden bi-centenary of Tuesday last. It is, indeed, permissible to doubt whether any interest is now taken in Dryden outside the boundaries of the cultured classes. His case is not like that of Cowper. "John Gilpin" is still read by children, and remembered by them when they grow up; possibly, too, the average man and woman has known and remembers something of The Task. But who reads Dryden? He is dead as a dramatist, though his "Secret Love" was revived for a single afternoon some few years ago, and though his "King Arthur," I fancy, was performed lately, somewhere, for the sake of the music which was written for it. Of the plays as a whole, the latest edition is that of Scott as edited by Mr. Saintsbury in 1882-93. That, I presume, is out of print. A selection from the plays would probably sell, but no one has attempted it. Of the poems there was a new edition so recently as 1893. Prior to that, the handiest was the "Globe" volume of Messrs. Macmillan. So lately as 1893 Mr. J. C. Collins edited the Satires. Of the critical essays a reprint is to be forthcoming shortly; if we except a reprint of the "Dramatic Poesy," we have had nothing of Dryden's prose since Prof. Morley republished a few Discourses in 1886. One proof of the lack of life in Dryden's work lies in the rarity of the critical comments it arouses. Of set criticisms of Dryden there have been, of late years, very few. Indeed, I am inclined to think that there has been no notable essay of the kind since Lowell wrote that which he afterwards included in Among My Books.

Of criticism of Milton, too, the literary world has not, of late years, been rife. Nearly every biographer of the poet—from Johnson and Hayley on the one hand, to George Gilfillan, James Montgomery, David Masson, W. M. Rossetti, Mark Pattison, and Dr. Garnett on the other—has indulged more or less in appreciative or depreciative pronouncement on his works; and we have, of course, the time-honoured dissertations of Addison, Coleridge, Channing, and so forth, to consider. But who is still the critic of Milton par excellence? Why, "good old" Macaulay, to be sure! No other commentator has made any abiding impression upon the public. His famous essay was reprinted last year, as it had been in 1896; its first separate issue was, I think, as far back as 1868. All of which goes to prove that Prof. Raleigh, in composing an estimate of Milton, and devoting a volume to it, is venturing into a field in which, among the later moderns, he has no very formidable competitor. I do not know that there is much that is novel to say about Milton; but if there are any new points to be urged, no doubt Mr. Raleigh is the man to discover them.

The new volume in Messrs. Gay & Bird's "Bibelot" series will consist, it seems, of The Wit and Wisdom of Sydney Smith. Will this be a new selection, or the reproduction of an old one? The first ever made was the work of an American, copies being circulated in this country in 1858. Two years later came what may be called the authorised collection of the Wit and Wisdom, which had, of course, a London publisher. Since then we have had a little book of selections edited by Mr. Ernest Rhys, and a collection of the Canon's bon mots printed with bon mots by Sheridan. There is room for an entirely new representation of Sydney Smith's wit and wisdom, but, to be adequate, it must considerably overpass the limits of a "Bibelot."

I have been able to do little more than glance at Mr. Lane's bibliography of Mr. Kipling; but I see that it has the great merit, not only of giving ordinary bibliographical information, but of supplying alphabetical lists of all the stories and the poems, with indications of the particular volume in which each of them is to be found. This will be extremely useful for purposes of reference. The bibliography comes down only to 1899; we cannot, therefore, blame Mr. Lane for omitting from his "Books Relating to Mr. Kipling" the Kipling Primer, which we owe to Mr. F. L. Knowles, and which has only lately appeared. Mr. Lane might, however, have noted the publication, at Birmingham, last year, of The Kipling Guide Book, a neat little compilation by Mr. William Robertson.

Very welcome, no doubt, will be Sydney Dobell's Home in War Time when it appears in Mr. Elkin Mathews's projected "Vigo Cabinet" series. Much, however, will depend upon the scope of the book. Why not give us the whole of England in War Time (published in 1856), and, along with it, Dobell's sonnets on the Crimean War (published in 1855)? We shall see what we shall see. Meanwhile, the reader may be reminded that the little book of Selected Poems by Dobell, included in the "Canterbury Poets" (1887), contains a very fair selection from Dobell's war poetry.

I asked the other day, parenthetically, whether William Black had introduced Shakespeare in person into his story called Judith Shakespeare. I have not been instructed on that point, nor have I had time to look into the book myself; but a correspondent tells me that at least the bard was not brought bodily into a play called "Judith Shakespeare," which was performed "some six or seven years ago" at one of the Stratford memorial performances. "The nearest approach to the actual Shakespeare," says my informant, "was the reading, by the poet hero from London, of extracts from the new play, 'The Tempest.'" I suppose this "Judith Shakespeare" play was that which the late Dr. Aveling based upon Mr. Black's romance, and which was produced at the Royalty Theatre, London, in 1894.

The same correspondent says: "I do not think Mr. Merivale's 'Lyrics of Pericles' could have been used [in the recent performance of 'Pericles' at Stratford]. I heard the play on the 28th inst., and cannot trace any resemblance in the lines you quoted to anything that I heard."

Doctrine and Doctrinal Disruption. By W. H. Mallock.
(Adam & Charles Black. 7s. 6d. net.)

ANGLICAN thinkers, says Mr. Mallock, are moving in a kind of mist. Of the four parties into which, according to him, the Church of England is divided, the Ritualist says that the Apostolic Succession is the one thing needful, "because by its means, and by its means alone, the clergy are invested with a species of miraculous power which enables them to renew the sacrifice of Christ's actual body and blood." The moderate High Church, represented on the same authority by Canon Gore, also thinks the Apostolic Succession essential, but declares that "the Church of England does not require any exact or explicit expression of belief in regard to it." On the other hand, the Bishop of Hereford, speaking for the Low Church, tells us that "the doctrine of a divinely ordered priestly authority [is precisely the error that] the Reformation really banished from our Church"; while the Broad Church, to quote a phrase that Mr. Mallock puts into its mouth rather than takes from it, thinks that "of all heresies the greatest and most deadly is that which would limit God's revelation of Himself to one age, or to one type of character, or to one system of thought." These are serious differences, and Mr. Mallock has no difficulty in finding others quite as serious, though it may be not so logically complete. Lord Halifax says, as Mr. Mallock puts it, that for "doctrinal Christians the Virgin-birth of Christ is the foundation of their whole religion"; but many other Christians quite as doctrinal think that the miraculous birth of Christ did not form part of the primitive Christian teaching. The High Church, and perhaps rather less vehemently the Low, still assert their belief in the miracles recorded (say) in the Gospel of Mark; but the Broad Church either try to explain them as distorted versions of natural events, or else flatly deny their belief in them altogether. Never, perhaps, has any religious body been so seamed and split as is the Church of England at the present moment by the diverse opinions of its members upon points which appear vital to the faith. At first sight it would seem impossible that a kingdom so divided against itself should stand.

By assigning the march of Biblical criticism as the ultimate cause of these divisions, Mr. Mallock has touched the point with a needle. When the (Reformed) Church of England first came into existence, the direct inspiration of the Bible and its function as the last appeal of Christians were so universally admitted that no party in the Church ever thought of disputing them. Mr. Mallock might well indeed have strengthened his case in this respect by quoting the XXth Article, wherein it is said that "although the Church be a Witness and a Keeper of Holy Writ, yet as it ought not to decree anything against the same, so besides the same ought it not to enforce anything to be believed for the necessity of salvation." And that this inspiration was held to extend to the letter as well as to the spirit of the text no one who knows the state of learning at the time of the Reformation can reasonably doubt. But now that the cause of criticism, after much hard fighting, has triumphed all along the line, the situation has entirely changed. "The most decisive step of all," Mr. Mallock quotes with approval from Prof. Harnack, "was taken when it was agreed that the understanding and the exposition of the Old and New Testaments were neither to be regulated by any 'creed' nor be allowed, out of regard to the sacredness of the text, to make use of other methods than those universally recognised in the spheres of philology and history." And the use of these methods has resulted, to quote Mr. Mallock's summary of the Dean of Canterbury's utterance, in the Bible being put before us, "not as a book, but as a body of religious literature whose various parts were produced, under widely different circumstances, by men who differed in knowledge and were in different frames of mind; and every part represents the peculiar circumstances of its composition—the education and temper of its author, the ideas and the superstitions of his time, and the sort of opportunities he possessed of acquainting himself of the events described by him." The last appeal of Christians, in fact, has transformed itself into a sort of lucky bag out of which you may draw the truth or you may not. "We cannot," says the Dean of Canterbury, "accurately say that the Bible is the Word of God," but only that "it contains the Word of God." Mr. Mallock does not over-state his case when he tells us that the "inspired and infallible portions [of the Bible] can convey to us no instruction till some authority altogether outside the Bible is able to tell us which these infallible portions are."

Where this authority should in his judgment be looked for no one who remembers the note first struck by Mr. Mallock in his New Republic can doubt. The case for doctrinal Christianity is, he tells us, not hopeless. The Church of Rome "is most clearly shown to be the one Christian body still possessing the means of presenting Christian doctrine to the modern world as a body of truths supported by a system of definite proof, and [sic] destined, like other truths, to develop as knowledge widens." Hence it behoves every Anglican who finds his soul vexed by the complete overthrow of the authority which he has hitherto found sufficient to him, to get himself cured of his heresy without delay, and to come to the motherly arms of her who can alone give him rest.

Rome is the only Church representing itself as an ever-living and articulate individual, which at no period of its existence has lost any one of its faculties, but is able every day to reaffirm, with a living voice, every doctrine which it has ever authoritatively enunciated in the past—to reaffirm it now in virtue of the same supernatural knowledge; and to re-affirm it, moreover, with an ever-deepening meaning.

Such is the cup of allurements which she of the Seven Hills extends to her admirers by the hands of her self-constituted messenger Mr. Mallock. Of the consequences of its acceptance we need not speak; but it may be as well to say something about the argument under cover of which it is put forward.

Now, with great part of Mr. Mallock's case we have no serious quarrel. Some exception might, indeed, be taken to the nature of his evidence; and we are not sure that he is always right in the parts he assigns to his adversaries. It is not the noisiest spokesmen who are generally the best accredited, and we do not exactly see on what principle Lord Halifax is singled out as the typical representative of the High or Mrs. Humphry Ward of the Broad Church. Neither do we believe that, as Mr. Mallock says, "many Christian bodies are abandoning doctrinal Christianity" altogether. But we are much inclined to believe that the very outspoken language of the Higher Critics has at last produced its effect within the Church of England, and that the issue of a work like Canon Cheyne's Biblical Cyclopædia, for instance, is a sign that some of its most learned members have either accepted or are preparing themselves to accept Prof. Harnack's shibboleth. We may even go further, and say that we see no logical means of escape from Mr. Mallock's argument that, by the undermining of the authority of the Bible, Anglicanism has lost its chiefest sanction. But does it follow from this that all Anglicans should, therefore, throw in their lot with the Church that Mr. Mallock represents, or that they would be any better off if they did? For Prof. Harnack's critical method is quite as destructive of the Roman position as it is of the Anglican. The claim that Rome has authority to pronounce upon the faith to be attached to the Bible rests, Mr. Mallock tells us, upon unbroken tradition; but what wild work would not the Higher Criticism make among these same traditions! Are we to be driven from our belief in the Virgin Birth to take shelter behind the Petrine claims, or to abandon the miracles of Mark for those of Eginhard? As it is, the one tradition which the Higher Criticism has shown to have been universal in the ante-Nicene Church—viz., the nearness of the Second Advent—has been proved, not by the critics, but by the facts, to be false.

We think, also, that Mr. Mallock is wrong in attributing to the question such extreme urgency as he would wish to do. Biblical criticism, whether within or without the pale of Christianity, is in itself no new thing; and Marcion, Cardinal Cajetano, and Voltaire each in his turn exposed the inconsistencies of the Old Testament long before the German school of criticism was born to set us all right. Yet the Churches have always shown themselves very slow in abandoning their entrenched positions; and nothing could well be more inept in this regard than Canon Gore's unfortunate remark (several times quoted by Mr. Mallock) that the changes produced by the adoption of a scientific Biblical criticism are as great as "the changes involved in the acceptance of the heliocentric theory." When we consider that, fifty years after the establishment of the Reformed religion in this country, Lord Bacon, who was surely one of the most learned and logical of Protestants, is found strenuously denying the heliocentric theory of Copernicus, which his no less logical and nearly as learned co-religionist Sir Isaac Newton was the first to make really popular a hundred years later, we may be sure that it will be some time before the Church of England feels herself called upon to find her way out of the dilemma stated, on the whole with fairness, by Mr. Mallock. When she does—and we may venture to think that this will probably not be until the sufficiently technical theories of the Higher Critics have filtered down from the few educated and interested Anglicans who are now grappling with them to the less informed and more indifferent masses who form the bulk of the Anglican as of every other Church—we think her leaders may be trusted to find a way for her, and that it will not be that indicated by Mr. Mallock. In no irreverent sense do we say: "Il y a toujours des accommodements avec le ciel."

South Africa and the War.

The Relief of Ladysmith. By J. B. Atkins. (Methuen 6s.)

Besieged by the Boers. By E. Oliver Ashe. (Hutchinson.)

The History of the Boer War. Parts 3, 4, and 5. (Methuen. Each 1s.)

SOMEONE will doubtless draw up a statistical statement of the amount of printed descriptions of the present war in South Africa which have been, and will be, offered to the public. At present one is conscious of a mighty flood without being able readily to compute its volume. First come the fateful dispatches of generals. Then the regulation-length telegrams of war correspondents. Then supplementary dispatches and lists of killed and wounded. Then now dispatches. Then long letters from the war correspondents amplifying the first-mentioned dispatches. Then, as the letters accumulate, they agglomerate in books—book after book; and still the nerve-wracking pom pom of new dispatches, new lists, new letters, goes on. And all this flow of intelligence in wavelets, waves, and tides is complicated by the fact that it reaches us from several theatres of war, and that the date of one set of intelligence may lag behind that of another. And ever the cisterns go on filling, filling—that is to say, books go on appearing, appearing. Strange backward gleams are thrown on events of the remote past at the very moment when the future is become keenly interesting. It is a hurly-burly, and the critic who can deal exhaustively with the literature of the war had need to devote his days and nights to its digestion. Even then he would be working under a conviction that the history of the war has not begun to be written.

In the meanwhile, then, the critic looks for idiosyncrasy, and is grateful for that—something that is different, and individual. Mr. John Black Atkins's book is full of such fresh wind. One had a good expectation that it would be so, for Mr. Atkins's War in Cuba struck its own note. His talent lies in giving the psychology and landscape of war; its little humanities and incongruities; the conversations that fill its grim pauses; the points of view of officer, private, enemy, and prisoner; the little by-dramas and odd touches that, told over a fire, make men hitch chairs nearer to the speaker. We do not suppose that we can, by extract—and that is the only method—do justice to Mr. Atkins's peculiar interestingness. We might quote his description of the scene when the Dunnottar Castle and the Australasian passed each other in mid-ocean, the one ship eager for news, the other able to give it. The Australasian hung out a big black-board on its rigging, with words written on it:

Would the letters never stop flickering in the end of one's glasses? The ship would be by in a moment, and why on earth hadn't she come nearer? But at last the words drew out and separated themselves from the continuous line of chalk. We read:

"Truce." Yes, "Truce." What, already?

No—"Three"; that was it—"Three."

"Three battles," so we read, catching the last words as the Australasia slipped past us—"Three battles; the Boers defeated; Symons killed." . . . We looked on the sea with enlightened eyes.

Of such salient anecdote the book is full. The talk of officers, privates, and telescope-men on a hill top, when every effort is being made to sight the enemy, is recorded with the fidelity of a phonograph. We are told how an unlicensed American correspondent is politely expelled from the camp; we are told how a Zulu driver—but this anecdote is too delightful to be merely mentioned. "I cannot help remembering," says Mr. Atkins, an incident which happened as that column wound past my tent, perhaps because it was one of these incidents which are trifling enough to seize the mind peremptorily on grand occasions. A Zulu driver lashed out with his long whip at his mules, and instantly let drop from his left hand, with a curious native cry of despair, that cherished Kaffir instrument, a concertina. The moving column moved on; "nor all the piety nor wit" of the Zulu could lure it back to recover the concertina. But the leader of the mounted company coming behind noticed the instrument lying on the ground. "Mind that concertina!" he shouted. "Pass the word!" He pulled his horse aside, the word was passed, a line of horses in the middle of the company swerved, the forest of legs passed, and, behold! the concertina lay untouched. The next company leader threw up his hand like a driver in the Strand. "Look out; mind the concertina!" "Mind the wind-jammer," said one man to another in tones (as they seemed) of deep personal resentment if a rider let his horse's hoofs go dangerously near the precious thing. And thus all the rest of the brigade past, hurrying on to use all the latest and most civilised means for killing men and destroying property, and minding the concertina tenderly as they went; so that when all the dancing sea of legs had passed over it the concertina still lay unscratched on the ground, and I picked it up and took it into my tent.

Well, the book is full of stories like that. There is comment and epigram too sown about the pages: "You might say that in this war the object of the Boer gunners is to kill an enemy who cannot see them; that of the heroic British gunners is to be killed by an enemy whom they cannot see." How good, too, is the criticism on Captain Reid's remark, when he was praised for his gallantry in saving the guns at Colenso. "Bosh!" he had said. "It was the drivers."

It was not true, and yet what can be finer to remember and admit that the basis of all individual distinction is the jeopardies and sacrifices of others; to remember that officers make themselves famous always a little by proxy. So long as our officers do remember and confess it, we need not fear that they live in inhuman relationship with their men.

We should like to quote and quote again from this most human record of General Buller's operations at the Tugela, and the relief of Ladysmith. Take a psychologically curious dialogue that Mr. Atkins heard when the relieved and the relievers met in Ladysmith, and the nightmare was over:

I overheard the greeting of one distinguished general to another.

"Well, how have you been getting on?" asked the besieged one.

"All right, thanks," was the answer, and a temporary silence followed. For a short time I was disappointed. Then I found half the explanation.

"Two months ago," said the officer, "the thing was a strain, but we got over that. Two months ago we were enthusiastic when we heard you were coming, but we got over that. Two months ago—" so he went on. Why, of course. . . . I felt as though I were in a place as unsubstantial as a shadow land—gaunt men greeted one with wisps of smiles, without violence of feeling; gaunt grooms combed gaunt artillery horses with the husks of the old assiduity.

That carries conviction; "drives like rain to the roots," as Mr. Meredith might say.

Dr. E. Oliver Ashe's book, Besieged by the Boers, is a light-hearted diary of the siege of Kimberley by a man who saw all that was best worth seeing from the book-making point of view. Not that the author intended its contents to be published. He wrote his diary, day by day, solely for his mother in England, its publication being an afterthought. It is, therefore, a free and easy, discursive, and individual record. The frontispiece portrait shows us the effect of a 100-lb. shell on a Kimberley parlour, but in the book shells are not taken too seriously. At first, the effects of the bombardment were ludicrous, but when the Boers brought their big gun to bear on the town caution became general; all the well-to-do people made forts and pits in their gardens, and the poorer people went down the mines at the invitation of Mr. Rhodes. Over two thousand were lowered into the Kimberley and De Beers mines, and brought up again after four days, without accident. Dr. Ashe tells us many interesting things about the food and health regulations enforced by martial law. The stringent method of meting out food to each family was mitigated by a permit system which aimed at the relief of invalids and weaklings; but this, Dr. Ashe declares, developed into a "perfect nuisance." The objection to horseflesh was almost invincible in many people, and soon "the talk all day was of food, and of the permits necessary to get it." Fragments of shell were much sought after and were kept to be made up into brooches, letter-weights, &c. "Immediately a shell had burst, and the dangerous moment past, everyone in the neighbourhood tore frantically towards it to pick up the pieces, for which there was a ready sale, and good pieces, such as the bottom or the conical point with the brass face on it, would fetch from one to two pounds." There is not a dull page in this timely, wholly unpretending book.

The flood of war books is itself a justification of the general History of the Boer War, now being issued in fortnightly parts by Messrs. Methuen. This publication co-ordinates the events and lessons of the war as far as these are understood up to the present time. Admirably illustrated, written with verve and insight, and published in a form which makes its acquisition easy, this history is an ideal book of its kind.

Leaves from a Squatter's Notebook. By Thomas Major. (Sands & Co.)

THIS is an interesting, even a valuable book. Told in a brief, business-like fashion, it neither is nor makes any claim to be literature; but it is worth a great deal that has more pretensions to style. The very absence of "dress" enhances the impression of severe truth and actuality. And the actuality has all the value of a chapter from the irrevocable past, which will soon have no survivors. The author, a squatter, who began his career in the early 'sixties, knew an Australia very different from the land of big modern cities, amiable colonial governors, and fashionable sun-shades variegating the ring wherein white-clad athletes swelter through five-day cricket matches—an Australia extinct as its own dodo. And what he knew he shows us. We ride through vast untracked country infested with hostile and bloodthirsty natives and still more hostile and bloodthirsty insects. Indeed, of the two varieties of aborigines the latter are the more consistently formidable. The unhappy horses push through kangaroo-grass up to their heads, and from the grass rise clouds and surges of mosquitoes, covering man and beast from head to foot—mosquitoes little, mosquitoes big and grey, but all equal in thirst for gore. And at any moment you may rouse, besides the flights of mosquitoes, a flight of spears. Even a tropical thunderstorm is no barrier to the attack of either species of native. Mr. Major describes one such incident during an exploring expedition into Queensland, accompanied by a white comrade and a civilised New South Wales black named Jerry. A terrific thunderstorm caused them to neglect their wonted nightly watch:

The palms bent their heads almost to the ground; the more sturdy pandanus stood erect, parting by hundreds with their dry sharp-pointed swords as they were wrenched from the stem and hurled into the air. Then came the rain! Heavens! how it did rain that night! First came big steaming drops, which, as each lightning-flash shone upon them, had the appearance of endless ropes of liquid silver. Then, as they became united, they were transformed into a torrent like a second deluge.

They were stripped to their shirts because of the heat, and a fire of green wood smoked in the tent, to drive away the mosquitoes who yet entered by swarms. In this defenceless posture Jerry heard the approach of natives, and the discharge of his carbine brought a chorus of yells, together with a whizzing of spears, out of the darkness. The foe were in the rear, a creek, with a big tree near it, in front; and to the big tree they fled, leaving guns behind.

We were crouching behind the sheltering tree; a few feet away was the creek; this and the tree protected us from the blacks and their spears, but it was the habitation of an equally dangerous foe—the alligator with his fangs. Picture, if possible, the position of us three poor wretches. We had beaten a retreat from our tent, each clothed only in a Crimean shirt; the few feet of earth on which we now were between the tree and the creek had become a steaming bog; the mosquitoes feasted in swarms, as they had an unlimited opportunity of doing, on our bodies. We dared not move to brush them off, and the rain again fell as only tropical rain can. Fortunately the lightning had ceased, . . . but we could not stir till break of day . . . The horror of that night I shall never forget.

But the blacks, thinking the explorers dead, from their silence, and too cowardly to search the tent till daylight, made no further attack. At daybreak the explorers returned to the tent, finding their guns dry and ready for use.

We had now no fear of our last night's assailants, and had time to turn our attention to the picture presented by our own persons. All the exposed parts—and few were not so—were red and swollen, as if we had been attacked by measles. Jerry's cuticle remained as ebon as ever, but it had suffered just the same amount of irritation. I shall never forget his expression as he burst into a loud laugh, saying: "Me think it close up all the same, like it skinned possum?"

On yet another occasion Mr. Major narrowly escaped the deadly consequences of flirtation with a Queensland beauty—guileful as Mother Eve. They surprised some girls fishing, and he at last encouraged (as he supposed) one of them to leave the water, holding in her hand a fish.

Then, like Mother Eve as regards clothing, she stood close by me and presented the fish. . . . In age she was about eighteen; her skin, a dark bronze, shone like a new penny. What attracted me most was the extreme beauty of her form. Every limb might have been a sculptor's model, so round and shapely were they, while her feet and hands were exquisitely proportioned. Her face showed her ivory-like teeth when she smiled, and was most pleasing.

He hung a small looking-glass round the dark lady's neck, and she, seating herself by him, began to pat his cheek. This Australian idyll was interrupted by a missile striking the log on which he sat, while a shout was heard from his friends, and two shots followed. Forthwith a throng of black men scudded off for the open country, and the charming Australian in their wake, as fast as she could go. The men had been ambushed under a loose sand-heap in his rear, with a piece of tree-bark over their heads for concealment. Out of this they rose, but his two friends behind saw and fired before more than one of the natives could throw his weapon. The moral is, that before flirting with a native Australian lady it is commendable to prod the sand-banks.

Mr. Major's book is full of incident and adventure, quotable and readable from cover to cover. It can be recommended to all who wish to know the wild Australia before the days of Spofforth and Murdoch, of flannel-clad cricketers and khaki-clad colonial cavalry.

"A Queen of Tears."

The Love of an Uncrowned Queen. By W. H. Wilkins. (Hutchinson & Co. 36s.)

THE title of this book is happily chosen; for the story of Sophie Dorothea of Celle, unloved consort of George Louis, Prince of Hanover, later George I. of England, was, in truth, the story of her love. The life of this "uncrowned queen" seemed "fused," as she herself once wrote, in her devotion to Philip Christopher, Count Königsmarck, the brilliant, unscrupulous Swede. "A once very radiant princess (witty, haughty-minded, beautiful, not wise or fortunate) now gone all ablaze into angry, tragic conflagration, getting locked into the old castle of Ahlden, in the moory solitudes of Lüneburg Heath, to stay there till she die—thirty years, as it proved—and go into ashes and angry darkness as she may." The story which Carlyle flashes on us Mr. Wilkins has here told at length. It is a tragic one—a brief, passionate drama of "disastrous bliss"; a long and dreary epilogue of two-and-thirty imprisoned years.

Sophie Dorothea was the offspring of a love marriage. Her mother, Eléonore d'Olbreuse, the daughter of a simple French marquis, was only themorganatic wife of George William, Duke of Celle, and thereafter rose, by a ten years' difficult ascent, to the position of his acknowledged duchess. Eléonore's portrait, that of a woman wise, ambitious, yet, withal, lovable, brings a welcome relief into these studies of the sordid vice and intrigue of the princely and electoral Courts of the seventeenth century. The Princess of Celle inherited much of the sensitive charm of her French mother, and was possessed of more waywardness than strength of will. She set herself passionately against the marriage planned for her by her father, but her child's vehemence—she was barely sixteen—was unavailing. The Electress Sophia, wife of Ernest Augustus of Hanover—an imperious, implacable lady, of whom we have here a convincing, though unattractive, portrait—came herself to Celle to settle the marriage which was to unite the two branches of the house of Brunswick-Lüneburg. "La Fraile" (so the Electress Sophia, with sinister prescience, dubbed the heiress of Celle long before political reasons had made her claim Sophie Dorothea as her son's bride) was, in truth, too fragile and too strong for her environment. She failed to find the position even of electoral princess sufficient compensation for an enforced marriage with a brutal and faithless husband. After a brief and faltering resistance, she turned with all the force of a pent-up nature to the adventurous Swedish soldier of fortune who had been her playmate in childish days at Celle. The story of their romance is told in the voluminous correspondence preserved in the University of Lund, which Mr. Wilkins has for the first time printed in full. Granting the authenticity of these letters, which seems, on the whole, probable, they form a curious human document, with their fluctuations which are, in the end, one monotony. There is the passion in which the soldier writes, in unsoldierly spirit enough: "The days seem weeks to me, the weeks like months, and the months centuries; and when I think that I have still two months of campaigning to go through before I see you, I despair, and pray a thousand times a day that I may be wounded in the fight, and so have a pretext for returning to Hanover—and to you." And the Princess responds prophetically: "Life without you would be intolerable, and imprisonment within four walls pleasanter than to go on living in the world." There is the jealousy which finds in a Court ball or the formal greetings given to an ambassador cause for volcanic reproaches and "torrents of tears."

"I have a consolation here," writes Königsmarck fiercely, "not a pretty girl, but a bear, which I feed. If you should fail me I will bare my chest and let him tear my heart out. I am teaching him that trick with sheep and calves. If ever I have need of him—God help me! I shall not suffer long." Then, more tenderly, "So long as a drop of blood remains in my veins my heart is wholly yours. You are all my wealth, my treasure; I would sacrifice the world to kiss your divine mouth. I hate war and everything which takes me from your side. One favour only I ask of the gods—that I may be always with you, in life and in death."

Nor is the Princess less fervent. "I learned on my awakening that a fearful battle has taken place and you were in it. My plight is pitiful; it seems to me that every gun is pointed at you. Grand Dieu! if any hurt were to happen to you, what would become of me? I should start at once for the camp, hasten to give you all necessary care and attention, and never leave you more. If it be true that you love me, spend the rest of your life with me; let us build up a happiness in each other which none can shatter."

The love is all absorbing and all exclusive. Sophie never mentions her children, and her devoted mother is regarded by turns as a convenience and hindrance. Great events of war and peace slip by unnoted unless they affect the chance of a stolen meeting. In the Count's rhapsodies an occasional grossness mingles with the ardour, and his extravagance leads us to doubt the permanence of his passion, to question whether, had Sophie Dorothea attained to her heart's desire, a final union with him, she might not have experienced as great a disillusion as "La Grande Mademoiselle" with her adored Lauzun. But Sophie's letters reveal a pure as well as a passionate nature, however sadly astray.

The closing catastrophe is tragic in the truest sense of the word, for it was directly consequent on Königsmarck's criminal intrigue with the Countess Platen, the malignant enemy of the Princess. It was through the relentless watchfulness of this woman, the all-powerful mistress of Ernest Augustus, the Elector, that the Count was at last trapped on his way from the apartments of his "divinity" and killed in resisting arrest. His death, on the very eve of final flight and reunion, shows him at his best, borne down by odds, in the midnight silence of the palace, with a plea for the "innocent Princess" on his dying lips.

Thereafter came Sophie's divorce, for desertion merely, to save the Hanoverian pride, the Princess making no resistance. She was imprisoned in the Castle of Ahlden—Duchess of Ahlden being thenceforth her title—and there held, despite all efforts made for her release, while her husband went forth to claim that other title of King of England. For thirty-two years she watched the mists roll on and draw away across the marsh, waiting in vain for liberty, till she received it at the hands of death. Often betrayed, she was never wholly embittered, never bowed by the "dust accumulate" of her destiny. The wild speed at which she was wont to drive up and down the six-mile limit allowed her, bears witness to her prisoned vitality, while the diamonds which, on such desolate progresses, never failed to sparkle in her dark hair give a fine flash of defiance. So she lived, charitable to the poor of her little domain, resistant to her oppressors; so she died—November 13, 1726—leaving her husband to perish, it was said, of superstitious terror at her fate, and her son to ascend that throne of England.

The book is evidently a work of thorough research, and the style is lucid and sympathetic, though never attaining to distinction. The author displays a weakness for well-worn phrases, the edge of which has become dulled by use, and indulges in an occasional startlingly mixed metaphor. These, however, are slight blemishes in a vivid presentment of one of the most pathetic figures of the House of Hanover.

Our Lady of the Snows.

The Great Company (1667-1871). By Beckles Willson. With an Introduction by Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal. (Smith, Elder & Co. 18s.)

THOUGH happily free from the scourge of war herself, Canada has, by the contingents she has sent to South Africa, vindicated her place as the eldest daughter of the Empire, and it is therefore at a fitting moment that Mr. Beckles Willson undertakes to tell the story of the Great Company. This, the Hudson's Bay Company, was, as Mr. Willson puts it, "the one original pillar remaining in that New World mansion, which is at once the refuge of errant peoples and the theatre of discoveries, vicissitudes, and experiments," until its sovereign powers were merged in the Empire and it ceased its independent existence. The Honourable Company of Merchants Adventurers Trading into Hudson's Bay was an aftermath of the Elizabethan epoch, belated indeed, as it was not founded until Charles II. came to the throne. Then the spirit of Imperial expansion, which had been chilled by the Puritan sway, burst forth again; London swarmed with adventurers, and every London tavern and coffee-house resounded with projects for conquest, trade, or the opening-up of remote regions.

For two centuries the tide of commercial speculation had set eastwards, and men's minds had been filled with the fabulous riches of the gorgeous East. But when the king came back there was little room for new men east of Suez, for the East India Company had for over half a century had a monopoly of trade in that part of the world. And so, perforce, the merchant-adventurers turned to other fields of action, and set their faces towards the setting sun, towards that Continent of North America of which so little was known, and of which not much had been expected. In 1664 King Charles, with the easy generosity of those days, granted New England to his brother, the Duke of York, who in due time ousted the Dutch and changed New Amsterdam into New York. All this reminded other London merchants that in the frozen North the French drove a mighty fur trade, and that the Company of the Hundred Associates sent twice yearly from Quebec to Havre ships laden with the furs of Canada; but they recognised that the king would never countenance the expulsion of the French colonists as he had winked at the dislodgment of the Dutch.

But fate, as ever, turned the scale for England. In 1665 two intrepid fur traders, Groseilliers and Radisson, employés of the "Company of the Western Indies," who had pushed their way westwards from Quebec to the unknown shores of Lake Superior, arrived in Paris, after having failed to make the heads of the Company take up the project for the expansion of French influence into the North West. The two only met with equal ill-success in Paris, until at last Colonel Carr, who had spoken with them in America, introduced them to Lord Arlington, the British Ambassador, who in turn gave them a letter to Prince Rupert of the Rhine, prince of England and Bohemia, and patron of the Arts and Sciences. The prince introduced the adventurers to the king, and at last, on June 3, 1668, the Nonsuch, a ketch of fifty tons—for in such cock boats did our ancestors set out to conquer new worlds—sailed from Wapping under the command of Captain Zachary Gillam for the far off Hudson's Bay. Finally, on September 29, the adventurers cast anchor at the entrance to a river in 51° latitude. The journey was ended; a boat was lowered and Gillam and Groseilliers went ashore. The river was christened Rupert's River, and by the next spring the Indians had brought so many pelts that Gillam could sail away home with a good cargo to report on the excellent prospects to the Prince, leaving Groseilliers and some others behind.

Groseilliers' anticipations were realised, but not without almost incredible activity on his part. He spent the summer and autumn, and part of the ensuing winter, in making excursions into the interior. He made treaties with the Nodways, the Kilistineaux, the Ottawas, and other detachments of the Alconquin race. Solemn conclaves were held, in which the bushranger dwelt—with that rude eloquence of which he was master, and which both he and Radisson had borrowed from the Indians—on the superior advantages of trade with the English. Nor did his zeal here pause; knowing the Indian character as he did, he concocted stories about the English king and Prince Rupert; and many a confiding savage that year enriched his pale-face vocabulary by adding to it "Charles" and "Rupert," epithets which denoted that superlative twain to whom the French bushranger had transferred his labours and his allegiance. Chouart des Groseilliers in all his transactions with the natives exhibited great hardihood of speech and action; and few indeed were the occasions which caught him unawares. It happened more than once, for instance, that some of the wandering Alconquins or Hurons recognised in this smooth-tongued leader at the English fort the same French trader they had known at Montreal and the French posts on the Western lakes, and marvelled much that he who had then been loudly crying up "King Lewis and the Fleur-de-lis" should now be found surrounded by pale-faces of a different speech, known to be the allies of the terrible Iroquois. Groseilliers met their exclamations with a smile; he represented himself as profoundly dissatisfied with the manner in which the French traders treated his friends the Indians, causing them to travel so far and brave such perils to bring their furs and giving them so little in return. "Tell all your friends to come hither," he cried, "and King Charles will give you double what King Lewis gives."

This quotation gives a very fair idea of Mr. Beckles Willson's style, and also shows the slight uncertainty he labours under in the treatment of his subject. The romantic nature of the enterprise is so overwhelming that Mr. Willson appears to hesitate between romance and commonplace history in his telling of it. Indeed, the story of the Great Company has before now inspired the writers of fiction, and more than one writer of thirty years ago drew his best stories from the inexhaustible stores of the Company's records. Mr. Willson is an enthusiast on his subject, and, like so many men of Greater Britain, sees clearly the romantic side of the story of the Empire. He must be left to tell the remainder of the fascinating history himself. The charter of the Company was not granted till May 2, 1670, and gave to Prince Rupert and seventeen nobles and gentlemen the exclusive right to establish settlements and carry on trade at Hudson's Bay. As their operations spread they naturally came into collision with the French, who were by no means disposed to acquiesce tamely in another set of adventurers to the north. French and English fought on the shores of the great white bay as they fought at Blenheim and Malplaquet, and all through the eighteenth century the struggle continued, until it was finally settled in favour of the English and of the Hudson's Bay Company. The great corporation still exists, though in its old form it had lagged behind the years, and its acquisition by the Canadian Government was a necessity of the times. No sovereign in Europe had a clearer right to his dominions than the Company, but, unlike the "John Company," it was a king without an army, and lacked the military system which is the indispensable adjunct to sovereign authority. The rebellion of Riel and the Métis was the finishing stroke, and Canada in 1870 acquired two million three hundred thousand square miles of territory for a payment of £300,000, the Company being at liberty to carry on its trade in its corporate capacity without hindrance.

On the whole, Mr. Willson has done his work well, but the book would be improved by compression. Occasionally the story is overloaded with detail which, however necessary to the full record of the Company, appears superfluous in an account which is probably not intended to be exhaustive. Now and then there is also a lack of lucidity, and the narrative branches off to side issues which rather obscure the main subject. But this is by the way. The book is well illustrated with portraits, and with a most interesting facsimile of the original charter granted by Charles II. A competent index also adds to the value of the work, which will be welcome to Canadians and to all those who have interests in Canada.

A LIST OF ENGLISH PLAYS WRITTEN BEFORE
1643, AND PRINTED BEFORE 1700.

BY WALTER WILSON GREG.

This scientific and careful "hand list" will be of the greatest value to all students of the "Elizabethan" drama, and will largely supersede such earlier compilations as Halliwell-Phillipps's Dictionary of Old Plays, or Mr. W. C. Hazlitt's Manual for the Collector and Amateur of Old English Plays. The assistance which Mr. Greg has received from such bibliographical experts as Mr. A. W. Pollard and Mr. R. G. C. Proctor would of itself be adequate guarantee of the accuracy of his work. The list is conveniently arranged under an alphabet of authors' names, and the title-pages are given, with certain carefully explained exceptions, in full. The press marks of the British Museum copies, and notes of the chief collections in which copies of each edition may be found, are added. Masques and similar productions are excluded. We are a little sorry that no attempt has been made to indicate the nature of the publishers' marks or vignettes used on the title-pages. These are often of some value in tracing the literary history of Elizabethan plays. We are glad to see that

Mr. Greg contemplates "a full bibliography of the English drama up to the closing of the theatres during the Civil War." (Bibliographical Society.)

A HISTORY OF GREECE:

Part III.

BY EVELYN ABBOTT, M.A., LL.D.

The first volume of Dr. Evelyn Abbott's History of Greece appeared in 1888. The present one covers the last half of the fifth century, from the "Thirty Years' Peace" to the fall of the "Thirty Tyrants" at Athens, and yet another will bring the narrative to the death of Alexander the Great. Dr. Abbott has many of the qualities of an historian—accuracy, industry, a wide acquaintance with all that has been published, in Germany as well as in England, upon his subject. There is no more convenient, trustworthy or authoritative Greek history to put on your shelves than his. But, unfortunately, it is not "written," and consequently it cannot be read. The pedestrian and colourless narrative is not stung into passion or picturesqueness even by the tragedy of Syracuse or the death of Socrates. The book must be a book of reference while its erudition lasts, and must then miss the future which for Thucydides and even Thirlwall the saving grace of style will ensure. (Longmans.)

CORREGGIO.

BY SELWYN BRINTON.

Mr. Brinton, in his Renaissance in Italian Art, has already shown himself well qualified to deal with such a topic as Correggio, and the present monograph is evidently the fruit of careful and appreciative study, both of the painter and of what has been written about him. To our private taste, indeed, it is a little lyric in its tone. Certainly we demur to putting Correggio, great as he is, on a level with Leonardo, Raphael, and Michelangelo, as one of the "four personalities, most potent in their claim," of Renaissance art. And throughout the enthusiasm is surely a little indiscriminating, a little untempered by consideration of the fairly obvious defects and deficiencies in the art dealt with. The knowledge, however, is undeniable, and the criticism good as far as it goes. Mr. Brinton is particularly happy in his attempt to sum up and express the total effect of Correggio's personality side by side with those of contemporary painters. He represents, in painting, the side of the Renaissance which the Decameron represents in literature:

That is the joy and gladness of life itself, the beauty and happiness of the world, and of all that is living in its sunlight. That is part, too, of the spirit of the Renaissance; that is the smile on the face of awakening Italy, and that is the message of Correggio.

And again:

It is to Correggio that we turn most of all for a quickened sense of life, of its light and laughter, its throbbing pulse, and its radiant possibilities. He is the Faun of the Renaissance, the creature, we might fancy, to whose pointed, furry ears it should be given to hear old Pan pipe his maddening music, who shall feel the stream of life in its most intimate and quickening sense.

As in most of the volumes of this series, the list of paintings and drawings in the appendix is all that could be desired, and the illustrations are many and excellent. ("Great Masters": Bell.)

THE LIFE OF JOHN RUSKIN.

BY W. G. COLLINGWOOD.

Seven years ago Mr. Collingwood's authoritative Life and Work of John Ruskin was published in two volumes. The present book is not a reprint of that work, but a newly-written biography. Mr. Collingwood, who knew Mr. Ruskin as intimately as anyone and acted for years as his secretary, completed the book, all save the last chapter, while its subject was still living, but the last chapter was added after his death. The biography is well arranged, a pleasant blend of personal impression and historical fact. It is also well published. (Methuen. 6s.)

Fiction.

The Novel of Passion.

The Dean of Darrendale. By Wynton Eversley. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

The Acrobat. By John D. Barry. (Lane. 6s.)

Sour Grapes. By J. F. Cornish. (Chatto. 6s.)

The Strong God Circumstance. By Helen Shipton. (Methuen. 6s.)

IN a sense nearly all novels are novels of passion. Love is the most radiant of all the emotions, and, on the whole, the most easily communicated by suggestion. Mere names—e.g., Barbara and Elise—employed by Mr. Cornish and Mr. "Eversley," have power to create in the reader a mood akin to that known as "falling in love." One might indeed justify the existence of novels solely on the ground that they provide harmless hunting fields for persons of a nature more inquisitive than faithful. It is very easy to fall in love with the heroine of a novel, but it is impossible to make love to her.

The four novels before us all provide heroines with whom any male reader can fall in love. Mr. "Eversley" gives us a beautiful altruist with a criminal husband. Mr. Barry places his Blanche, fragile, pure and tender, in the dizzy world of trapezes and aerial diving. Miss Shipton brings Nature's lady—young, ignorant, and refined—into juxtaposition with the Acme of Culture, in the person of a university coach who lies unjustly under suspicion of fraudulent conduct. In all these cases the element of incongruity arrests the attention. It is to explore that we read. To what extent is a criminal still a husband? Does anything of the charm that won for him a woman's love survive or, perchance, reside in his criminality? What again are the joys and pains which differences of education and birth produce in the life of a married pair? Let us say at once that both Mr. "Eversley" and Miss Shipton suggest questions without answering them. The case with Mr. "Eversley" is particularly sad. There is a sort of uncouth greatness about his book. Parson James Salter, Rural Dean, is a memorable character-study. His phrases are jewels. "It is easier to get to the Empyrean than to the heart." "You say you have 'turned your heart inside out.' Yes, but did you ask God to do the sorting?" These are two of them. But phrases are the least part of him. He is the wind. He brushes aside dignity—his detractors would say decency—with insolent scorn. He writes letters like those which parsons received from Ruskin when they asked him to subscribe towards the remission of the debts on their churches. As a spiritual doctor he is all lancet and forceps, but he is everything to a few rustics. Mr. "Eversley" is as full of him as Boswell was of Johnson. He has more to tell than he has room for. The Dean of Darrendale is, indeed, a history tacked on to a romance. But, alas! it is the romance that fits into the purpose of this article, and we cannot but shake our head to see a brave and clever writer resorting to wretched threadbare devices to bring two creatures of his fancy together without sacrificing current morality. His convict must die. But he is the husband of the heroine. Therefore let him end gloriously. So he escapes gaol like another Casanova in time to save his wife and child from perishing in the wreck of the Cassandra! In Sour Grapes it is an unhistorical vessel that goes down—the Perth Castle. Why? It is quite simple. The hero, the noble Captain Brabrooke, who has married the wrong woman in order to save the family honour, must be recalled to England (whence he has fled to avoid living with his wife, who adores him) in time to assist at a dénouement of surprising cheerfulness. Even the "sour grapes" turn sweet. They consisted in two lovers scorning the marriage sacrament and living without benefit of clergy. A terrible situation was evolved therefore when the masculine element of this union turned into a Lothario in his middle life. What would Guy de Maupassant have done? It is not for English readers to care; they are not in the hands of an inexorable artist. They are not in the hands of one who cares a pin for psychology. They are in the hands of a conjuror, an ingenious mechanic. We know nothing in burlesque more provocative of an admiring "ha! ha!" than the abrupt disclosure of the Scotch marriage which saves the "children" in Sour Grapes from dying with their teeth on edge. And what cynic would dare to disturb the happiness of George and his Barbara by sneering at the release from bondage obtained by the former through the legal objection to a man's marrying his half-aunt?

And yet would the rosy god tell us that passion died in a woman immediately she found she was a half-aunt? Would we not rather see those blind eyes shedding tears? Mr. Cornish serves his age and country prettily; he is both naïf and knowing; he writes freshly. The drama, centering in the squires whose husband runs frantically off the rails of propriety, is full of pathos.

Passion receives of choice heroic exemplification in the English novel; and if the cheap optimism could be left out of it the English novel might prove effective in calming many a selfish paroxysm. But, even in a novel expressly entitled The Strong God Circumstance, English sentimentality insists on making the vinegar of sorrow into a kind of mint sauce by the aid of sugar. There is a man in The Strong God with a distorted face. He pains the eye. Wherefore he is accorded one of the most wilful and engaging girls in the world for helpmeet. Is that the way of life? Is not intellectually the problem of such a man: "How shall I erect myself a stronghold of peace without woman's love?" If it be true that truth is stranger than fiction it is because fiction is ordered by the artist to obey the innate fitness of destiny, to grow naturally, to justify its premises. In England fiction is stranger than truth.

That passion is interesting as a growth and uninteresting as a consummation is a dictum of which it is considered in England the height of good form to admit the truth. "Naturalism is dull," sounds the same as saying "we have tried it." "Naturalism is disgraceful" sounds like saying "we are afraid of it." As a matter of fact, we are afraid of it, and passion glows and palpitates in our novels with a sort of chromographic glory. The flesh is absent except in the horrible eyes of our villains. Hence we feel drawn to note a fleeting glimpse of the identity between villain-passion and even so exquisite an emotion as hero-passion, which Mr. "Eversley" affords us through his inimitable Dean. "Alas, poor calf! It was in love, and it thought it was going to enjoy itself, did it? and—and—it was disappointed, was it?" he says to the Rev. "Tummas" Trevana. But in The Acrobat the voice accusing passion is the voice of life itself. It is action that is eloquent. Mr. Barry, alone among the four writers we have been considering, relates a simple story, unencumbered with plot and rich with a single idea out of which it grows naturally. A man falls in love with a performance instead of the performer. He has all the words of passion at his command. "If you'll only love me a little, dear, I'll be satisfied." But it is not she he wants. It is the "cynsure of all eyes"; it is the poetry of motion, the music of fantastic courage. And all the time it is just a delicate woman who sits there on the trapeze afraid lest a single slip should orphan her babe. Mr. Barry, without noise, with simple artistry, has done something that lives. He has shown us passion in the right perspective. Yet there is another way to show passion. The magnificence and the joy of the Grand Déciviliser were a theme which, to treat adequately, would make a monarch of a writer. We must wait for that writer.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE CARDINAL'S SNUFF-BOX. BY HENRY HARLAND.

Mr. Harland's distinguished touch is very apparent when one opens this novel and finds Peter Marchdale talking books and art with his landlady. His landlady, it should be explained, is the Duchessa di Santangiolo, and Peter is the tenant of her Villa Floriano. The Duchessa "'lives there, at Castel Ventirose,' Marietta explains as she removes the coffee things; 'she owns all, all this country, all these houses—all, all.' 'All Lombardy?' said Peter, without emotion." The emotion comes later, the Cardinal with it. Mr. Harland's chapters are not as other men's. His fourth consists of ten lines, his twelfth of sixteen pages. (John Lane. 6s.)

THE MINX. BY "IOTA."

A clever novel by Mrs. K. Mannington Caffyn, author of A Yellow Aster, &c. Joyce, the heroine, proves to be anything but a minx, the name given to her before she came as a guest to Squire Hallows's house. She is a most attractive creation, subjugating all who meet her, and especially James and Jock. The story traces her development, and describes, brightly and with skill, the intense but friendly rivalry of Jock and James for her love. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

IN THE WAKE OF THE WAR. BY A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK.

Mr. Adcock's stories of East End life have shown a real grip of humble life, its humours and sorrows. And here we have, by a happy inspiration, a series of pictures of the unwritten humours, rivalries, and tragedies of life in mean streets incident to the recent calling out of the reserves, and the war fever. The story called "A Boer in Britain" is an admirably humorous account of a fatuous, inconsequential, patriotic row in a barber's shop, which threatened to be serious, but ended in an awkward pause, broken only by the barber's call, "Naixt, please!" (Hodder & Stoughton. 2s. 6d.)

LOTUS OR LAUREL. BY HELEN WALLACE.

This story is concerned with the unborn musical talent and desire for fame in a young girl whose mother, warned by her own experiences of professional life, wishes her to give up her violin and her dreams. As the story proceeds it develops a strong motive—the bitter jealousy which a mother, wedded to success, feels toward the daughter who is about to eclipse her in public favour. (Arnold. 6s.)

A SECOND COMINO. BY RICHARD MARSH.

Mr. Marsh is the author of The Beetle, Tom Ossington's Ghost, and other novels, and he has imagined himself competent to write a story founded on the idea that Christ had come to London. Christ suddenly appears in Bryanston-square, in the midst of a crowd collected by a fatal bicycle accident. "He inclined His hand toward the dead man, saying: 'Arise, you who sleep.' Immediately he that was dead stood up. He seemed bewildered, and exclaimed as in a fit of passion: 'That's a nice spill. Curse the infernal slippery road!' Then he turned and saw Who was standing at his side." From this Mr. Marsh proceeds to other intrepidities. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

THE DEVIL AND THE INVENTOR. BY AUSTIN FRYERS.

Inventors may enjoy a story in which an inventor sells himself more or less to the Devil. The bargain provides that Philbrick shall be given the power to place his ideas before the public. But if within three weeks of the exhibition of one of his inventions it has not yielded him £250, the Devil is to exact a cupful of his blood. Philbrick begins with a Soundless Piano. (Pearson Ltd. 3s. 6d.)

FAST AND LOOSE. BY MAJOR ARTHUR GRIFFITHS.

This is Major Griffiths's usual blend—a good one in its way—of love, crime, and detection. Inspector Faske is a satisfying detective of the cat-like order. "His grey moustachois, brushed out straight, might have belonged to a veteran mouser accustomed to pounce promptly on its prey." (Macqueen. 6s.)

HIS LORDSHIP'S LEOPARD. BY DAVID DWIGHT WELLS.

A readable absurdity by the author of Her Ladyship's Elephant. We have a tissue of strange events, including the abduction of a bishop and the supposed visit of a Spanish gunboat to English shores during the Spanish-American war. The author is right in insisting that this "serious attempt to while away an idle hour" is not "a fit subject for the application of the higher criticism." But the idle hour is whiled. (Heinemann. 6s.)

LYONA GRIMWOOD, SPINSTER. BY L. HIGGIN.

Those who like tangles for their own sake will like untangling the identity of Lyona Grimwood, who begins by being murdered, then disappears, and becomes someone else, while remaining Lyona Grimwood. We leave the plot to the tangle-loving reader, promising him, however, some entertaining character-sketches of the gossips and old maids of a Midland town. (Pearson Ltd. 6s.)

A YOUNG DRAGON. BY SARAH TYTLER.

Mrs. Tytler's latest story grows out of a bet made by a self-satisfied Scottish laird, who is past his youth, that he will woo and marry a wife within a month. Despite this promise of farce the story takes hold of the reader, and the end is touching. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

WAYWARD HEARTS. BY DARBY RYAN.

A novel for young girls. "Truth to tell, all Nature seems rejoicing this glorious June afternoon . . . the old Manor. . . . 'Helen, your tea is delicious,' remarked Hugh. . . . There had never been such a brilliant season, never so much talk over a young debutante before . . . the old Manor.' . . . 'All that wealth and luxury can buy you shall have.' . . . Ah, it was a happy birthday for the poor . . . the old Manor." (Digby, Long & Co. 6s.)

AN AMERICAN COUNTESS. BY MRS. URBAN HAWKESWOOD.

Here we have the mercenary marriage of a young English lord clashing with his love of another woman, an artist. A readable, highly unconventional story. (Macqueen. 6s.)

THE SEAFARERS. BY JOHN BLOUNDELLE-BURTON.

Its title exactly fits this story by the author of The Clash of Arms. A hearty, thoroughly readable tale of the sea, in which shipwreck and sunshine answer to the unsmooth course of love. (Pearson Ltd. 6s.)

THE EMPIRE MAKERS. BY HUME NISBET.

A romance of adventure and war in South Africa. The author leaves the reader in no doubt about his views. He regrets that it is too soon for him to show the reader "the wind-up of the vile oligarchy of Pretoria tyrants." However, the story stretches to the relief of Kimberley, and the writer distributes phrases like "the iniquitous and false Boer," the "most inhuman and bloody-minded Kruger," "this Cronje, the vile and brutal murderer." (White & Co. 6s.)

FROM VELDT CAMP FIRES. BY H. A. BRYDEN.

Fourteen short stories of life in South Africa by a writer who has written many books on this part of the world. The stories deal with Boer and native life, colonists, border police, &c., and they "may be said to be well founded upon actual circumstance." (Hurst & Blackett. 3s. 6d.)

The Balzac Letters Controversy.

THE outline of Balzac's passion for Mme. Hanska, a passion conceived and executed (if we may use the term) in the grand romantic manner by a master of that manner, is fairly well known to the public. The inmost and secret nature of it, at all points of its progress, has perhaps not yet been finally ascertained. In 1896 M. le Vicomte de Spoelberch de Louvenjoul published his version of it in Un Roman d'Amour, a work which was received with the respect due to the author's unchallenged position as the first living authority on the facts of Balzac's life. M. de Louvenjoul's Histoire des Œuvres de Balzac, we may recall in passing, constitutes practically the twenty-fifth volume of the great Calmann Lévy édition définitive of Balzac's works, and when he speaks other students are accustomed to listen, as barristers listen to a judge. A large part of Balzac's letters to Mme. Hanska were included in his Correspondance, the twenty-fourth volume of the édition définitive; but last year M. de Louvenjoul (though his name does not appear on the title-page of the book) gave to the world, under the title Lettres à l'Étrangère, what purports to be a full collection of all existing letters from "Noré" to the cara contessina, up to the death of the cara contessina's husband.

If this collection is authentic—and both M. de Louvenjoul and the house of Calmann Lévy (in their communication to us of the 4th ult.) vouch for its absolute authenticity—then Un Roman d'Amour is more or less justified, and Balzac stands revealed as a man even as other Frenchmen are. But here arrives Miss Katharine Prescott Wormeley, and with breath-taking intrepidity roundly asserts that many of the letters have been tampered with in order to bring them into line with Un Roman d'Amour, and that a number of them are "infamous forgeries." Miss Wormeley,* we should mention, is probably the chief English-speaking authority on Balzac. She has translated all his novels; she has written an exhaustive Memoir of him; she has collected his "personal opinions"; and everything that she writes about him abundantly shows that she is a thorough expert. Further, she is a woman of experience; she witnessed the entry of Napoleon's remains into Paris on December 15, 1840, and she evidently knows her France. In remembering the claims of M. de Louvenjoul, we must not forget those of this venerable and distinguished scholar.

It is a pity that with knowledge does not always come the skill to handle it. Miss Wormeley states her case badly. There is scarcely a sentence in the "fighting" preface to her translation of the impugned letters, scarcely a note of hers in all the seven hundred and fifty-five pages of the volume, which does not betray the absence of the true editorial temperament—at once nimble and sedate, enthusiastic and judicial, and always impassively and inexorably polite. She bewilders where she should convince; she relieves Kimberley when she should be marching direct to Pretoria; she gets angry; she utters an exclamation instead of a demonstration; she talks darkly of conspiracies; she is offended; she is indignant; and, venial yet most annoying sin, she neither numbers the letters nor provides an index. The French edition is numbered, but not indexed.

But she has a primâ facie case—that is the wonderful part of it all; she has a case to support her double charge against M. de Louvenjoul of sensualising and degrading Balzac's gorgeous passion and of being a party to the garbling and inventing of documents. Very briefly, her case is as follows:

In the volume of Correspondance (1876) an editorial note states that the correspondence with Mme. Hanska, as there given, is not complete. "Unfortunately," the note runs, "a part of this correspondence was burned in Moscow in a fire which occurred in Mme. Hanska's residence. It must, therefore, be remarked that in the letters of this series two or three gaps occur, all the more regrettable because those which escaped the fire present a keen interest." In spite of this clear statement, no explanation is offered in Lettres à l'Étrangère (1899) of the manner in which the epistles lacking in 1876 were redeemed from their alleged combustion. A brief footnote to the first letter merely mentions the name of M. Louvenjoul, "entre les mains de qui sont les originaux de ces lettres." This same footnote says that Balzac inserted an acknowledgment of Mme. Hanska's first letter in the Quotidienne of December 9, 1832. But in a letter dated January 1, 1846, Balzac writes to Mme. Hanska:

One year more, dear, and I take it with pleasure, for these years, these thirteen years which will be consummated in February on the happy day a thousand times blest when I received that adorable letter, starred with happiness and hope, seem to me links indestructible, eternal. The fourteenth will begin in two months.

This would apparently make the date of the first letter February, 1833. The advertisement could not therefore have appeared in the Quotidienne in December, 1832. Nor could the first letter of Lettres à l'Étrangère (which, by the way, is not the first letter of the whole correspondence) have been dated "January, 1833," as printed. Arguing from Balzac's letter of January 1, 1846, just quoted, Miss Wormeley seeks to overthrow other dates in the printed correspondence.

Again, there is the famous letter of Balzac to his sister, Mme. Surville (October, 1833), which was first printed in the latter's Memoir of her brother, published in 1856. This letter appeared, twenty years later, in the Correspondance, in a form slightly, but not materially, altered. It encloses the proofs of Le Médecin de Campagne, asks the recipient to correct them, and gives details of an interview with three enthusiastic German families. It contains no reference to Mme. Hanska, and is entirely harmless. In 1896, however, this letter appears a third time, in M. Louvenjoul's Un Roman d'Amour, and now it is enlarged to more than twice its original length, and the matter of 1856 and 1876, considerably altered in phraseology, becomes merely a coda to some extensive remarks upon Balzac's first meeting with Mme. Hanska at Neufchâtel in October, 1833. The description is decidedly an offence against good taste:

Alas! a damned husband never left us for one second during five days. He kept between the petticoat of his wife and my waistcoat. . . . The essential thing is that we are twenty-seven years old, beautiful to admiration; that we possess the handsomest black hair in the world, the soft, deliciously delicate skin of brunettes, that we have a love of a little hand, a heart of twenty-seven, naïve; . . . imprudent to the point of flinging herself upon my neck before all the world. . . . I don't know whom to tell this to; certainly it is not to her, the great lady, the terrible marquise, who, suspecting the journey, comes down from her pride, and intimates an order that I shall go to her. . . . It is not [either] to her, the most treasured, who has more jealousy for me than a mother has for the milk she gives her child. She does not like

* Honoré de Balzac, translated by Katharine Prescott Wormeley. Letters to Madame Hanska, born Countess Rzewuska, afterwards Madame Honoré de Balzac. 1833-1846. (Hardy Pratt & Co., Boston, U.S.A. $1.50.)

L'Etrangère, precisely because L'Etrangère appears to be the very thing for me. And finally, it is not to her who wants her daily ration of love, and who, though voluptuous as a thousand cats, is neither graceful nor womanly. It is to you, my good sister, the former companion of my miseries and tears, that I wish to tell my joy. . . .

Truly a pretty letter for a good sister to receive! Miss Wormeley denies the authenticity of what she calls "the slanderous language of the first part" of it. She pertinently asks why the second part (common to all three versions, relating to the German families and the proof-correcting) should differ in phraseology, as it does, from Mme. Surville's own edition of 1856 and the édition définitive of 1876. Having proved satisfactorily to herself (1) deception, (2) falsification of dates, (3) forgery, Miss Wormeley lays a finger on many letters and parts of letters throughout her translation of Lettres à l'Etrangère, and brands them as either concocted or garbled. She points out that after Balzac's first interview with his beloved the tone of the letters changes, becoming grosser, less lofty, less pure. She characterises the letters from February 15 to March 11, 1834, as "infamous forgeries." And earlier than this, earlier even than the first meeting, she discovers evidences of forgery, or something as bad. Thus, for example (pp. 80-81), she exclaims upon the presentation of Mme. Hanska's character in the letter of November 10, 1833, where Balzac, protesting against the lady's jealousy, quotes her as having angrily written, "Va aux pieds de ta Marquise." Miss Wormeley says it is impossible that a woman like Mme. Hanska should ever have written, "Va aux pieds de ta Marquise." "There are certain things that a woman of breeding cannot do or say."

So much for Miss Wormeley's case. For ourselves, we admit that at the first blush it rather impressed us. On reflection, however, we have come to regard it as very weak—and certainly as not proven. In the first place, it is inherently of the highest improbability. Granting that M. Louvenjoul's eminent services to bibliography give him no title whatever to consideration as an assayer of the love-affairs of genius, and granting that his estimate of the Balzac-Hanska passion in Un Roman d'Amour is—shall we say?—the estimate of a book-collector and connoisseur of curiosities, why should he make himself a party to forgery, deception and garbling, in order to blacken the fame of the writer to whom he has devoted his whole life, and to "smirch the memory" of a dead woman? Even if he had desired to do these things, he could have done them with less clumsiness, less trouble, and less risk than are implied by Miss Wormeley's theory.

In the second place, Miss Wormeley's alleged proofs are not, even without special knowledge, quite unanswerable.

1. There certainly ought to have been an editorial introduction to Lettres à l'Etrangère, reconciling the fact of the appearance of this volume with the statement (1876) as to the Moscow fire; but the absence of such an explanation is not a proof that no explanation will or can be given.

2. Falsification of dates. This charge rests solely on the single passage in Balzac's letter of January 1, 1846. Might not Balzac have made an error? People frequently mis-date the most important events of their lives. All these letters were written at speed, and Miss Wormeley herself remarks that "the man who wrote them never read them over." Also, is there anything to show positively that Balzac, in the quoted passage, was referring to the first letter received from Mme. Hanska? Might he not have been referring to some well-remembered letter in which the loved one first exhibited a special and (to him) transcendent tenderness?

3. The letter to Mme. Surville, as printed in 1896. The non-appearance of the first part of this letter in the versions of 1856 and 1876 is no proof that the first part is a forgery, for neither Mme. Surville nor Mme. Hanska would have cared to print it in full. Mme.

Surville herself tampered with the letter, however slightly. Both the Calmann Lérys and M. Louvenjoul have implied, if they have not stated, that Mme. Hanska also tampered with Balzac's letters to her, and this is beyond doubt. Miss Wormeley, while endeavouring to rebut the insinuation, has to admit that Mme. Hanska added to some of the letters affectionate expressions to herself, "apparently from other letters"; also that she suppressed passages. As for the language and the taste of the first part of the letter to Mme. Surville, they are vile. But for ourselves, we see no strong presumption against Balzac being guilty of the passage, and of any of the other passages which Miss Wormeley tries to nail to the counter as false. This sort of thing may co-exist with imaginative greatness—in fact, has done so very often. Take the supreme imaginative writers (especially of the Continent), and say which of their secret lives—these men whom mankind unites to reverence—would bear the inspection of a board of matrons. Conceive the limpness of Goethe or Dumas after such a test! Genius may do what it likes—and does. Balzac belonged to his period. Also he had his bad and his good days. He was capable of anything except dishonesty. Decidedly he was never an authority on good taste. There is a passage of surpassing foulness on page 55 of Miss Wormeley's translation, and perhaps Miss Wormeley will say that it is forged or garbled. We prefer to remember that Balzac wrote the latter part of La Fille aux Yeux d'Or; that he had a lingering affection for those incredible cads de Marsay and Rubempré; that he created the appalling Arabella Dudley (and relished doing it); that he soiled Le Lys dans la Vallée with some of the most subtly odious mawkishness ever written. Balzac could be anybody, and was everybody by turns. Nothing that has come or may come to light about him will affect his greatness, or the world's admiration for him, in the least.

4. Miss Wormeley, in remarking on the change in the tone of the letters after Balzac had first met Mme. Hanska, does not seem to have realised that the coincidence of the change with the meeting is unfavourable to her contentions. Up to that time Balzac had been worshipping a bodiless spirit. What more natural than that its embodiment should be followed by the materialisation of his heavenly transports, and a general declension from the clouds.

5. Mme. Hanska's character. Miss Wormeley's view of the contessina's character is surely somewhat roseate. Mme. Hanska was a very jealous woman; and that she was at least an unconventional woman is clear from the admitted facts of the inception and continuance of her friendship with Balzac. A jealous woman, especially when it does not happen to be her husband who arouses the jealousy, is no longer "a woman of breeding": she is a jealous woman. We see no reason whatever why, in a fit of petulance, Mme. Hanska should not fling out precisely that phrase, "Va aux pieds de ta Marquise."

By such and similar arguments, it occurs to us, Miss Wormeley's position might be assailed, and perhaps carried. We should hesitate to admit that she has proved anything of real moment against M. Louvenjoul or other persons unnamed. That in bringing her charge she was actuated by pious motives we do not deny, but so grave an accusation should not have been breathed until it could be substantiated beyond the possibility of doubt in an unprejudiced mind. Our opinion is that while M. Louvenjoul may have taken a too masculine and cynical a view of the Hanska affair, Miss Wormeley has elevated not only Balzac but Mme. Hanska to the position of idols above our common humanity.

On another occasion, avoiding controversial points, we shall deal with the subject-matter of these interesting letters from the greatest of all novelists to a woman whose title to fame is that she kept his devotion for seventeen years, chiefly by means of the post.

Things Seen.

The Guard.

THE station luncheon-bar was crowded with soldiers. There were twelve of them, their khaki uniforms were stained and torn, their faces were brown and thin, their cheeks were hollow.

"Is the war over, then?" I said.

He laughed. "Not much. We're going back by the next boat."

"Why did you come home?"

"We was a guard."

"A guard!"

His lips tightened. "To twelve of our men," he said.

"What was the offence?"

"Sleeping on duty. They'll get five years apiece."

Somebody shouted a jovial command and the guard trooped from the bar.

Five years! An impetuous moment—and Glory. A nodding of the head—and Disgrace. O chance!

After Many Days.

"You had better let me show you round, sir, there are holes you might easily put your leg through." And Constable G. 116 walked with me into a desolation surrounded by hoardings. I was in the City-road, behind the Eagle Tavern, and the scene before me was a grotesque of tawdry ruin. The old Grecian Theatre was on our left; in front of it rose carved wooden pillars, black and rotten. Delicate vases and finials stood against the sky, awry, giltless, and forlorn. In this garden lamps had twinkled, and many a foolish heart had beaten to the waltz music in the mad, sad, bad—but doubtless sweet—nights of the sixties. Nothing seemed so dead as those carnivals except these husks of the theatres, grottoes, and band-stands that had witnessed them. Our voices sounded strange. The sparrows twittered on tree and broken roof. We entered the theatre. Boxes and tiers spread around in what had once been a circle of vast cheerfulness; now their emptiness smote the mind. Mouldy Cupids and tattered floral designs rioted still over the ceiling and round the dress-circle. The stage had been removed, and the pit which represented it was open to the sky. The orchestra was now the tattered edge of a precipice, but the vast back wall of the stage still reared itself aloft, and in its crevices the sparrows were building their nests. G. 116 talked, but I hardly listened. My thoughts went back thirty-six years, to my childhood in Rio Janeiro, when England was only a dream not yet come true. Heat, bananas, and a snatch of song—how they resurged! Heat, bananas, and a song on the lips of my father's clerks. It was the first song that gave me an image of London—not the London of St. Paul's, of the Abbey, of the Lord Mayor's Show, or of the Queen of England surrounded by her glittering troops—but the London of everyday life, of the pavement, and the holiday. I say, how it resurged!

Up and down the City Road,
In and out the Eagle,
That's the way the money goes,
Pop goes the weasel!

This, then, was the place! I stood and gazed, where once my fancy hovered blind. A dull coincidence, perhaps; but these are the things that make one's life, and seem worth telling.

George Meredith and his Critics.

THE critics are not such arbiters of literary destiny as you might think. Not only do their deliverances affect but little that immediate popularity, estimable in pounds, shillings, and pence, which is to-day the favourite gauge of merit, but they have not even, in the long run, much to say to the establishment of that more permanently based reputation which rests ultimately with the "acute and honourable minority." A writer will make his way, if he is to make it at all, not because people are told to read him, but because he has something to say which they wish to hear. The hostility of the critics will not for long bar this process; their laudation will not sensibly hasten it. Nevertheless, as each great writer moves to fame, his way is marked and its stages heralded by a succession of critical utterances. These become, as it were, rallying points and battle-cries for his partisans; discussion crystallises round them; they strike the key-notes for interpreters. Hence the importance, for the biographer and the literary student, of histories of critical opinion. Shakespearean literature is vast; but few volumes in it equal in value and fascination that "Centurie of Prayse" in which Dr. Ingleby and others were at the pains to garner all that was notably, and even much that was trivially, said about Shakespeare before the end of the seventeenth century. Something of the same interest belongs to the bibliography of George Meredith, contributed by Mr. John Lane, under the title "George Meredith and his Reviewers," to Mr. Le Gallienne's George Meredith: Some Characteristics, in 1891, and since brought up to date in a recent edition. Mr. Lane reprinted in full what is probably the most striking thing ever said by a critic of Meredith—the famous letter on "Modern Love" which Mr. Swinburne was stung to send to the Spectator of June 7, 1862. It is magnificent praise, and nowadays, of course, needless apology:

Mr. Meredith is one of the three or four poets now alive whose work, perfect or imperfect, is always as noble in design as it is often faultless in result. The present critic falls foul of him for dealing with "a deep and painful subject on which he has no conviction to express." There are pulpits enough for all preachers in prose; the business of verse writing is hardly to express convictions; and if some poetry, not without merit of its kind, has at times dealt in dogmatic morality, it is all the worse and all the weaker for that. As to subject, it is too much to expect that all schools of poetry are to be for ever subordinate to the one just now so much in request with us, whose scope of sight is bounded by the nursery walls; that all Muses are to bow down before her who babbles, with lips yet warm from their pristine pap, after the dangling delights of a child's coral; and jingles with flaccid fingers one knows not whether a jester's or a baby's bells. We have not too many writers capable of duly handling a subject worth the serious interest of man. As to execution, take almost any sonnet at random out of this series, and let any man qualified to judge for himself of metre, choice of expression, and splendid language, decide on its claims. And, after all, the test will be unfair, except as regards metrical or pictorial merit, every section of this great progressive poem being connected with the other by links of the finest and most studied workmanship.

Then Mr. Swinburne goes on to refer to one of the greatest sonnets of "Modern Love"—"a more perfect piece of writing no man alive has ever turned out." He does not quote the whole of it; but we do not propose to refrain from the pleasure of doing so here.

We saw the swallows gathering in the sky,
And in the osier-isle we heard their noise.
We had net to look back on summer joys,
Or forward to a summer of bright dye:
But in the largeness of the evening earth
Our spirits grew as we went side by side.
The hour became her husband and my bride.
Love that had robbed us so thus blessed our dearth!

The pilgrims of the year waxed very loud
 In multitudinous chatterings, as the flood
 Full brown came from the West, and like pale blood
 Expanded to the upper crimson cloud.
 Love that had robbed us of immortal things,
 This little moment mercifully gave
 And still I see across the twilight wave
 The swau sail with her young beneath her wings.

Mr. Lane is unable to tell us the name of the writer who reviewed Richard Feverel in the Times in 1859. Mr. Henley struck a swashing blow for Meredith, and, at the same time, expressed a very practical opinion on a moot journalistic point, in 1879, when he reviewed The Egoist in our own columns and in three other periodicals. Some fragments of these and other criticisms are collected in Views and Reviews, and very pretty reading they make. Mr. Henley's praise is as generous as Mr. Swinburne's: it is far less indiscriminating. "To read your Meredith straight off," he says, "is to have an indigestion of epigram"; and we hardly know how those whom Meredith's brilliance alarms and discomposes could wish to better Mr. Henley's statement of their case.

He writes with the pen of a great artist in his left hand and the razor of a spiritual suicide in his right. He is the master and the victim of a monstrous cleverness which is neither to hold nor to bind, and will not permit him to do things as an honest, simple person of genius would. As Shakespeare, in Johnson's praise, lost the world for a quibble and was content to lose it, so does Mr. Meredith disown himself of the sovereignty of contemporary romance to put on the cap and bells of professional wit. He is not content to be plain Jupiter: his lightnings are less to him than his fireworks; and his pages so teem with fine sayings and magniloquent epigrams and gorgeous images and fantastic locutions that the mind would welcome dulness as a bright relief.

Stevenson, again, is memorable among Meredithians. The Egoist was of "the inner circle of my intimates," and of Rhoda Fleming he writes as "that wonderful and painful book, long out of print and hunted for at bookstalls like an Aldine." There is, somewhere or other, a very fine passage on The Egoist, in which Stevenson dwells on the almost painful recognition by every honest and competent male reader of himself in Sir Willoughby Paternere. This we have known long since and lost again, and have sought for it without result through the four volumes of essays. Is it in the paper on "Books Which Have Influenced Me" which Stevenson contributed to a series of British Weekly Extras in 1887? If so, we suppose that, like so many Stevensoniana, it has fallen into the hands of the traffickers, and is only reprinted for millionaires.

The most noteworthy—perhaps the only noteworthy—depreciation of Meredith (for you can hardly call Mr. Henley's balanced criticism depreciation) was that whereby he was confounded in a single condemnation with Mr. Henry James in Mr. William Watson's National Review article on "Fiction—Plethoric and Anæmic."

The Missing Word.

SIR,—In relation to Mr. F. G. Cole's letter I beg permission for a few words in reply. From his definition of the term "Englander" we are given to understand that it is a new word coined for the occasion and having no racial significance whatever. I cannot look upon Englander as an entirely new word, as the title England forms the first two syllables of it, and, in spite of Mr. Cole's assertion, I maintain that it is stamped all over with racial significance. I again reiterate that no Scotsman, Irish, or Welsh, with any love of his native country would accept this word as a fitting title for a subject of the British Empire. Some word must be coined which will contain no element in its composition that will slight or give offence to the people of any nation of the Empire, and if that cannot be done, then better with none at all.—

 I am, &c.,
 H. LOGAN.

Sandgate, Prestwick: May 1, 1900.

Esquire.

SIR,—I see that one of the words prohibited by Mr. William Cullen Bryant (vide the article entitled "An Index Expurgatorius of Words" in your issue for April 28) is the appellation "esquire." May I venture to suggest that in so doing Mr. Bryant showed a lamentable ignorance of all that pertains to the science of heraldry? It may not be generally known that only certain persons are entitled, by right heraldic, to the use of the word esquire. The general impression seems to be that anyone who possesses a certain amount of landed property, or has an income of not less than, say, £500 a year, is entitled to be called "esquire." But, as has been aptly remarked, "no money whatsoever, or landed property, will give a man properly this title, unless he comes within certain rules," which may be thus stated:

The following are alone entitled to the use of the word esquire:

1. Esquires of the king's body, limited to four.
2. The eldest sons of knights, and their eldest sons respectively.
3. The eldest sons of the youngest sons of barons, and others of the greater nobility.
4. Those whom the King invests with collars of SS., as the Kings at Arms, Herald, &c.
5. Esquires to the Knights of the Bath, being their attendants on their installation.
6. Sheriffs of Counties and Justices of the Peace (the latter only during their tenure of office), and all those who bear special office in the King's household, as Gentlemen of the Privy Chamber, Carvers, Sewers, Cup-bearers, Pensioners, Serjeants-at-Arms.
7. "Counsellors at law," bachelors of divinity, law, and physic.—I am, &c.

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

RUDYARD KIPLING:

A CRITICISM.

BY RICHARD LE GALLIENNE.

Mr. Le Gallienne places on the title-page of his study of Mr. Kipling this quotation from The Bridge-Builders:

The fire-carriages shout the names of new gods that are not the old under new names. . . . When Brahm ceases to dream, the heavens and the hells and earth disappear. Be content. Brahm dreams still.

There is no preface to the book, which consists of three chapters, dealing respectively with "The Poetry," "The Stories," and "Mr. Kipling's General Significance and Influence." To these Mr. John Lane adds a bibliography. (Lane. 3s. 6d. net)

CRICKET IN MANY CLIMES.

BY P. F. WARNER.

Mr. Warner has played cricket under Lord Hawke's captaincy in all parts of the British colonies—"upon fields that are almost within sound of Niagara and in towns that have since undergone the hardships of siege and bombardment." In Barbados, in Trinidad, in British Guiana, he has "sped the flying ball." This, then, is a book of more than cricketing interest. Here, if anywhere, cricket appears not as a game but as an institution, dear as their language to Anglo-Saxons. (Heinemann.)

THE DIVINE ADVENTURE, IONA,

BY SUNDOWN SHORES.

BY FIONA MACLEOD.

Miss Macleod calls these three pieces "studies in spiritual history." Of the first she says: "'The Divine Adventure' is an effort to solve, or obtain light upon, the profoundest human problem. It is by looking inward that we shall find the way outward. The gods—and what we mean by the gods—the gods seeking God have ever penetrated the soul by two roads—that of nature and that of art. Edward Calvert put it supremely well when he said: 'I go inward to God: outward to the gods.'" (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)

THE DEFENSIVE ARMOUR AND THE WEAPONS AND ENGINES OF WAR OF MEDIEVAL TIMES, AND OF THE RENAISSANCE.

BY ROBERT COLTMAN CLEPHAN.

This volume has grown out of notes printed in Archæologia Eliana, that excellent repository of North of England lore, in 1898. Armour is a highly technical subject, and Mr. Clephan brings to it the experience gained in years of study. He treats of his subject under the two headings, "Defensive Armour" and "Weapons of War." (Walter Scott. 7s. 6d.)

NEW EDITION.

Hall (Theophylus D.), Greek Testament Reader	(Murray)	2/6
--	----------	-----

Percy Kent, 2, Bayley Mansions, Bedford-square, W.C., to whom a cheque for one guinea has been sent.

Meanwhile his spouse, her sister too,
And eke their children four,
Grown tired of waiting at the Bell,
Resolved to wait no more.

The reckoning paid, John Gilpin's wife,
With fond maternal care,
Did straight bestow her precious charge
All in the chaise and pair.

Then once again the wheels went round,
Again the whip went smack;
But they who had so glad set out,
Full sadly went they back.

For thinking on her husband's fate,
Did Mistress Gilpin weep,
Yet dried her eyes to find her dear
Awaiting hear at Cheap.

Said Gilpin: "On our wedding-day
I've been compelled to roam,
And, since we have not dined abroad,
Why, we will sup at home!"

Another contribution is as follows :

The post-boy, weary of the race,
Reluctant drew the rein,
And bled him to the Bell, to say
His mission was in vain!

Said Mrs. Gilpin—kindly soul:
"My husband's gone to town;
Altho' you lost by half a head,
You sha'n't lose half-a-crown!"

Then home they rode within the chaise
In which they rode before,
And like poor Gilpin, never stopped
Until they reached their door!

When Mr. Gilpin, peeping out,
His faithful spouse espied,
He met them with a joyful shout,
And laughed until he cried.

"'Tis odd," quoth he, "our wedding-day
In such a style to keep."
"No matter," quoth his frugal spouse,
"We'll have it on 'The Cheape.'"

Competition No. 33 (New Series).

MR. PICKWICK'S first claim to renown rested on his learned "Speculations on the Source of the Hampstead Ponds, with some Observations on the Theory of Tittlebats." It is strange that no attempt has been made to resuscitate even a fragment of this remarkable paper. We invite our readers to do so; and since not all have been to Hampstead, but all have caught tittle-bats, we ask them to confine themselves to the latter branch of Mr. Pickwick's subject. It may be taken for granted that Mr. Pickwick unfolded his great Theory of Tittle-bats in language worthy of his own and his subject's importance. We call for those words, imposing three hundred as the limit. To the competitor who, in our judgment, evokes them most nearly as they were delivered to the immortal Club, we shall award a prize of One Guinea.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, May 8. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the first column of p. 377, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 32 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of one guinea for the best set of four or five stanzas narrating the homeward journey of Mrs. Gilpin from the Bell at Edmonton and the reunion of the family in Cheap-side. These verses were to be suitable to precede the last existing verse of Cowper's ballad. The four best contributions are of very equal merit. The most Cowperian have been contributed by Mr.

By JOHN RHYS,

Principal of Jesus College, and Professor of Celtic in the University of Oxford; and

D. BRYNMOR JONES, Q.C., M.P.

With 2 Maps. Cloth, 16s.

"In this volume, the writing of which has occupied its authors for nearly four years, will be found every kind of information bearing upon the story of Wales. It has long been felt that there was room for a more systematic treatment of Welsh History, and it is believed that this want will be found to be supplied in this work."

A NEW BOOK BY THE AUTHOR OF "TOM TUG AND OTHERS," &c.

The DIARY of a DREAMER.

By ALICE DEW-SMITH.

Cloth, gilt, 6s.

"This book consists of a series of papers, sketches from life, and reflections on things in general, written in the chatty style so popular nowadays. Some fantastic dreams give the name to the volume, which, amongst other subjects touched on, treats of the House—Furniture—Plumbers—My Persian Cat—Under the Chestnuts—Blue Peas—Young Birds—By the Seashore—A Glimpse of Spring, &c.

THE WAR TO DATE.

The Literary Week.

Books about the War come into this office with the frequency of shells in a besieged town. Following a score or so that we have already reviewed, to-day Mr. Pearse, of the Daily News, gives us a book; to-morrow Mr. Nevinson, of the Chronicle; the day after to-morrow Mr. Winston Churchill. The war-book business, like everything else, is being overdone. Within a week the rights of no fewer than twenty-five books about the War were offered to one American publisher. We are also to have a volume from the Bishop of Natal, who was at the Front with General Buller. It is in the form of a diary, and was written for the benefit of his friends; but "the urgent needs of his diocese have induced him to consent to their publication." The Bishop of Natal is a sanguine man. We wish him and his diary good fortune.

MR. CONAN DOYLE, we understand, has accepted the offer of an American firm of publishers to write a history of the Boer War.

MESSRS. METHUEN are preparing a sixpenny edition of Colonel Baden-Powell's personal narrative of the Matabele Campaign of 1896. The book, which is dedicated to his mother, has been illustrated by Colonel Baden-Powell with numerous and characteristic sketches.

MRS. MEYNELL has been appointed art critic of the Pall Mall Gazette, in succession to R. A. M. S. Mr. W. E. Henley has written for the new number of the Pall Mall Magazine an appreciation of Mr. R. A. M. Stevenson.

CHANOES have taken place in the editorial department of the Speaker. Mr. Philip Carr, we understand, has retired from the editorship, which he shared jointly with Mr. J. L. Hammond.

THE work of reconstruction which has been in progress for some time in the publishing house of Harper & Brothers is now practically complete. The London branch in Albemarle-street has been placed under the control of Mr. W. B. Fitts, who is known in England by his work in connexion with the new series of the North American Review. Mr. E. V. Lucas has joined Messrs. Harper & Brothers as reader and literary adviser.

MR. ANTHONY HOPE is writing three more "Dolly Dialogues," which will be published in the New Magazine, an American periodical of which the first number is announced to appear shortly.

A SIXPENNY edition of John Oliver Hobbes's The School for Saints will be issued by Mr. Fisher Unwin at an early date.

IN the report made by Edward Edwards on the first year's working of the Manchester Free Library (1852-53) it is interesting to read his remarks on the popular reading of that day. He enumerates some of the works most in demand in both the Reference and the Lending Departments, and the list of titles makes a curious contrast with the popular reading of to-day—not entirely to the credit of modern readers. In the Reference Department the Biblical commentaries most in demand were those of Calmet, Kitto, and Beard. The works of Jeremy Taylor, Richard Hooker, Robert Hall, and Bishop Horsley had been much read. During the first six months of the year, Hume and Smollett's History of England was issued 31 times; Lingard's, 41 times; Craik and Macfarlane's, 60 times; and Macaulay's 124 times. Cumming's Hunter's Life in South Africa was applied for nearly 200 times; Dana's Two Years Before the Mast, 74 times; and Layard's Nineveh and its Remains about as often. Biography was popular; and for a Life of Wellington, and the great Duke's Despatches, there were 122 calls. Various Lives of Napoleon had a total of 303 readers. Shakespeare's works, and books illustrative thereof, reached the respectable total of 324 issues; while in the realm of fiction, Scott and Defoe reigned supreme, there having been 1,141 issues of the former and 984 of the latter: Ivanhoe being issued 241 times, and Robinson Crusoe, 239. The Thousand and One Nights delighted 294 readers, Gulliver's Travels left the shelves 123 times, and Roderick Random had 82 issues.

TURNING to the parallel six months in the Lending Department, we find that the same problem troubled the librarian of those days as now—viz., the great preponderance of fiction-reading. Dickens's The Chimes was borrowed 42 times; Oliver Twist, 30; and Dombey and Son, 20 times. Scott's Kenilworth was issued 34 times; Peveril of the Peak, 31; and The Fortunes of Nigel, 34 times. Vanity Fair was taken out 30 times; Pelham, 33 times; while the now forgotten Sewall's Rudolph the Voyager found 36 readers. "But," says the librarian, "of such works as these, four or five times the number of copies which the library possesses would be in equally eager demand were they forthcoming." The first volume of Whitaker's History of Manchester was borrowed 21 times, but the second reversed the figures, being issued only 12 times. Macaulay's History found 20 students. Fifteen issues were recorded of the early volumes of Lingard's History; but the perseverance of many of the readers evidently broke down, for when the ninth volume was reached they numbered but 10, the tenth totalled 7, and the thirteenth only 3. Clarendon's History found 14 readers for the first and second volumes, but the seventh volume reduced that number to 3.

WE stated some weeks ago that the scene of Mr. Kipling's new novel is laid in Upper Burmah. The first draft of the story, we gather from the New York Bookman, was given to the printers in England before Mr. Kipling's departure for South Africa. In its original form it made about one hundred thousand words. The proofs were forwarded to Mr. Kipling at the scene of the war, and the author was obliged to make his corrections and alterations under trying and picturesque circumstances,

How quickly truth becomes elusive, and myth pervasive! Was it truth or myth—that Norfolk landlord's character-sketch of George Borrow which Mr. Lowerison communicated last week to the Daily Chronicle? Mr. William Mackay, writing from Oulton Broad, the scene of Mr. Lowerison's interview, scouts the whole story. Our readers must judge between the twain:

MR. LOWERISON IN THE
Daily Chronicle, APRIL 30.

The landlord of the Ferry Inn at Oulton Broad knew George Borrow very well. I remember five years ago asking him how he liked the author of Lavengro.

"Didn't like him at all," was the gruff response.

"At least," I said, "he was a scholar and a gentleman."

"Scholar he d—," replied Boniface, "an' gentleman he weren't; never came into my bar but he quarrelled with everyone there, and cracked 'em out to fight. An' when he weren't fighting himself he were eggin' others on to."

And that was George Borrow.

But all the same I'll e'en take down the Romany Rye and talk with the gipsies ere I sleep to night.

MR. MACKAY, IN THE Daily Chronicle, MAY 9.

He [Mr. Lowerison] discovered at the Ferry Inn "a landlord who knew Borrow very well." There is no inn of that name at Oulton Broad. But the landlord of the Wherry Hotel—which is doubtless the hostelry Mr. Lowerison has in his mind—did not know Borrow "very well." I also had tapped that barrel, but obtained from it nothing stimulating. The landlord's name was Mason—he died a twelvemonth ago—and he has often told me that Borrow had not "used" his house twice during all the years through which they had been neighbours. All Mr. Lowerison's story, therefore, about Borrow quarrelling in the bar, fighting himself and egging others on to fight, is pure romance.

Your correspondent has evidently encountered someone who impersonated the landlord of the Wherry; someone who appears to have been as great a poseur and as flamboyant a prevaricator as Mr. George Borrow himself. This theory finds support in the fact that the real landlord of the Wherry did not swear, and did not converse in a sort of bastard dialect impossible to locate. The late Mr. Mason was a Londoner, an intelligent and widely-read man with considerable literary tastes.

MR. ROBERT H. SHERRARD writes some interesting things about his friend, the late Mr. Ernest Dowson, in the current Author. Mr. Sherrard sheltered Dowson in the last six weeks of his unhappy life, and his account of the young poet's last literary enjoyments comes somewhat as a surprise:

He glutted himself on Dickens, and I had also an Esmond, by Thackeray, to put into his gaunt hands. He had Esmond in his bed, by the way, when he died. But as to Dickens, here was a perfect stylist and most laborious artist who delighted himself for the last precious days of a short life in the hasty writings, but perfect humanity, of our English Balzac.

And I shall never take up an Oliver Twist again without remembering these circumstances: Five hours before Ernest Dowson died I was lying on a couch in a room adjoining his, keeping myself awake at six o'clock in the morning with the adventures of that most smug of prigs, so as to keep converse with my friend, who could not get to sleep, and who had begged me to talk to him. I happened to say to him, to show that I was vigilant: "How absurdly melodramatic this is, about the murder of Nancy. Do you think that, for anything Fagin could tell him, Sikes, who knew Fagin to be the worst liar on earth, would have killed his missus?"

"No," said Dowson; "he would have gone for Claypole." And that was the last thing on literature that he ever said.

FRANCIS DOUCE's box at the British Museum has been opened at last, and its contents are said to be of no value to anybody. The British Museum authorities had never set very high hopes on the box, as it was known that Douce had left all his finest manuscripts to the Bodleian Library.

MR. GEORGE GISSING is one of those novelists about whom the best of friends are apt to disagree. You like his novels or you don't. But it is surely a symptom of Mr. Gissing's worth that books which he wrote many years ago are continually being referred to by admiring readers as not having received their due. Thus in some remarks on Grub-street—the Grub-street that was, and is, and will be—the American Bookman remarks that Mr. Gissing's novel New Grub Street "has not one tithe of the recognition it deserves," while in the May National Review Miss Jane H. Findlater writes of Mr. Gissing's The Nether World as a novel that is "deserving of more fame than it ever got." If there are arrears of fame due to Mr. Gissing it is very certain that they will be paid, with interest, at some future date.

MISS FINDLATER's tribute to Mr. Gissing occurs in a very readable article on "The Slum Movement in Fiction." The pedigree of the modern slum novel as traced by Miss Findlater is briefly this:

Charles Dickens (Oliver Twist).

Charles Kingsley (Alton Locke).

George Gissing (The Nether World).

Rudyard Kipling (Badalia Herodsfoot).

Arthur Morrison (Tales of Mean Streets).

W. S. Maugham (Liza of Lambeth).

W. Pett Ridge (Mord Em'ly).

Clarence Rook (The Hooligan Nights).

Miss Findlater thinks that Badalia Herodsfoot gave the present "brutal school" its present life and activity. In Liza of Lambeth the brutality reached its depths, and what was needed was work more artistic and less horribly powerful. The needed relief came in Mr. Pett Ridge's Mord Em'ly and Mr. Clarence Rook's The Hooligan Nights. "To my thinking," says Miss Findlater, these latest contributions to slum literature are probably more near the truth in their picture of slum-life than any of their predecessors, yet it may be seriously questioned whether all attempts in this sort are not vain. The gulf that separates the educated man and woman from the uneducated is curiously difficult to bridge. We may believe as firmly as we like that we are brothers or sisters "under our skin," yet remain in heathen ignorance all the while of the real truth about each other. What we mutually see must always be only the surface of things, and anything beyond that no more than clever conjecture. Let us say, then, that the probabilities seem to be with the latest contributors! They avoid successfully the weak points where their predecessors have broken down, are not too moral, or too boring about reform; or too hopelessly tragical, or too desperately brutal; they take, in fact, the middle road of proverb with good results.

The survey will do, but Miss Findlater makes one serious omission. Mr. George Moore's Esther Waters combines the darker and the lighter sides of slum life, and is, in any case, a most remarkable work of the class she is considering.

BOETHIUS' Consolations of Philosophy is a book which Englishmen should not "willingly let die." The favourite philosophical work of the Middle Ages, it found a royal lover and editor in King Alfred, who, with the aid of Asser, gave to his subjects a fine though free rendering of this work by "the last of the Romans whom Cato or Tully would have acknowledged for their countryman." Last year Mr. Walter John Sedgefield gave us a scholarly edition of King Alfred's Old English version of this remarkable book. He now gives us, through the Clarendon Press, the same version rendered into modern English. In doing this it has been Mr. Sedgefield's care to preserve that curiously refreshing personal note which Alfred infused into his version, "the making of which was to Alfred a love's labour." Mr. Sedgefield's preface continues:

It satisfied his intellectual cravings and stimulated his uncultured but vigorous mind, and he resolved to give his still more unlettered lieges a share in the treat. So he turned it into his own tongue, as the King of the West Saxons might be expected to do, in a large and royal way, scattering up and down the work such notes and comments as he judged needful. His Boethius heads the roll of English philosophical writings; it likewise heads the roll of English translations. It is hoped that the modern English dress here given to the king's best book will help to make him less an unsubstantial shadow for Englishmen of to-day, and more a real man, practical, right-feeling, and earnest beyond his generation.

THE supremacy of the Novel is discussed by Mr. Andrew Lang in the Westminster Gazette. Mr. Lang finds that in 1830 Bulwer Lytton wrote of the novel in terms which might be used to-day. In his Dedicatory Epistle to Paul Clifford Lytton explains why he writes novels. "Will you—will anyone—read epic or sonnet, tale or satire, tragedy or epigram? . . . Then, as to philosophy, we may judge of the demand when we reflect that Hobbes's works are out of print, and that Mill's Analysis has not been reviewed. . . . All books, except novels, are now ephemeral far more than are writings in fiction. Does the biography or the essay or the treatise last even the year for which the novel endures? . . . We live in a strange and ominous period for literature. . . . The idlest work is the most charming. . . . We throw aside our profound researches, and feast upon popular abridgments. . . . Readers now look into fiction for facts. . . . Thus in the wreck of much that is great and noble paths are open to second-rate ability and mediocre knowledge." Mr. Lang is careful to point out that Fiction did not enjoy undisputed sway for long after 1830. The poetry of Tennyson, the histories of Macaulay and Froude, and the philosophy of Darwin and Ruskin, soon redressed the balance. "Thus," says Mr. Lang, "if any author feels that he has in him the powers of a Macaulay, a Tennyson, a Froude, a Darwin, or a Ruskin, he may, without too much diffidence, write history, poetry, philosophy, or essays on art. The less gifted or less confident men of the pen are driven back, like Lytton, on the novel, and let us hope that their romances will be no worse than his."

MEANWHILE, the young novelist of our day is possibly working on wrong lines. The qualities on which he prides himself most are his veracity and vigilance. To see everything, and record it truly, is, he thinks, essential to his art. He revels in what he calls "vision." To make the reader see a great deal of detail with absolute clearness is constantly his labour. A writer in the Atlantic Review confesses that this labour is lost on him. When the illusion of a modern novel is at its height, he has "an instinctive craving for the disentangling of the essential from the superfluous, for enfranchisement from the tyranny of accessories." Probably few readers with a fine critical sense have not felt the same impatience of superfluously wrought detail, especially in the novels on which the adjective "powerful" is bestowed with a flowing pen. The writer continues:

If we consider, I venture to say, we shall find that we know the faces of none of the characters of the great fiction of the past as we know, or may know, those of the brain-children of the typical latter-day novelist—not even Beatrice Esmond, not Don Quixote himself. Nor are we made aware of any very minutely distinguishing traits, mental or physical, pertaining to them. Radiant, heroic, grotesque, repellent, as the case may be, they are satisfyingly apparent, sufficiently real, but they are a little removed from us; their outlines are slightly indefinite, like those of a composite picture. Perhaps, indeed, we never lose the latent consciousness that they are composite pictures—that each is not one, but many. Certainly, I have never had, while setting myself to learn their life histories, the vague feeling of unworthiness which one has in listening to gossip about one's neighbours—as I have had more than once in the case of the scrupulously individualised heroes and heroines and satellites of to-day. And never have Rosalind, Hamlet, the deathless Don—nor even Becky Sharp and Mrs. Gamp—harassed me by their presence!

CHICAGO is already associated in the minds of Englishmen with scientific slaughter. We are afraid that its treatment of the English language suggests similar ideas. The spelling reform which is there making such rapid progress has brought about the adoption of spellings which we contemplate with a shudder. Final e's are to be dropped "in words in which they do not serv to lengthen the preceding vowel, but rather tend to mislead the learner; thus—spel, hav, giv, ar, bad (verb), definit, derivativ, amiabl, &c." "F" is to be substituted for "ph" and "gh"; thus—geografy, fantasm, and enuf. Other typical new spellings are: Coud, sovran, foren, hole (entire), iland, gastly, &c. On these Dr. Funk, editor-in-chief of the Standard Dictionary, comments favourably, as follows:

It is inevitable as the law of gravity that silent letters—that is, letters that have outlived their significance and are now but dead weight—be dropt out of words. Progress is along the line of least resistance, and in spelling the phonetic is surely that line; a distinct sign for every distinct sound. We have already come a great way. Just note some of the spellings that our great-grandfathers had to put up with, and let us be glad that we live to-day. This is the way they spelt in Shakespeare's time:

Ayre (air), beleuee (believe), civill (civil), cuppe (cup), dienei (devil), duckoy (decoy), farre (far), fysche (fish), horrou (horror), musick (music), sunne (sun), souldiers (soldiers), trewe (true), wiefe (wife).

We agree that progress has been made since Shakespeare's time, but it has been a progress free, natural, and gracious. Speech belongs to the mind and body, and should partake of their slow change and growth. New spellings should be initiated by writers, not by schoolmasters and lexicographers. Your spelling reformer will make night and knight indistinguishable to the eye. Veil and vale; sent, cent, and scent; by, bye, and buy will all lose their visual identity under the "fonetik" scheme. This would be calamitous from a literary point of view.

A DELIGHTFUL picture of one of Edward FitzGerald's hospitable evenings at his cottage at Boulge in 1845 is contained in a letter written by Bernard Barton, FitzGerald's father-in-law, to John Wodderspoon, the author of Memorials of Ipswich. The letter from which we are about to quote is one of a large batch written by Barton to Wodderspoon, which has lately come into the hands of an Ipswich bookseller. These letters date from 1843 to 1849, and their contents are very varied. Writing on January 15, 1845, Barton gives this picture of FitzGerald as a host:

Tom Churchyard drove me last night to a symposium given by Edward FitzGerald to us two and Old Crabbe—lots of palaver, smoking, and laughing. My head swims yet, with the fumes of the baccy, and my sides are sore with laughing. Edward was in one of his drollest eues, and did the honours of his cottage with such gravity of humour that we roared again. It was the oddest melange. Tea, porter, ale, wine, brandy, cigars, cold lamb, salad, cucumber, bread and cheese; no precise line of demarcation between tea and supper. It was one continuous spread, something coming on fresh every ten minutes till we wondered whence they came and whither they could be put. "Gentlemen, the resources of the cottage are exhaustless," shouted our host. "Miss Faiers, the salad there, the cucumber here, oil at that corner, vinegar and pepper yonder; there put the cream, and that glass of butter in the middle, push those wine and brandy bottles close together"—certes, it was rare fun.

Bibliographical.

WRITING in the Daily Express the other day, Mr. Clement Scott referred to the fact that when he was editor of the Theatre magazine one of his contributors was Miss Marie Corelli. Those who are interested in Miss Corelli's work outside the limits of fiction may like to know that her articles in Mr. Scott's miscellany appear to have begun in 1883 with an account of "A Fair Enthusiast" (for Wagner), followed in the same year by a paper on "Joachim and Sarasate" and a sketch of "A Girl Graduate." In 1884 came "His Big Friend" (an éloge of Hollman, the violin-cellist). In January, 1885, appeared a description of an "improvisation" (on the pianoforte) given by Miss Corelli at a house in Harley-street. "Her touch is brilliant, and her execution marvellous," wrote the appreciative reporter. Then in the February number came four stanzas of verse addressed to the Princess Beatrice "on her betrothal," after this fashion:

Beatrice, Comfort of England! Young Joy of its people,
Lay by the lilies of maidenhood,—Love is before thee!
Hark to the bells going mad with their mirth in the steeple!

Cling to the lover who looks in thine eyes to adore thee!
Happiness hallowed thy girlhood, and peace in its perfect completeness,
Greater delight now awaits thee, and stronger, more absolute sweetness.

Come from the side of that Throne where the nations in wonder

Bend to thy Mother's slight hand and acknowledge her splendour,

She whom the multitudes shout for with voices of thunder,
She who is better than mighty in being so tender!

Pitiful ev'n to the poorest, as compassionate sister to brother,

Beatrice! well hast thou honoured so noble, so faithful a mother.

Finally, in 1886, Miss Corelli was represented by fourteen lines on Desdemona, beginning thus:

Draw back the velvet curtains, let the light
Rush wonderingly in! She will not say
The sunbeams dazzle her. . . . Eternal Night
Hath closed for her the portals of the Day.
Look you how fair she is! as fair as when
She smiled on Cassio—prithee where's her wrong?—
One woman, sure, doth smile on many men!

The announcement of a forthcoming new edition of Sir Philip Sidney's sonnets, with hitherto-unprinted matter, is a fresh testimony to the renewed popularity of the hero of Zutphen. There has been quite a run upon Sidney and his works during the past decade. It began with the memoir which Mr. H. R. Fox Bourne contributed to the "Heroes of the Nations" series in 1891. In 1892 a "Cabinet of Gems" from Sidney's writings made its appearance, followed in 1893 by a reprint of his Apologie for Poetrie, a reprint of his Arcadia, and an edition of his Miscellaneous Works. He was allowed to rest for a year, and then, in 1895, came a pretty little collection of his Lyric Poems. In 1897 we had Mr. Grosart's edition of the Complete Poetical Works in three volumes (including the verse in the Arcadia). Next year appeared Mr. John Gray's edition of the Sonnets, with Mr. Ricketts's illustrations, and, finally, last year saw the publication of Memoirs of the Sidney Family, from the pen of the gentleman who is now about to give us more of Sidney's verse.

I note that Mr. E. Robins is by and by to be represented by a couple of new volumes—one entitled Twelve Great Actors, and the other Twelve Great Actresses. Much interested as I am in the literature of the stage, this particular announcement is one about which I feel unable to "enthuse." Mr. Robins, who is, I believe, an American cousin, is already known in this country as the author of Echoes of the Playhouse: Reminiscences of Past Glories (1895), and of The Palmy Days of Nance Oldfield (1898), neither of them very much more than collections of more or less readable gossip.

It is, again, a little disappointing to find that the volume on The Manchester Stage, for which we are told to look, is confined in scope to the last twenty years. The story of the Manchester stage is well worth telling at some length, as it is of real interest and value to playgoers. It was in Cottonopolis that Charles Calvert started most if not all, of his excellent Shakespearean revivals, and it was in the same city that Henry Irving first gave earnest of his exceptional ability as an actor. Something about the Birmingham stage has been written by Mr. T. E. Pemberton; and the same office has been done for Bath by Mr. Penley, for Edinburgh by Mr. J. C. Dibdin, for Glasgow by Mr. Walter Baynham, and for Aberdeen by the late Mr. Angus. Even the Dundee stage has had its historian. There is a little book on the Brighton stage; but, unless I am much mistaken, the theatrical history of Liverpool, Sheffield, Leeds, Bristol, and other leading centres in England, has either been altogether neglected or else very inadequately treated.

A Yale professor has written a book on The Mind of Tennyson, which, I suppose, will soon be accessible in England. Singularly enough, America (so far as I know) has not done much in the way of Tennysonian criticism. For the moment I can think only of Stedman's essay in his Victorian Poets and of Mr. Van Dyke's Poetry of Tennyson, which came to us, originally, ten years ago, but has since been revised and reproduced. We shall see what the Yale professor gives us; but, in the meantime, the States have yet to furnish us with "appreciations" of our great poet which can be named in the same breath with those of George Brimley, W. C. Roscoe, R. H. Hutton, Stopford Brooke, and Frederic Harrison.

The idea, which has occurred to Major Arthur Griffiths, of writing the history of Famous British Regiments is good, but not quite novel. I remember very well a little book, published a good many years ago, called Famous Regiments of the British Army; but that, of course, must be somewhat out of date. Besides, have there not been changes in regimental nomenclature?

"Do you remember," asks Mr. Arthur Pendenys in his latest letter to Belinda, "that in the burlesque of Lytton's play, 'Money,' Sir Harcourt Courtly figured as Sir Haircut Shortly—one of the best perversions on record?" But, dear Mr. Pendenys, it is in "London Assurance," not in "Money," that Sir Harcourt Courtly figures. And when and where was "Money" ever burlesqued? I can find no record of any travesty of that démodé production.

A Woman's Hansard.

The International Congress of Women, 1899. Edited by the Countess of Aberdeen. 7 vols. (Unwin. Each 3s. 6d. net.)

UTTERANCE is creative: that is the teaching of Genesis and St. John, it is also the experience of the world; and the utterance of woman—so long delayed—the utterance before mankind of all her sufferings and aspirations in political and industrial life, is creating a new order and new values. Silence, even that which M. Maeterlinck applauds with such truth and grace, is but the laboratory of the message for which a heart or a world is waiting. The International Congress of Women of 1899, like the similar gatherings which preceded and which will succeed it, was an utterance born of long and cruel silence. It stated innumerable facts; it suggested remedies for existing evils; it diffused what we may call the cult of sisterhood in humanity; it was a great conception admirably organised. Its result is materialised in seven volumes, and we are able as a consequence to obtain an idea of the value of women as an intellectual force in politics. The volumes have been edited, the parenthetical talk ("Hear, hear," &c.) has been eliminated, but the characteristics of the speakers remain. Let it be said at once that even congresses of women are not free from frivolity. Woman is incurably arch. Said Miss Mabel Hawtrey, for instance: "People, I am told, advocate co-education with a view to promoting the equality of the sexes. Now, this is an object with which I have very little sympathy, as I have no wish to climb down and place myself on an equality with man. I would much rather stay where I am, in the position he has given me, and personally I shall be quite satisfied if he continues to look up to me." This was a suitable remark to put in the mouth of a flirtatious girl in a novel; but it gives a preliminary air of insincerity to a thoughtful speech on co-education from a physiological point of view. Sex-glorification is another regrettable feature of the talk of women in congress. Hear Mrs. Adelaide Johnson in an unfinished and unfinishable sentence on sculpture as a profession for her sex: "And as hitherto woman has never failed in any undertaking whatsoever, but, with fair opportunity in each, has taken the palm, and has purified, dignified, and uplifted every trade, industry, and profession she has entered and embraced—or 'tis truer to say conquered. . . ." The rebutment of imaginary accusations should not occupy women in congress. "It is, or it was," said Miss Carmichael Stopes, "a common masculine dictum, that women have no creative or originitive faculty, no humour, no pathos, no fire, no sustained effort, no accuracy. Had I time I could disprove each charge." And then the good lady goes on to demand: "Who among men has equalled the intensity of Charlotte and Emily Brontë?" This is the kind of thing which a happy exigency of space might have excluded from print. Women, collectively speaking, err in yielding to an innate love of forcible phrase, regardless of accuracy. To the Lady Battersea we owe the curious sentence: "Novels, which, if they do not amuse, are unworthy of their name, do not prevent their authors from being among the best preachers and teachers the world has ever known. . . . Think of Sir W. Scott, Hood. . . . Miss Broughton, and the joint work of Gilbert and Sullivan." The abbreviation "Sir W." gives a special flavour to this apostrophe. The importance of facts, of data, has yet to be learned by the average woman speaker; but that women are capable of mastering the concrete as well as the abstract surface of a question is shown by the valuable contributions of Mrs. J. R. Macdonald to the work of the Congress. Women are naturally fond of platitude, and there was one which fell from the lips of a fair senatress which deserves to become a classic: "Where equity is, justice cannot be far off."

The pronouncements of the Congress on the subject of literature, journalism, and art will be read with interest. They are, of course, imbued with a moral feeling which rather tempts the rejoinder: "L'art pour l'art." The Duchess of Sutherland almost made an epigram in rebuking women journalists who forgot that "personalities were not character-studies." Mrs. Ida H. Harper stated the remarkable fact that "in Chicago a woman, who has been for many years an editorial writer on one of the large dailies in that city, does the heavy political writing, treating especially the leading questions of tariff and finance," at a salary of 5,000 dols. a year. An excellent principle in co-operative journalism was stated by the same lady. The woman-journalist "must learn to forget that she is a woman when she has to work among men at men's work. I do not mean that she must be unwomanly. . . . But if a man wants to smoke in her presence when she is at work, or keep his hat on, or take his coat off, . . . she must remember that it all goes with the place she is in. . . . Men like womanly women; but still they don't want any 'clinging-vine' business about an office." Miss March Phillippis finds that "men write with greater ease and lightness because their work is now brought into close contact with that of women." They should certainly gain much "ease and lightness" if they answered Mrs. Harper's requisition of the woman journalist. "If her own cherished ideas are wholly opposed to those of the managing editor, can she substitute his for her own and present them in the same strong, convincing manner?"

A striking example of an influential editress is cited by Mlle. Drucker. Her French is not classic, so we translate the passage which refers to the weekly organ De l'ouvrière. "At the head of this journal was and is still an invisible personality, a woman . . . whose veil is so thick that several people think that the face hidden behind it is that of a man who is afraid of being unmasked and twitted with having concealed himself under a woman's name."

On the subject of romantic literature the most interesting contributions are from foreigners. True, Mrs. Flora Anna Steel says some clever things, such as this: "There is nothing sacred from the stylograph pen, which jots down even your mistakes as 'copy'"; but she takes refuge in a crypt from the exactions of her too-comprehensive subject. Mme. Dick May credits Mme. de Lafayette with the creation of the psychological novel. MM. Paul Bourget, Edouard Rod and Marcel Prévost must take off their caps to her. Fraulein von Milde informs us that Marie von Ebner-Eschenbach is Germany's greatest authoress, and that her account of the struggles of a murderer's son "against prejudice, stupidity and malignity" is "the best modern novel we possess either from men or women." Observe the calm omniscience of this remark! Mrs. Heinemann—the cultivated novelist "Kassandra Vivaria"—stimulates a vague interest in various Italian mediocrities whose productiveness amid "the turmoil of intestine wars" was in itself a kind of genius. Finland and Holland offer, it would appear, mines of literary wealth still untapped, and translators on the look out for "tips" cannot do better than consult these Transactions on this subject.

Women have a delightful talent for enthusiasm in branch-subjects. The experiences of a woman as a folk-song collector, given in one of these volumes, is an illustration of what we mean. What man would think of making a "profession" of strolling about asking fishermen à propos des bottes to sing him songs? But Mrs. Lee is a folk-song collector who has the courage to present her requests without the preliminary of being "introduced." And because she refrains from introductions, she is reminded "of one I had to a well-known lady, from the charwoman who cleaned for us both, in a country district,

'Oh, Mrs. Lee, I think you ought to know Mrs. Maclaren, for you both digs your portaties and weeds your garden. You both play the pianner of a Sunday, and you are both middle-aged.'

Of the social, political, industrial side of these transactions it scarcely behoves us to speak. An industrial irony of a semi-literary character may be mentioned. It is illegal for French women to do night work as compositors, but though they are chased from the composing room after dark there is nothing to prevent them from spending seven hours of the night in folding the journal they may not set up.

Among the methods for securing an alleviation of industrial evils may be mentioned the Consumers' League of the United States, which puts buyers in the possession of such facts as enable them to confine their patronage to firms which study the sanitary interests of their employees. Lord Rowton's model lodging-houses pay 5 per cent., it appears; but the scarcity of house-room is still one of the disgraces of civilisation. In the "Report of Council Transactions" is printed an ingenious scheme, drawn up by Mr. Gilbert Parker, for affording comfortable accommodation and board for women clerks earning 25s. a week. It may be added that several men were represented at the Congress, among them Dr. Cecil Reddie and Mr. J. H. Badley, whose schools have pointed the way to a revolution in educational methods.

Lady Aberdeen and her coadjutors may, on the whole, be congratulated on the manner of their performance. It was apparently, and perhaps justly, thought inexpedient to remodel the uncouth locutions of several writers; but their assistance might perhaps have been sought for the disentangling of a few really unintelligible sentences. There are some misprints: "A death-rate increased by 104 per cent." (p. 160, "Women in Social Life"), and another "beauté de la statistique," on p. 44 of "Women in Industrial Life," are beyond our comprehension. Cencin is evidently a misprint for Tencin on p. 127, Vol. I. of "Women in Professions." But the work involved in selecting and condensing was enormous, and there is plenty of evidence of conscientious attention to the discharge of it. The indexes add greatly to the utility of the volumes for reference.

In conclusion, what will come of all this talk? Three things, in one inevitable order—light, conviction, reform. It is woman, whom even man delineated, from of old, as Truth leaping from a well, as Aphrodite rising from the chaos of waves, who will set this old world right.

Mr. Lang's "Scotland."

A History of Scotland from the Roman Occupation. By Andrew Lang. Vol. I. (Blackwood. 15s. net.)

ERE now, alike in fiction and in sober narrative, Mr. Lang has touched upon more than one incident of Scottish history. It was to be expected that, sooner or later, he would busy himself with the whole stirring theme. He does not attempt the scale of Hill Burton or of Tytler, but proposes a "general history" in two volumes, which shall sum up the results of much recent research, and shall, at the same time, "introduce as much as possible the element of personal character and adventure, when duly vouched for by contemporary chroniclers, or, what is better, by contemporary letters and documents." The work is very clearly the outcome of wide reading, moderate speculation, and a real judiciousness in using the material of imaginative chroniclers, without the pedantry either, on the one side, of undue credulity, or, on the other, of excessive scepticism.

The volume now published begins with the Roman occupation and ends, in the midst of the sixteenth century, with the "tragedy" of Cardinal Beaton. The reader who is acquainted with the various contributions of Mr. Lang to the study of primitive civilisations will regret that he has not found it consistent with the scheme of his work to give a somewhat fuller discussion of the origines and the early beliefs of the Scottish folk. He considers, indeed, the divergent theories of Prof. Rhys and Mr. Skene as to the Celtic or pre-Aryan character of the Picts and their relation to the certainly Celtic Scots. But he approaches the question purely from the side of philology, and refuses to deal with its more strictly anthropological aspects. "To discuss," he says, "the race and language of the tribes who incised on the rocks the universal hieroglyphs of early man, who used the polished neolithic weapons, to found theories on the shapes of skulls unearthed from burrows, is the province of another science, not of history." We rather demur to this. There is but one science of men, which is bound to draw its data from all sources indifferently, and certainly is not justified in consulting philology and neglecting craniology; and, sooner or later, historians will have to make up their minds to deal with the question how far a common language implies a common blood, on either or both of these a common religious and social organisation. Mr. Lang's treatment of the Celtic religion, again, is a little disappointing, consisting, indeed, mainly of a few pretty remarks about the Sidhe. Comparative folk-lore, however, affords material for a much fuller account, at least of the cult, if not the mythology, of the Scottish Celts; while even this latter can probably be to some extent reconstructed on the basis of popular legends and the fragments of the Ossianic cycle. On the other hand, Mr. Lang's summary of the nature and results, or want of results, of the brief Roman occupation of southern Scotland is excellent, and, better still the chapter called "Early Culture in Scotland," in which he deals with the obscure problems of crannoges, brochs, and earth houses, of the ogamic inscriptions, of the relation of Celt and Teuton, of tribal organisation, and of land tenure. Later on, a chapter on "Feudal Scotland" gives a similar survey of a further stage in the history of Scottish civilisation, and of the special forms taken by the universal West European institutions of feudalism in their application to the northern realm. All these synoptic chapters are very well done, and show real ability in the difficult task of extracting the essential from volumes of learned and often conjectural discussion. They are interspersed among other chapters of more direct narrative. Naturally, in handling the whole of the mediæval period of Scottish history, Mr. Lang is bound to keep before him the central theme of the relations between the Scottish and the English crowns. He traces, so far as the chroniclers permit, these relations during the dynasties of Kenneth McAlpine and Malcolm Canmore; and thus leads on to their dramatic outcome in the heroic struggles of the Wallace and the Bruce. Finally, he enters upon the chronicle of the mournful and fated house of Stuart. The reign of James the First, for all the failings of that high-handed monarch, is a pleasant oasis in the somewhat gloomy mediæval story. The forces of disorder were too much, in the long run, for James's gallant attempt to "make the key keep the castle, and the bracken bush keep the cow through all Scotland"; but, at least, he "would be a king," and legend gathered round his name. It need hardly be said that Mr. Lang dismisses with a sarcastic comment the somewhat flimsy theory which would deny to King James the authorship of "The King's Quair." With regard to "Kate Barlass," however, he is less conservative: "The legend of Catherine Douglas, who barred the boltless door with her arm, is, unfortunately, late and, perhaps, apocryphal." From James the First to James the Sixth the history of England is tragic, a "circle of calamity." The permanent element in the shifting phantasmagoria of royal minorities, intrigues, treacheries, and vendettas is "the essential and national idea of resistance to England"; and it was previously in the closest union with England that history had national salvation in store for the country. The accuracy of Mr. Lang's estimate, both of episodes and of the general trend of things, must be left to the specialist to judge. Likely, Mr. Lang will have enough of criticism, for Scots are not slow to controversy in a good, or other, cause. As to the literary qualities of the book, we may say a word. They seem to us of a very high order. Mr. Lang has the lightest of touches in the presentment of material, which he has put together with the most conscientious pains. We had not thought that a difficult and broken chronicle, filled with crabbed names, could be made so interesting in the reading. He has a keen scent for the picturesque in phrase and detail, for the colour of a scene, for the quaint homespun of a contemporary writer. A brief specimen of his easy and effective narrative will not be out of place:

Of Scotland under James I. we have a curious and well-known sketch from the pen of Æneas Sylvius Piccolomini. Sent by the Council of Basel, a very young man at the time, the future Pius II. came into the frozen north like a shivering Italian greyhound on a curling-rink. There was only a space of little more than three hours of sunlight in winter, a circumstance since altered in the progress of civilisation. He calls the king a square-built man and too fat. He was anxious to see the tree which breeds Solan geese, but it was too far north. The half-naked poor, begging at church doors [a queer thing for an Italian to complain of], received not bread but a stone, which is greasy and burns. There is no wood in this naked region. Not till he reached Newcastle on his way south did Æneas find himself in a decently habitable region. Frightened by a storm at sea, he had made a vow of a barefoot pilgrimage to White Kirk. The weather was frosty, and the pilgrim suffered grievous things. Scotland was a country of unwall'd cities: the houses, as a rule, were built without mortar, the horses were small, and curry-combs were unknown. Conversation was chiefly abuse of the English. When Regnault Girard came to bring the Daughter of Scotland to France, for her hapless marriage with the future Louis XI., he presented the queen with chestnuts, pears, and apples, and she was much pleased, for there is little fruit in Scotland. A mule was also a rare novelty, and much admired. Regnault speaks touchingly of the tears shed by James when he parted from his child.

Mr. Lang "was ever a fighter," and in these pages he more than once trails his coat. Mr. Henley brought a hornets' nest about his ears by praising Burns from a new and unconventional point of view. Mr. Lang is hardly less audacious in suggesting some qualifications of Knoxolatry. But his attitude towards Knox is as nothing when compared with his attitude towards the Douglasses.

Few things in Scottish history have been more disguised in popular books than the conduct of the house of Douglas. The comradeship of Bruce and the Good Lord James has thrown a glamour over the later Douglasses—men princely in rank, daring in the field, but often bitterly anti-national. The partiality of Hume of Godscroft, their sennachie or legendary historian, the romances of Pitscottie, the ignorance or prejudice of Protestant writers like Knox and Buchanan, the poetry of Scott, and the Platonic Protestantism of Mr. Froude have concealed the selfish treachery of the house of Angus!

This is Mr. Lang's deliberate judgment; nor can he, when he meets a Douglas in the highways or the by-ways of his book, restrain a passing sneer. The Douglasses doubtless have their hereditary sennachie still, and we take it that anent this book there will ere long be wigs upon the green. As for us, we are indifferent to the reputations of clans or of church reformers, but we cannot away with Mr. Lang's practice of grouping his references and minor notes at the end of each chapter. It does not really add to the comeliness of the printed page, for the reference numbers remain hung up there. And as a matter of convenience, it is detestable.

Compress! Compress!

First and Last Poems. By Arabella Shore. (Grant Richards. 5s. net.)

LENITY to poets is not a charge of which we should feel greatly ashamed, nor is it the most heinous in the catalogue of possible sins. But criticism has its duties, and Miss Shore's volume enforces their exercise. The tyro, it is true, has his privileges; but the fact that these poems are avowedly the work of a lifetime forbids her the privileges of a beginner, though the book itself might well seem to claim them. What is it that we are apt to find in female writers with no shadowy touch of the poet's impulse, no outflow of heart and fancy which makes for verse, causing us reluctantly to deny them the attribute of classicality? Unclassicality, being a negative quality, may present itself in many ways. Most often it takes the form of diffuseness, diction inclining to conversational and journalistic conventions, disillusionisingly work-a-day speech in a tongue which has its separate and inexhaustibly opulent language sealed to poetic service, unsoiled by profane use. There is no virtue, indeed, per se in a pilfered richness of far-brought jargon; but at least it gives some merciful disguise to poverty of internal idea. Weak substance shows weakest associated with the loose-fitting customary phrase; good substance is enfeebled when it is sent abroad in such uncouthly habit. Such unclassicality is far from the educated simplicity of art or plenary inspiration—which is the finest art; far as chicken-broth from Liebig's Extract, far as distilled water from keen spring-water. It is poetry in ready-made clothing. And the separation from the significant fulness and inclusiveness of the great poets is enhanced by little femininities of expression which fatally suggest the feeble impulsiveness of the drawing-room; little dilutions of sentence-structure which recall the watered prattle of five o'clock tea. "Compress!" we sigh irritably; "in pity of poetry, good Madam, compress!" This unclassicality, in more or less degree, we impute to Miss Shore.

A cloud—that's Future Life—what lies before.

Why tell us that future life lies before?

How stronger far

The grasp of what hath been than what shall be.

The weak tautology and the weak italics are alike characteristic.

Has God willed to tell

By means of some strong instinct—hope and awe—

That when the last sigh's uttered a soul springs

Out in a moment on God-given wings

To scenes undreamt of, nor by poet's rhyme

Pictured, nor traveller to earth's farthest clime.

"Some strong instinct," "earth's farthest clime"—what could be more vague, customary, juiceless, and inadequate than these phrases, except the nerveless structure of the whole passage? A little further on Miss Shore apostrophises those who

Hold the human creature just

A solid nothing, which is an absurdity that a little attention to meaning would have avoided. For, unfortunately, it is not only in form that she falls short. The saplessness which too often affects her language clings likewise to the substance. She is a meditative singer; but to be a meditative singer is not necessarily to be a thoughtful singer. Inexperience (specially female inexperience) loves vast, vague themes, which admit an interminable rambling looseness by their very absence of limit; so that no thought, however disjointed and inconsequential, comes irrelevant. Experience is well satisfied to make the most of a prudently contracted theme. Miss Shore is not a novice, but she shares this trait with the novice ambitious of profundity. One would spell "tyro" in such a title as Death and Immortality; or, Life and Death. A whole treatise of philosophy or theology might be written under the title. But the reader who adventures on Miss Shore's poem will not find himself carried out of his depth; though (if he be a logician) he may be out of his patience. In the less ambitious meditative poems a copious fluency of obvious reflections mingles with a regrettable lack of thought in the expression.

You lead us to the mountain-top
Where the great God who formed our kind
Sees, nor condemns, the tears that drop
From spirits bounded and half-blind.

Must one ascend a mountain-top for the Almighty to discern one's tears? And if not, what does the stanza mean? She wishes to Tennyson:

The God that did such sadness send Send thee all comfort with it too;

and then rejoices to learn that He has "brought my mystic wishes true." What is there "mystic" in so commonplace a wish? And when she concludes by bidding the late Laureate

Twine all lost desires
About this central shaft of hope, how can you twine a lost object about anything? These are trifles, but they are the trifles which make the difference between poetry and not-poetry. Nor can we say that the narrative poems, though better, reach any high standard. She concludes one poem on Woman with the words,

She asks no royal grant,
For she is free-born too;
Give her her human rights, and see what she can do!

Well, for one thing, she can write very much better poetry than Miss Shore has succeeded in writing. Better Miss Shore might write if she had a mind. "It is the mind," as Lamb said, "that is wanting." Heart and sensibilities she has in plenty; but for poetry a little more is needed, which Miss Shore has not yet attained.

Our Confounded Superiority.

Three Men on the Bummel. By Jerome K. Jerome.
(Arrowsmith. 3s. 6d.)

SUCH books as this are the despair of the reviewer. They do not, in fact, call for reviewing at all. They are written, they are published, the first edition consists of twenty thousand copies—and that is all that need be said. Their sole object being to make you laugh, if they succeed their existence is justified, and if they fail they are naught. To be quite frank, this particular book has not made us laugh at all, and therefore, as we have said, for ourselves it is naught. But as against this inability on our own part must be placed the testimony of a family of our acquaintance—collectively and individually quite as capable as we are—who have been reading Mr. Jerome's work in its serial form, and have laughed themselves weary over it, the test of our own laughter falls to the ground.

It might, however, answer the purpose of a review to inquire a little into the reasons why we ourselves have been unable to laugh. The chief and embracing reason is, of course, that we did not find it funny; but the case may be explored rather more fully than that. What, as a rule, does make us laugh? Well, we like a comic writer to have a gift of surprise. Mr. Jerome advertises the end of his joke from the very start. We like a comic writer to leave something to ourselves. Mr. Jerome leaves nothing. This is perhaps a sufficient explanation. But to go on, we like, in a narrative of the adventures of fellow-creatures on a holiday, to be a little bit interested in the minds of those fellow-creatures. Mr. Jerome has invented three of the least interesting figures that we can remember. And, finally, we like humour to be fresh. Mr. Jerome's mechanism is the mechanism of Mark Twain (which has been stale these twenty years), and he lacks any of that great humorist's inspiration.

Now, all this looks like a large indictment of Mr. Jerome; but we want it to be clearly understood that we consider it really an indictment of ourselves. Through an unfortunate familiarity with the books of a different class of writers, and a regrettable prejudice in favour of half tones, we have spoiled our mind for Mr. Jerome's peculiar qualities. It does not give us the least pleasure to realise this; on the contrary, when we remember the exultant faces of two boys who related to us—breathlessly, one helping the other—the substance of the previous instalment of Three Men on the Bummel in the paper in which it appeared, we are filled with sorrow, almost with shame, because our effort to pump up a little enthusiasm over the jest (it related to the discomfort of patent bicycle saddles), and to simulate something that should pass for laughter, was so ghastly a failure that all the happy spirits died out of the expression of those appreciative readers, and we saw, and saw it with the utmost concern—for they consider us somewhat in the light of a dictator on books—an air of misgiving take its place, as though the doubt as to whether this sort of thing really was so funny as they had thought were creeping into their minds. Mr. Jerome may rest assured that we said nothing to spoil his welcome in that house. And it is because we do not want to do so in any other house that we have endeavoured to explain the situation so minutely.

A Cape Politician.

The Life and Times of Sir John Charles Molteno, K.C.M.G., First Premier of Cape Colony. By P. A. Molteno:
2 vols. (Smith, Elder & Co. 28s.)

AT first sight it would seem strange that the life of a Colonial politician, even one who possessed a claim to remembrance in that he was the first Prime Minister of Cape Colony, could not be told in less space than two stout volumes which, between them, contain little short of a thousand pages. To tell the truth, we live so fast nowadays that Sir J. C. Molteno and all that he did, or might have done, are already in a fair way to be forgotten; and, therefore, it is not surprising that Mr. P. A. Molteno should think it his duty to bring the fact of Sir J. C. Molteno's existence, personal and political, once more before the public. But the mystery vanishes with reading. The book is not so much a life of a former Premier of Cape Colony as a long and violent attack on two great men who have passed away—Lord Carnarvon and Sir Bartle Frere—who were before their time, and, consequently, were misunderstood and abused in their lifetime, and whose honoured graves are no protection from the spite of lesser men. What is valuable in this "life" could have been told in a quarter of the space, and this revival of forgotten controversies will have but little interest for the public. Mr. P. A. Molteno is not always accurate in his facts and in his suggestions of fact. Careful reading shows that he is aware that Sir Bartle Frere did not annex the Transvaal; but the impression left on the mind of one who came fresh to the subject would undoubtedly be that the Transvaal in 1877 was a flourishing and not a bankrupt State, and that Sir Bartle Frere was prompted by original sin to swallow it up. On p. 200 of Vol. II. Mr. Molteno says: "It has been contended that Sir Bartle Frere was not a consenting party to the annexation of the Transvaal." Mr. Molteno must, however, be aware, as he has presumably followed South African questions, that the present Sir Bartle Frere not long ago called attention in the public press to an article written by his father in a magazine nearly twenty years ago, in which the ex-Governor of the Cape specifically declared that the annexation of the Transvaal was decided upon before he went out to South Africa, and that he was only connected with it after the event. A writer who takes upon himself to deal with the politics of that period should have known this fact even without Sir Bartle Frere's article, and certainly without the reminder by that statesman's son. If Mr. Molteno does know of it, he has been successful in concealing his knowledge.

But to turn to the nominal subject of the book. Sir J. C. Molteno was an Englishman of Italian descent, his father being in the Civil Service at Somerset House as Deputy Controller of Legacy Duty. The future Premier went out to the Cape in 1831 at the age of seventeen, and, after a few years' experience, started in business on his own account. Perhaps the most interesting part of the book is the short account of Mr. Molteno's life in the great Karroo, which was in those days much what the back country of Rhodesia is now. In 1843 he bought a farm at Nelspoort, at the foot of the Nieuwfeld Mountains, situated on the Salt River. The place is now on the railway, about halfway between Cape Town and De Aar Junction, of which so much has been heard of late. Not much over half a century ago, this part of Africa harboured a greater variety and a greater number of the largest animals in the world than any other continent. The abundance of food thus available led to a corresponding variety of carnivorous animals and birds of prey, the former being led by the king of beasts—the lion himself, while next to him came the fierce leopard locally called a tiger, owing to its cunning, its vindictiveness and strength; below these came numerous leopards in a descending scale of size, with wild dogs, wild cats of every kind, wolves, hyenas, and jackals. The lion was just emigrating from this district when Mr. Molteno arrived. His shepherds appeared before him in a scared condition, and reported having seen one in the long reeds of the Salt River Vlei soon after he had settled in this part. It may be easily imagined what formidable difficulties the presence of these wild animals presented to the stock farmer. . . . The larger game began to move away before man, and the defenceless sheep took its place, and was called upon to supply food to the vast number of carnivora which were in occupation of the country. The lambs were carried off in numbers by the jackals, the wolves and hyenas made away with the grown sheep, the tiger would descend from his rocky fastness and in one night would indulge his love of slaughter and his thirst for blood by destroying twenty or thirty of your most valuable sheep, merely drinking their blood at the throat, and leaving them otherwise untorn. At another time, desiring a change of diet, your promising foal was carried off, and your calves were dealt with in a similar manner.

In 1854 Mr. J. C. Molteno represented Beaufort in the Cape Parliament, and formed his first Cabinet in 1872. He remained a principal figure in Cape politics until 1882, when he finally retired and was made a K.C.M.G. on the recommendation of Lord Kimberley, who was then Colonial Minister. Sir J. C. Molteno died on September 1, 1886, at the age of seventy-two.

He had lived long enough to be above the bitterness of party feeling. His death was the occasion of a unanimous and sincere expression of sorrow from the whole of the country, and from all political parties, who felt that they had lost a great and good man, indeed "the most representative man that the country had yet produced, whose name will ever be associated with the history of the Colony, and whose public career may always serve as a model for men, possibly possessed of more superficial brilliance, but who will never outshine him in the sterling qualities of political honesty, sound judgment, and common sense" (Cape Argus).

This certainly does not exceed the bounds of panegyric. Sir J. C. Molteno was an honest, cautious, and conscientious politician, without much foresight or imagination. The vast changes which have taken place of late in South Africa were beyond his prescience, and his mind seemed unable to grasp more than the Cape Colony as it was when he knew it. His biographer has written his life from the same narrow point of view. As will be seen from the quotations, Mr. Molteno does not lay claim to any literary merit, or to any graces of style, and the book is emphatically not one to be taken up by the man wishing to learn the actual state of things in South Africa. It is an arsenal of controversial matter, intended first for the glorification of Sir J. C. Molteno, and secondly for the vilification of Lord Carnarvon and Sir Bartle Frere—if, indeed, the order should not be reversed. Still, it may be of some value to the future historian as giving the point of view of a certain set of politicians in South Africa, and for the sake of understanding that standpoint some will perhaps consent to wade through a mass of irrelevant matter. Had the book been the work of a judge and not of an advocate, the occasional passages in which Mr. Molteno hits the nail on the head would have had a greater chance of receiving attention.

Some Lessons for England.

Lessons of the War with Spain, and other Articles. By Alfred T. Mahan, D.C.L., LL.D., Captain United States Navy. (Sampson Low. 10s. 6d. net.)

CAPTAIN MAHAN'S aim in publishing these articles, collected from various American periodicals, is, as he says, to aid in the formation of an intelligent public opinion. And this not merely by pointing out the chief lessons which the American people ought to draw from their recent war with Spain. He thinks that the public should have a better acquaintance with the leading principles of warfare, which, as he says, are few and simple; and that the way to induce a better acquaintance in the public is to place before them narratives of warlike operations disencumbered of the detailed technicalities in which military and naval writers delight to array their works. The Lessons of the War with Spain is Captain Mahan's endeavour to supply such a narrative—what he calls a skeleton account of the operations leading up to the destruction of Cervera's fleet, with comments elucidating the principles, naval and military, on which they were based, or which they illustrate. It certainly fulfils his intention; its lucidity should make it understandable to any intelligent unprofessional reader, though perhaps an occasional danger of confusion might have been avoided by relegating to notes some of the incidental digressions in which the writer indulges, however timely and useful in themselves.

The book should be hardly less valuable to us than to Americans. If the excesses of the American "yellow" press (on which Captain Mahan is very severe) are avoided among us, it is none the less true that public opinion needs enlightening on many points. One lesson to which he calls attention has been driven home to ourselves recently. It is the ruinousness of preparing only or chiefly for defensive war. Sums of money are sunk on "home defence" which would better have been spent in preparing an expeditionary force, in strengthening our attack. For (apart from wars of the Boer type) the most effective, quickest, and least costly way of preventing invasion or attack by the enemy is to maim and occupy him by attack on his own resources. Mere defence, as the writer emphasises, leaves the enemy free to select his point of assault, while the passive side has to consider and guard every possible point of injury in a large extent of vulnerable spots; it leaves his sinews of war intact, even though his blows be baffled, and thereby lingers out the hostilities, which energetic attack might conclude at once—as happened with the American attack on Spain.

A cognate lesson is the neglect of coast defence, of fortifications. For lack of this, the American blockade of Cuba was never secure against attack, as it should have been. Cienfuegos and Havana both required blockade; but only the blockade of Havana could be secured by an adequate squadron of battleships. That of Cienfuegos could at any time have been raised by the appearance of a Spanish warship. And why? Because Schley's Flying Squadron, which ought to have been before Cienfuegos, was locked up in Hampton Roads, to calm the fears of the undefended and panic-stricken coast-towns. Only when Cervera's whereabouts was known could the authorities bring the Flying Squadron into action. Captain Mahan thinks that England's dependence on other nations for food supply makes coast defence less important to her, and reduces her to depend chiefly on her fleet. But it may be questioned whether the possible panic of our great coast-towns might not produce a more or less paralysing effect on a portion of our fleet, obliging it to be kept in home waters when it was seriously needed elsewhere.

Another point is the value of battleships which can act together as a fleet, having, at any rate approximately, the same speed and the same offensive power. Not speed, but combined weight of guns and ability to steam and manœuvre together is the desideratum. Therefore, he advocates building a number of battleships of a certain medium type and practically equivalent speed, rather than sink the money on a few ships of large size. In connexion with this, and to be noted because there is a popular delusion to the contrary, is his emphatic declaration that battleships do not become useless because they are "obsolete"—that is, because ships of superior design are built subsequently. In the first place, such "obsolete" ships can be used, like irregular troops, for secondary purposes, setting free the newer ships for the more important duties proper to them—an invaluable function. Secondly, and more important yet, it is the view of naval authorities that the first line of battle, even though victorious, would be crippled and used up during the encounters and accidents of the opening war. Final victory would then rest with the nation which had the most "obsolete" ships to fall back upon; to fill the gaps in its first line, or, if necessary, to form a new fleet. Then the value to England of her numerous so-called "obsolete" battleships would become evident, and probably turn the scale decisively.

Of the many other lessons drawn by Captain Mahan from the war we do not speak, though most valuable for a right understanding of hostilities by the public. We have contented ourselves with a few which appeared most directly applicable to England, and for the rest we refer the reader to his exceedingly valuable and able book.

Other New Books.

CRICKET IN MANY CLIMES.

By P. F. WARNER.

Mr. P. F. Warner (who is known to his friends and to ardent cricketers as "Plum") is the Middlesex amateur. After every English season, more or less, for some years he has added to the cricket of the summer—so insatiable are the sons of the game!—by joining an autumn or winter eleven for playing in other regions of the earth—the West Indies, America, Oporto, Canada, and South Africa—and it is the records of these tours which are given in his book. It was, perhaps, well to have them in this permanent form, for though many pages are necessarily rather small beer, and each bears a striking resemblance to the last, yet Lord Hawke, Mr. Warner's captain (to whom the book is dedicated) has done, by projecting these tours, so much for the cult of cricket in Greater Britain that a chronicle of the achievement is a valuable contribution to the history of the game. Mr. Warner's volume, however, has another value—it is vivacious and unaffectedly amusing. Many authors strive in vain all their life for these two gifts—vivacity and amusiveness. Mr. Warner steps lightly in, and, holding the pen with not a titho of the seriousness that belongs to his grasp of the bat, succeeds in capturing both. The book is the reflection of a happy, wholesome, public-school athletic temperament. (Heinemann.)

BRUGES: AN HISTORICAL SKETCH.

By WILFRID C. ROBINSON.

If we cannot say that Mr. Robinson has produced that history of Bruges which has hitherto been sadly to seek, in English at all events, he has unquestionably given us an attractive and exceedingly well-written book. It is not to be expected that everybody who writes about Longfellow's "quaint old Flemish city" should catch its atmosphere and fix its aspects with the consummate art of the late M. George Rodenbach—we know, indeed, of no book which suggests the tender melancholy and paints the dreamy existence of the half-dead city like "Bruges la Morte." It is a wonderful story of commercial splendour, sturdy fighting, utter decay and abject misery, which Mr. Robinson has to tell and tells so well, and there are some novel points in his volume which deserve attention. He calls in question, for instance, the statements of the old writers as to the enormous population of Bruges relatively to its area, and, much as he loves it, he seems to suggest that it can never have been the premier city of Christendom. We should have been glad to see less actual history—which is already familiar enough—and more about the literary and artistic associations of the town. We read of it in Dante. Caxton abode there for at least three years; it is highly probable that Sir Thomas More wrote part of his Utopia there; so literary was it, indeed, early in the sixteenth century, that to Justus Lipsius it presented itself as the flower and Athens of the Low Countries. With its Memling and Pourbus in art, its Simon Stevin in mathematics, its Breidel and De Coninck as warriors and statesmen, Bruges possesses a roll of fame which even its neighbour, Ghent, with its Van Eyck, its Charles V., and its John of Gaunt can hardly beat. But to-day it is as the "Ville Musée," with its sweet savour of antiquity, its contemplative streets, and the placid tranquillity of its life, that we all know and delight in it. (Bruges: Louis de Plancke. 4s.)

GOVERNMENT OR HUMAN EVOLUTION.

By E. KELLY.

During his connexion with the Good Government Clubs, which were organised in New York for the purpose of defeating Tammany Hall, the author of this book discovered that the world is out of joint, and he came to the laudable resolution to set it right. He found—what, indeed, he might have found at an earlier date—that very few people possess a working code of first principles, but simply vegetate in what has been aptly called "the furnished lodging of tradition." He accordingly worked out a systematic view of life so as to enable people to labour in unison toward a common ideal, and the result is the little volume before us.

The author covers a wide field, too wide, in fact, for the dimensions of his book. He travels, metaphorically speaking, from China to Peru, and has something to say about everything, but unfortunately he gives many openings for the guns of opponents. Thus he states, on the authority of John Fiske, that the infant brain is comparatively free from the convolutions which differentiate an educated brain from an uneducated one, and on the strength of this he argues that Nature brings a man into the world with a comparatively blank scroll upon which education can inscribe its law. But this is doing great injustice to that profound thinker, John Fiske, who contended that an infant's mind is not a blank sheet, but rather a sheet written over with invisible ink, and that the brain has definite tendencies even at birth. Again, we are asked to believe that Mr. Herbert Spencer would have us contemplate with philosophic calm the miseries of the world, and quietly look on while struggling humanity fought it out according to the Queensberry rules. This is worse than sheer nonsense, and a very superficial acquaintance with Mr. Spencer's teaching would have prevented the author from giving expression to such a baseless calumny. (Longmans.)

Fiction.

Sophia. By Stanley Weyman.
(Longmans. 6s.)

MR. WEYMAN'S twelfth novel gives an elaborate and life-like picture of English manners in the year 1742, but it is somewhat slight as to theme, and the interest is scarcely well-sustained. The characters, moreover, are not presented in such a light as to excite either much admiration or much curiosity. Sophia is a young girl of breeding, with most of the faults of the eighteenth century Feminine. She is hoodwinked by a scoundrel, and when Sir Hervey Coke rescues her from a precarious situation she behaves with something of that shrewishness which her sister, Mrs. Northey, had exercised towards herself. Sophia is by no means a fascinating heroine, according to Mr. Weyman. Sir Hervey makes a real man, but his passion for the missish Sophia seems to rest on a frail foundation. Mrs. Northey is the most convincing person in the story. Her tongue wags with an excellent realism, and though she is a detestable creature, we like her for her flesh and blood. Sophia's brother, Sir Tom, is a young fool; Lady Betty is a ninny; Mr. Northey is a pompous ass; Hawkesworth, Oriana, and Oriana's father are adventurers all, of a peculiarly loathsome kind: so runs the list. The fact is that in Sophia the ingenuous reader pines for something to love; Sir Hervey is not enough. The other sort of reader, the sort that looks the horse in the mouth, will perceive that the intrigue of the tale is badly managed; since in the first half of the book is Sophia all but freed from her entanglements when mere chance steps in at the last instant and bids the game continue; this means clumsy craftsmanship. He will also perceive that not once does the emotional quality of the story rise to any notable height. In this respect the best chapter is that entitled "King Smallpox":

On the huge low wooden bed from which the coarse blue and white bedding protruded, two bodies lay sheeted. At their feet the candles burned dull before the window that should have been open, but was shut; as the thick noisome air of the room, that turned him sick and faint, told him. Near the bed, on the farther side, stood that he sought; Sophia, her eyes burning, her face like paper. His prey then was there, there, within his reach; but she had not spoken without reason. Death, death in its most loathsome aspect lay between them; and the man's heart was as water, his feet like lead.

"If you come near me," she whispered, "if you come a step nearer I will snatch this sheet from them, and I will wrap you in it! And you will die! In eight days you will be dead! Will you see them? Will you see what you will be?" And she lowered her hand to raise the sheet.

He stepped back a pace, livid and shaking. "You she-devil!" he muttered. "You witch!"

"Go!" she answered, in the same low tone. "Go! Or I will bring your death to you! And you will die! As you have lived, foul, noisome, corrupt, you will die! In eight days you will die—if you come one step nearer!"

She took a step forward herself. The man turned and fled.

Let us add that there is much quiet goodness in the book, and a continual striving towards naturalism and an avoidance of outworn conventions.

The Kings of the East. By Sydney C. Grier.
(Blackwood & Sons. 6s.)

In this novel Miss Grier continues the adventures of the Mortimer family among European politics. "Count Cyril" now figures as the central impulse of a movement for the transformation of Palestine into a true Hebrew realm. "What a future would lie before the country which had the support of all the Jews in the world!" exclaims the Count, with his incurable grandioseness of idea. Lady Phil, his niece, is passionately wooed by a king, but ultimately, in a manner highly conventional, marries an excellent young Cambridge person of the name of Mansfield. The whole book, under an outward aspect of freshness and diversity, conceals a steadfast and immovable conventionality. Lord Caerleon's letter to his brother in Chap. II., for example, is a piece of pure convention—as conventional as a "stage-letter." And what shall be said of a passage like the following?

"I should like to say a word or two to that fellow," muttered Mansfield, indicating by a backward glance the oracle of fashion.

"I earnestly hope you won't. In the first place, he would not understand your German, and your righteous indignation would therefore be wasted. In the next, I would rather not kill him if I can help it."

"Kill him? How?"

"With a sword, my dear youth. Excuse me, but you are really so refreshingly young. Is it beyond your powers of imagination to conceive that if you insulted him he would forthwith challenge me?"

"I can look after my own quarrels, Count," very haughtily.

"In that case I should very soon have a funeral to look after in the British cemetery," was the calm reply.

The fact is, Miss Grier's recipe for the manufacture of cosmopolitan novels is growing effete with use. She is a clever craftsman—constructs well, writes well, and wears the cloak of omniscience with ease and grace. Her work is readable, and agreeable enough so long as you maintain towards it an attitude of polite interest. But if you demand from it more than you would demand from an acquaintance it will fail you, because it has nothing more than this to give.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

HILDA WADE.

BY GRANT ALLEN.

This series of episodes was appearing in a magazine at the time of Mr. Grant Allen's death, and it is understood that he considered it his best work of fiction. It is a story of advanced medical science, in which Hilda Wade's womanly intuition in reading character, temperament, and physical signs, places her almost abreast of the great Prof. Sebastian. Hilda Wade and Sebastian are soon pitted against each other in a deep private concern affecting the memory of Hilda's father. Both characters are powerfully drawn. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

FROM DOOR TO DOOR.

BY BERNARD CAPES.

Mr. Capes has here printed stories contributed by him to a number of magazines, and six others which appear for the first time. The miscellaneous character of the collection is indicated in the sub-title: "A Book of Romances, Fantasies, Whimsies, and Levities." Mr. Capes's now familiar style is very apparent, dip where one will: "Now, as they stood a moment, watchful of each other, the apple in the peasant's throat flickered of a sudden; and immediately a rising moan, a very strange little ululation, began to make itself audible, and the man lifted his chin, as if to give some voice in him freer passage." (Blackwood. 6s.)

FROM SAND-HILL TO PINE.

BY BRET HARTE.

Seven short stories, all characteristic: "A Niece of 'Snapshot Harry's'" is the story of a coach accident in the Rockies; "A Jack and Jill of the Sierras" is a mining story, with a romance in it; and in "A Belle of Cañada City," "Mr. Bilson's Housekeeper," &c., we are in familiar Bret Harte environments. (Pearson Ltd. 6s.)

NELL GWYNN—COMEDIAN.

BY F. FRANKFORT MOORE.

With a very light hand Mr. Moore weaves some of the incidents of Nell Gwynn's life into a readable story. We meet Nell outside the King's Playhouse in Drury-lane, selling her oranges, and joking with the Duke of Buckingham and Sir Charles Sedley and finally with the King when he leaves the theatre. "'Tis either a fortune or a huge misfortune," says her plebeian lover, Dick Harraden, when Nell is engaged by Mr. Killigrew to act in the King's company. The vein of comedy is kept throughout, and the story is illustrated by photographs. (Pearson Ltd. 6s.)

KIDDY.

BY TOM GALLON.

Mr. Gallon's gallery of Dickensian characters is distinctly enriched by "Kiddy" and the Deak family. The picture of Mr. Deak, the desk-bound, soul-crushed plutocrat who has never known the joy of life, and is aware of it, is capitally drawn. His niece, Kiddy Tremlett, is his ray of sunshine, and her love affairs supply Mr. Deak with emotions and incidents which amply compensate for the dulness of his earlier life. "The fierce joy or pain of living had passed him by . . . now, with the obstinacy of the inexperienced, he would have been glad to clutch—gingerly, perhaps—at Sorrow's robe, if in that way he might see life." (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE SANCTUARY CLUB.

BY L. T. MEADE AND R. EUSTACE.

A medical-psychological series of episodes, with which the Sanctuary Club—an advanced sanatorium at Hampstead—has only a general connexion. The narrator acts as doctor and personal friend to many of the patients, and has "to face adventures the most thrilling and dangers of so hairbreadth a character that even now my pulse quickens when I think of them." (Ward, Lock. 5s.)

BY MRS. L. T. MEADE AND

WHERE THE SHOE PINCHES. CLIFFORD HALIFAX.

Mrs. Meade's industry is uncanny. Here, in collaboration, she relates the experiences of a London doctor who sees "day by day human nature without any gloss upon it," and who undertakes to show "where the shoe pinches in many lives." Sixteen shoes are described, and their cruel points indicated. (Chambers. 3s. 6d.)

TO THE HEALING OF THE SEA. BY FRANCIS H. HARDY.

A capital love story, starting with a Stock Exchange disaster in New York, whereby Carroll Livingstone is compelled to leave America to avert ruin. On the St. Paul he meets Clara Eastwin—"both new to the sea and its invitations; strangers to the forcing and fusing isolation of steamer life." The steamer life is made delightful to the reader, and the ultimate saving of Livingstone's reputation is an exciting financial episode. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

A CYNIC'S CONSCIENCE.

BY G. T. PODMORE.

A clever story of duplicity in love. Stanley Wade is a weak and dreaming egotist, whose self-flatteries and shifts of conscience are laid open mercilessly. Winning a girl's love by crooked methods, he has the grace to save her from himself in the end. The story is not exactly easy reading, but is above the average in aim and ability. (Arnold. 6s.)

THE PURPLE ROBE.

BY JOSEPH HOCKING.

Lancashire Nonconformist life is drawn in Mr. Hocking's new story, and the incidents arise out of a debate between Duncan Rutland, the new minister of Tudor Chapel, and Father Sheen, the Roman Catholic priest of the town. Duncan Rutland's controversial victory, the advent of a Jesuit father to repair the damage done to Catholicism, and Duncan's love for Alison Neville, a Roman Catholic young woman of high birth, are handled in Mr. Hocking's characteristic way; and the end is, of course, Alison's conversion to Protestantism, and great glory to Tudor Chapel. The story is well adapted to its predestined readers. (Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.)

A PLAIN WOMAN'S PART.

BY NORLEY CHESTER.

A tranquil love-story, in which children play a great part. The background is rural, and the narrator is a "Good Fairy" to the heroine, Doris, whose first love affair turns on a bottle of acid drops. (Arnold. 6s.)

THE CROWNING OF GLORIA.

BY RICHARD REARDON.

We begin with a Sussex lane and a young temperance orator who is in danger of being badly beaten by his audience until the heroine arrives with a horse-whip, when love and village politics begin to divide the reader's attention. The heroine's name is Gloria, and the story is like that. (John Long. 6s.)

THE ATHERSTONE BEQUEST. BY MRS. CHARLES E. TERROT.

A novel of the picnic and tea-tray order. There is much marrying and giving in marriage. Everybody and everything are accounted for, and the last chapters seem alive with babies and complacent mothers. (Burleigh. 6s.)

TONY LARKIN, ENGLISHMAN. BY MRS. EDWARD KENNARD.

"The path of duty is the road to glory," and it is trodden by Tony, who begins as the typical stupid, but plucky, army candidate, and ends by taking the Victoria Cross and attending at Windsor. To his sweetheart he describes the Queen as "a regular brick." "She said I was to come again in a fortnight, and bring you with me, as she wishes to make your acquaintance and present you with a Cashmere shawl." (Hutchinson. 6s.)

A GIRL OF THE NORTH.

BY HELEN MILCOTE.

The "girl of the north" is Launa Archer, and her "north" is Canada. We find her motherless at fifteen, with English and French blood in her veins, and a suspicion of Indian blood. "Her voice had a low, soft richness in it that reminded Mr. Archer of a squaw." In London, whither she soon came, Launa was a success. "Being a Canadian, all things were expected of her; and being rich, all things were forgiven her." The story resolves itself into a biographical circle, Launa reverting after many days to her love of Canada and her Canadian lover. (Greening. 6s.)

DAVID POLMERE.

BY MRS. LODGE.

"To enumerate the throng of fashionable folk that congregated in St. George's Church, Hanover-square, to witness the ceremony would be to copy a few pages out of the Peerage. The bride looked lovely in Duchess satin. . . ." (Digby, Long & Co. 6s.)

BY LONE CRAIG-LINNIE BURN.

BY ARCHIBALD McILROY.

Village politics and homely ways and people in a remote Scottish village in the sixties. The advent of the railway is described, and the village doctor's heroism in a diphtheria case. (Unwin. 2s. 6d.)

AN IMPERIAL LIGHT HORSEMAN.

BY HAROLD BLORE.

A story of the war and Boer life generally, by a writer who was born in South Africa, and once talked with President Kruger. The battle of Elands Laagte, the siege of Ladysmith, and the life of prisoners in Pretoria are described. (Pearson Ltd. 6s.)

ORA PRO NOBIS.

BY JAMES BAGNALL STUBBS.

"A novel," says the title-page; but "a tract" would describe the book more accurately to the novel-seeking reader. (Skeffington.)

The Author of "The Farringdons."

An Enquiry.

It is no fault of Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler's that she has been recently classed with the great novelists of the nineteenth century; but the opprobrium of an indiscreet admirer's foolishness usually attaches also in some degree to the object of admiration, and so, in the minds of those who care for literature, there must, however illogically, be a certain faint resentment against Miss Fowler herself because of her success. In writing her three facile and vivacious novels she was probably innocent of any suspicion that, being taken seriously, they would reach an aggregate circulation of a hundred and twenty thousand copies, and so place her where she at present is, in the very pupil of the public's eye. No matter! One may trespass innocently, but the penalty remains. When she hears the cold and inimical question, "What are you doing up there, and how did you get there?" Miss Fowler will have either to answer it by her books, or, soon or late, obey the harsh behest: "Descend." And that last will be the sufficient penalty.

Without offering any prophecy whatever as to the future, it is safe to assert that Miss Fowler has not yet even begun to prove a title to the position into which she has been thrust. If the wonderful vogue of Concerning Isabel Carnaby was disconcerting, the still more wonderful vogue of A Double Thread was absolutely bewildering. As for The Farringdons, though it is the best of the three, it marks only an inconsiderable advance, and a brief examination of it should show clearly that it deserves no better adjective than "bright." The heroine of The Farringdons is Elizabeth Farringdon, a distant cousin of two South Staffordshire Methodist spinsters, Cousin Maria and Cousin Anne, who owned a vast ironworks and ruled a district. The proper heir to the ironworks had been "a handsome, weak boy," named George, who ran off to Australia, and rumour said that he had married and died out there, leaving a widow and a son. The hero of the novel is Christopher Thornley, nephew of the general manager of the ironworks. The birth of Christopher was not quite free from mystery, for his mother (like handsome, weak George) had run off and got married, and, a stricken widow dying in a London lodging-house, had confided Chris to his uncle's care. Elizabeth and Chris, companions from childhood, fall in love, but only Chris is aware of the fact. Elizabeth by turns caresses and flouts him, and the honest-hearted youth keeps well the secret of his devastating passion. In due course Elizabeth grows up, and a clever and plausible stranger comes to occupy a neighbouring chateau, "The Moat House." We need scarcely state this stranger's name: it is Tremaine. If it had not been Tremaine it would have been Darcy. Tremaine, scoffing at creeds, and professing the vague religion of humanity, "gradually unmoored Elizabeth from the old faiths in which she had been brought up." Everyone else detected the hollowness of him; the common people defeated him utterly in spiritual argument, and Chris succinctly called him a conceited ass; but he imposed on Elizabeth. He might have married her, had he not unfortunately proposed to her immediately after a religious service at which she had "found the Christ." In that moment of ecstasy she was enabled to form a true estimate of his worth. Ultimately he married her school friend, Felicia, and had an unhealthy child, and was converted at its death-bed. Cousin Anne and Cousin Maria died, and Elizabeth became heiress to the Farringdon possessions, provided always that the true missing heir should not be discovered. Chris was the executor of this will, and he departed to Australia to search for the heir. Elizabeth burgeoned out into a great painter of moral ideas. She entered the art-world, shone at an Academy soirée, queened it in the highest circles, and nearly fell a victim to another deceiver, Cecil Farquhar. From Cecil she was saved by the pathetic appeal of a young woman whom the scoundrel had deserted in favour of Elizabeth's gold. Finally, she married Chris, who, it should be superfluous to explain, was himself the missing heir. Such is the plot. Outside the plot, and not connected with it, are a number of persons whose business it is to talk apropos des bottes. Chief among these are Mrs. Bateson and Mrs. Hankey, two Methodist housewives of the working class. The one is an optimist, pre-occupied with marriages; the other a pessimist, preoccupied with funerals. Their grotesque, farcical, and sometimes amusing chatter fills scores of pages. With one exception, not a single character in the book is at once realised and original. Save only Elizabeth, they are all either labelled and well-worn types, like Christopher and the spinster cousins, or mere names, like Felicia and Cecil Farquhar. Elizabeth has some existence and some originality. She is a very trying creature, often violently rude, and capable of atrocious vulgarity in the unwearied effort to be smart; but she is alive, and she possesses good impulses and a warm heart.

It is no doubt partly due to defects of plot and of character-drawing that the tale leaves no impression of reality, but another equal cause of its failure lies in the author's apparently complete ignorance of the craft of telling a story. Every chapter is a proof of this ignorance. Chapter IV., for example, entitled "Schooldays," and consisting of seventeen pages, is made up as follows:

Death of Cousin Anne and its effect on Elizabeth	... ..	2 pages.
Description of school and headmistress	... ..	3 "
A conversation on ideals concerning the future between Elizabeth and Felicia	... ..	3 "
A conversation about everything and nothing between Mrs. Bateson and Mrs. Hankey	... ..	7½ "
Miscellaneous matter	... ..	1½ "
Total	... ..	17 "

After this manner two years highly important in the moulding of Elizabeth's mind are expeditiously dealt with. The whole book is like Chapter IV., a shapeless medley of utterances which are chiefly beside the point. Miss Fowler is always forgetting her story and then returning to it with a sudden, alarmed start. It is the trifles, the surfaces of things, the unimportant side-issues, that engage her inconstant mind. Like her volatile heroine, she must be continually talking—stating, contrasting, sermonising, and composing essays instead of attending to business. Miss Fowler has accomplished the reductio ad absurdum of the amorphous English novel. She never grapples with a situation or an epoch of development; she never has time to do so. She makes Elizabeth pass from an amateur to a recognised artist in four lines. She is for ever telling you about her characters and never presenting them. The intimacy between Elizabeth and Tremaine gets as far as a daily interview before the latter has opened his mouth to the reader. Miss Fowler is so busy with ideas—very superficial ideas—that mere men and women are forced into a secondary position. That the characters of the tale are not firmly established in her mind as living entities, that they are not authentically imagined, is shown by the fact that often, from sheer thoughtlessness, she allows them to behave in a manner utterly impossible. The notion of Elizabeth driving round the country alone with Tremaine in Tremaine's mail phaeton would have staggered Cousin Maria, but Miss Fowler seems to regard it as a most ordinary procedure for a young girl reared behind the high spiked walls of strict convention. This is a mild instance. A much more serious one is Farquhar's letter to the sweetheart whom he jilted—a piece of caddishness and fatuity of which it is inconceivable that even Farquhar could have been guilty.

The prevailing quality of the book, colouring it everywhere, is its crudeness—of style, thought, feeling, and wit—the immature crudeness of a clever girl who, while already proficient in the jugglery of phrases, has yet everything to learn about life and about literature. Miss Fowler has no literary charm, no sense of style, no reverence for her art. She quotes two lines from one of the loveliest passages in all Shakespeare (Constance's outburst, King John, Act III., Scene 1) and perpetrates a misquotation in each line. Here is a specimen of her metrical chapter-headings:

Shall I e'er love thee less fondly than now, dear?
Tell me if e'er my devotion can die.
Never until thou shalt cease to be thou, dear;
Never until I no longer am I.

A merely literary crudity will affect the large public neither one way nor the other, since the large public is entirely uninterested in questions of style; but all other crudities appeal strongly to that public; and herein lies the main secret of Miss Fowler's popularity. On p. 185 occurs the following sentence: "She had run downstairs at full speed in order to enter the dining-room before the dishes, completing her toilette as she fled; and she had only beaten the bacon by a neck." After reading The Farringdons from end to end, that phrase persistently haunts us, the supreme example of Miss Fowler at her most characteristic—beaten the bacon by a neck. It is precisely by such phrases that the large public is diverted. One of them would secure the success of a page, and Miss Fowler will put twenty on a page. She can produce titillating phrases as easily as a conjurer showers rosettes and guinea-pigs from an empty hat; and it is the endless titillation of them which constitutes her readableness. Wit, fancy and philosophy—Miss Fowler pours out her treasures with marvellous fecundity and untiring glibness. There are no intervals, no dull moments. You might say of this book, as of a well-known public resort—"fourteen hours' continuous amusement." Not the most casual bit of description but is fully adorned. Listen:

Sedgehill High-street is nothing but a part of the great high road which leads from Silverhampton to Studley and Slipton, and the other towns of the Black Country; but it calls itself Sedgehill High-street as it passes through the place, and so identifies itself with its environment, after the manner of caterpillars and polar bears, and other similarly wise and adaptable beings. At the point where this road adopts the pseudonym of the High-street, close by Sedgehill Church, a lane branches off from it at right angles, and runs down a steep slope until it comes to a place where it evidently experiences a difference of opinion as to which is the better course to pursue—an experience not confined to lanes. But in this respect lanes are happier than men and women, in that they are able to pursue both courses, and so learn for themselves which is the wiser one, as is the case with this particular lane.

The fact is, that the uncultivated reader is content to live wholly in and for the moment, sentence by sentence. Keep him amused and he will ask no more. You may delude him, you may withhold from him every single thing to which he is rightfully entitled, but he will not care. The more crude you are, the better will he be pleased.

It is a magic gift, this power to titillate—an absolution for every sin of omission and commission, a blind for all defects. It will excuse the inexcusable. It caused thousands of people to condone the amazing plot of A Double Thread, and it will cause the same thousands to ignore the multifarious delinquencies of Miss Fowler's latest work.

There are, of course, subsidiary elements of popular success in The Farringdons—the trite old-fashion of the plot, the sugared sentimentality, the smoothing-down of event and of character so as to avoid that disturbance of fixed and roseate ideas which the general reader seldom pardons in any novel. And there is the moral tone. "The tone of these books is so excellent," said a minister of the Established High Church to his bookseller. "I can put them into the hands of any of my young people." "Don't you think they are rather flippant?" the bookseller suggested. "Oh, no!" answered the parson, "It's all done in the right spirit." And it is. One may applaud Miss Fowler's spiritual intentions almost without reservation. She is cocksure, pert, superficial, slangy, unseemly (in a literary sense), and her hard, patronising attitude towards the universe is notably annoying; but at the root of her is something which makes for tolerance and moral, if not artistic, righteousness.

Things Seen.

The Mongrel.

I SAT by a roadside and two boys passed that way. The one was strong and sturdy: he was tanned with wind and weather, he clumped along in hob-nailed boots, and from his jacket pocket dangled the end of a rope.

The other was frail, stunted, and lame. He hung behind, partly because of his lameness, partly because he was carrying something, and that something was a dog—only a little one-eyed mongrel, with a shaggy, ill-kept coat and a limp, bandaged paw.

"Step out, can't ye?" bawled the boy in front: "let the bloomin' dawg do 'is own walking; 'e won't git no more chance!" and he laughed.

But the lame boy said nothing, only held his burden closer; while his features twitched, and the dog put up its head and licked the thin, fallow face.

They passed by, and I followed them with my eyes. It was springtime. About me throbbed a world of quickening life. There was the chirping of birds, the buzzing of bees, the bursting into bud of countless green things; there was the sweet earthy smell of the fresh brown mould, the warm touch of the sun's first kiss.

The first boy stooped and sought about, and when he rose I saw a big stone in his hand; then he drew the rope from his pocket and fastened the stone to one end; and I thought of the pond, lying deep and silent below the dip of the hill, where the mill-wheels sing their ceaseless song all through the summer-time.

Then the boys disappeared from sight, and I sat thinking.

After a time I heard a cheery sound—it was the first boy whistling, for he felt the joy of life, and behind him lagged the lame boy; his arms were empty, and now and then he drew the back of his hand across his eyes, for he felt the pain of death, the void and the loneliness.

Solomon's Seal.

THE rehearsal was over. From the stage door of the Theatre of Varieties emerged a troupe of about a dozen men. They shivered in their fancy Oriental costumes as their dark skins came in contact with the cold air. On the bills they figured as "Arabs," albeit their native country was Morocco. They were at once surrounded by the small boys of the street. Through these they patiently filed, until they reached a small tobacconist's. They all crowded in, and their leader, the only one who knew any European tongue, began to bargain for cigarettes in a mixture of broken English and German, the latter because he and his gang had just come from fulfilling an engagement on the Continent. The shopkeeper studied them with a languid interest, and when, after considerable wrangling and fumbling, they finally collected among themselves enough to pay him, he suddenly opened his till, and, taking a coin from an inner compartment, thrust it into the hands of the spokesman. "I reckon that piece of money came from your country," he remarked. He was right. It was a "floos," the smallest of Moroccan small change, a rude farthing of copper, with a double triangle, the so-called "Solomon's Seal" standing out in high relief. The effect of this talisman upon the acrobats was instant and amazing. Trash as it was, it recalled to each of them a long-lost home. In one dazzling flash each saw what he had left. One saw himself in the desert, free, with horse and gun, free; another felt the intoxication of hashish, and remembered a familiar divan, and familiar ecstasies. To one, the magical hexagon spoke of a dead woman; to another it was the living, a pair of black eyes behind a lattice, eyes that he knew had long been consoled. Each dreamed his dream. The interpreter solemnly kissed the token; "Maraksh!" he whispered, and passed it to the next man, who also raised it to his lips. Each in turn pressed upon it that sacramental kiss; then, taking up their purchase, they quietly shuffled out into the night.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

A French Apostle of National Energy.

IN travelling about this small globe, nothing has so much struck me as the complacent ignorance each race lives in of every other race. A Spanish general once doggedly maintained before me that while in England the young girl is outrageously emancipated, the British matron lives in such a condition of unexampled servitude as not to be free to speak in the presence of her husband and son. In the Philippine Islands he had met some cowed lady of England who, when he addressed his speech to her, turned her eyes imploringly upon her mate, mutely soliciting permission to reply to the don. The husband answered for her, and the lady sighed and looked away. He based his observations of the customs of Great Britain upon this single fact. Once more was I startled in a like fashion. An Austrian and a French lady discussed in my presence the unhappy position of Englishwomen, and stoutly affirmed that these martyrs of harsh domestic law have not the right to eat at their husband's table. "The husbands and sons eat together in the dining-room, and the poor women eat with their children upstairs in the nursery," they explained. Though the Spaniards are enormous eaters, it is a fixed idea in other countries that they live upon bread and olives, that the table of the nobles is of a classic frugality, and I have even heard a Frenchman insist that there is no such thing in Spain as a genuine nobleman, that the aristocracy is composed of shoddy rastaquouères and masquerading beggars. These are people you must not hope to teach. Neither travel, nor books, nor the commerce of men will assist them to knowledge that would shatter their temple of prejudices. And the more fixed and impenetrable by light are these prejudices, the more astounding their ignorance of races as good as their own, the more passionate their hatred and contempt of every land and people existing by the idle grace of an injudicious Deity, be sure the greater is their claim to the virtue of patriotism.

In France, to be a patriot implies also declared war within those frontiers with all who bear a name with any taint of cosmopolitanism about it, a name that does not savour of old France; with, as well, those of the purest-sounding of French names should their owners happen to be Protestants, Freethinkers, Freemasons, or members of an anti-Nationalist government. Anti-Semitical ladies teach their dogs to bark when the word Jew is pronounced in their presence, and mothers are not ashamed to teach baby lips to lip in public at the sight of a chosen nose: "Sale Juif."

This would be ridiculous enough if it were not so inexpressibly sad. For it is ever a sad spectacle to see the immense majority of a nation at war with the best part of that nation—its thinking, disinterested, and liberal minority. And when a country whose idol is a General Mercier offers as a bribe all chances of success and social prestige we may not wonder that the circle of honest souls should be as narrow as the little band of early Christians gathered of old in the Catacombs. Pending the hour when Mercier's honoured ashes will be carried in triumph to the hall of heroes—the Pantheon—his admirers are busy compiling a Nationalist literature. Its lights are many, but none of such an opaque luminosity, such an aggressive dullness, such repellent modernity as M. Maurice Barrès, whose Appel au Soldat has just appeared. It is the second interminable volume of a trilogy in honour of national energy. The first was the unreadable and extraordinary Déracinés. Has an author the right to give such a misleading title as "novel" to books like Déracinés and Appel au Soldat?

Déracinés was a pretentious and uninteresting history of the development of seven Lorraine youths of different rank, who are in a kind of Dumasesque conspiracy (without any of Dumas' wit and high-spirited charm) to conquer Paris. The writer's object is to expose to us the evils of uprooting from the soil of provincial souls. I cannot say what Lorraine would have made of these mediocre sons adrift from her bosom. Paris, of course, made nothing of them. There is not a generous, a noble, a disinterested trait among the seven; and, considering their youth and the purpose which brings them to Paris, we cannot accept, as Mr. Barrès does, that mere contact with the capital has so speedily vulgarised and degraded them. Noble and studious and disinterested provincials live all their lives in Paris around us, and die undegraded and undiminished by years spent upon the banks of the lovely Seine. But vulgar-minded, voracious young wolves who come to devour or be devoured will naturally follow the path of M. Barrès' seven Lorraine youths.

The Appel au Soldat carries us into the famous and trivial Boulanger conspiracy. M. Barrès is a passionate Boulangerist, ever waiting and watching for a second Boulanger. It is an open secret that he is his hero of predilection, François Sturel, the ardent follower of Boulanger. The difference between the Appel au Soldat and the ordinary roman à clef is that no key here is needed. M. Barrès gives the names in full. Cornelius Herz, Baron Reinach, the unhappy Joseph Reinach, Paul Déroulède, Dillon, Boulanger, Mme. de Bonnemains, all political and journalistic Paris, is here named in full. We see the fantastic Déroulède in his different ineffectual and rather silly dramatic scenes with that ineffable humbug, the hero of café chantants, General Boulanger. We are spared no cough of the unfortunate Marguerite. Boulanger, as painted by his fervent follower, is an appalling specimen of a political mountebank. One never realised more terribly than in these deadly dull pages the truth of General de Gallifet's words in the Chamber the other day—the fool had not even the makings of a criminal in him. The charlatan who knows himself for a charlatan is usually a very clever man, but the charlatan who takes in himself as Boulanger did is predestined for inglorious failure. In the hands of a writer of some dramatic instinct, with only a modist share of the novelist's art, with a large and luminous style, and a creative as well as an analytic gift, the amazing story of Boulanger's rise and fall, his inexplicable popularity—based on good looks of a very common kind, and a black charger—his instant desertion and melodramatic end, might have made an excellent subject of a novel. But M. Barrès writes a deplorable and exasperating French, and his novels resemble the lives of his seven Lorraine youths. They are not illuminated by a single ray of sunshine, by a smile, by a witty or humorous phrase, by a vivid description, by a pleasing sentence. Style so dense, figures so inanimate, speech so dull and vulgar, scenes so purposeless, so unrevealing, so lacking in all the attributes of dramatic art, it would be impossible to match elsewhere. If you were to patch together a series of newspaper articles upon persons and public events during a certain set of years, the result would be a book much resembling Appel au Soldat. Only the chances are, it would be a great deal more readable, for few newspaper editors would tolerate a style so inarticulate, so stupidly impenetrable, meaning so little in an idle pretentiousness of envelope as that of M. Maurice Barrès. And certainly no editor out of Bedlam would print the terrible chapter "La Vallée de la Moselle," recording the wanderings of two of our Lorraines in search of their national roots in about 150 pages. The Prussians in this period of the awakening of national energy are handled as in the subsequent period the Anglo-Saxons may expect to be handled. In the valley of the Moselle we are told that "these excellent folk have all the distinction of old towns, apply themselves all the more to the practice of courtesy and urbanity in reprobation of that Teutonic heaviness which will always seem black-guardism to French sensibilities." It would be curious to learn what aspect "French sensibilities" have for the German mind. As revealed by the eminent Maurice Barrès, the word goujaterie would not be altogether inappropriate. The author, under the thin disguise of François Sturel, comports himself with complacent grossness and ineptitude. His envenomed hatred of his old master Bouteiller is scarcely more unintelligent than his deification of a cheap idol like Boulanger. And his relations with Mme. de Nelles, his accomplice in the inevitable tale of adultery, are displayed with a hideous cynicism, an absence of heart, or even passion, which leave us abashed by the thought that there are men and women who can find their pleasure in sinking for so little. As the heroine is merely a name for us, without character or features or any physical, moral or mental trait to enable us to take the faintest interest in her fortunes, it does not excite our indignation to find her falling into the arms of a lover without even the saving excuse of persecution and overmastering temptation. Her fall, like her personality, is described by words that have no actual significance for us. It is as if a stranger in a train were to say to you: "In such a year I had a mistress whose favourite colour was red and who was fond of music." You would learn of the insignificant fact, and an hour afterwards remember nothing of the lover or his mistress. And just so indifferent are we to Mme. de Nelles, so unmoved are we by her love, which is silly and unclean, and by her suffering in neglect, which is shallow and vain. As for her lover, we are stupefied by his fatuity and vulgarity. An animal could not possibly put less heart and brains into its loves than this mediocre partisan, who, not at all offered us as a type of political adventurer, exclaims brutally on learning of his chief's defeat: "Boulanger is but an accident. We'll find other Boulangerisms." This, we know, is the gallant Paul Déroulède's theory, who stoutly professes himself to be a Boulangerist waiting for a second, a third, a fourth Boulanger.

There is one little sentence in these dull 550 pages that has a touch of humanity, of feeling, a faint whiff of delicate sentiment. Writing of Boulanger's desperate solitude after the death of Mme. de Bonnemains, he says: "In these funereal soliloquies his whole being, once a little vulgar, optimist and sociable, was transformed under the beneficent influence of sorrow." The last line is "death to traitors and robbers." Here is prophecy of a future war-cry. H. L.

Correspondence.

Shakespeare in Fiction.

SIR,—In to-day's ACADEMY "The Bookworm" asks if the late William Black introduced Shakespeare in person into his story called Judith Shakespeare. He did. The Bard appears at New Place, and is then writing "The Tempest" and "The Winter's Tale." Though the book can hardly be called a success on the whole, parts of it are very charming.

Other novels in which Shakespeare is introduced are The Jolly Roger, by Hume Nisbet; Master Skylark, by J. Bennett; and Shakespeare and his Friends, published anonymously in Paris in 1833, not to mention Mr. Lang's unpublished Elizabethan romance, in which, he tells us, Shakespeare speaks in blank verse! No doubt there are very many others in which Shakespeare appears, a list of which would be interesting.—I am, &c.,

CHARLES R. DAWES.

Birmingham: May 5, 1900.

The Name of the Novelist.

SIR,—While reading the first page of the ACADEMY for May 5 this evening, I came across the question, What is the name of the novelist whose writing of a story has encouraged the breaking open of cases in our museums?

I might suggest Mr. Conan Doyle, who wrote a story dealing with an Oriental Professor and the theft of an Eastern jewel from a case in the British Museum. This short story appeared in the Strand Magazine. I can't tell the month, but, as far as my treacherous memory will aid me, I believe it was about a year ago.—I am, &c.,

SUTHERLAND WILSON.

Lancaster College, West Norwood, S.E.:

May 6, 1900.

The Missing Word.

SIR,—The word (for "citizen of the British Empire") is badly wanted; but if "Englander" and "Briton" will not do, it follows a fortiori that no other word of local derivation will do. Neither will any word derived from "Empire." Imperium et libertas is a splendid motto, but the imperium and its derivatives, without the libertas, suggest chiefly two-headed eagles, conscript armies, and autocrats. Let us therefore still keep the two; let the Empire still be the Empire; but let its parts be called Freelands, and the inhabitants thereof Freelanders. If we have taught the world anything, it is surely the use of freedom. Maximum of consent and participation, minimum of compulsion, interference, and disability—these have been the watchwords of the growing Empire, and they are the only ones which can ensure its permanence. Let us now perpetuate them in a living name. Incidentally, too, this name might serve to remind a portion of the foreign world that a free land is not necessarily a republic, and vice versa.—I am, &c.,

R. J. LLOYD.

University College, Liverpool: May 5, 1900.

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

GIBBON'S DECLINE AND FALL OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

EDITED BY J. B. BURY.

This is a great piece of editing, considered merely in its quantity of research and annotation. It is obvious that Gibbon's history requires, and may yet require, the assistance of later scholars to make it accurate. Gibbon's accuracy was wonderful, but it was relative to his opportunities. As Mr. Bury says: "The discovery of new materials, the researches of numerous scholars, in the course of a hundred years, have not only added to our knowledge of facts, but have modified and upset conclusions which Gibbon, with his materials, was justified in drawing." The issue of this edition, now completed, is a literary event of no small importance. (Methuen. 7 vols., each 8s. 6d.)

THE LIFE OF LIVES.

BY F. W. FARRAR.

Dean Farrar introduces his new work on the Life in these words: "Twenty-six years ago I was led by 'God's unseen Providence, which men nickname Chance,' to write a Life of Christ. . . . The object of the present book is different. It deals with questions of high importance which the Gospels suggest, and aims at deepening the faith and brightening the hope in Christ of all who read it honestly. Sis sus, sis Divus, sum Caltha, et non tibi spiro." Among the many subjects dealt with are these: "The Unique Supremacy of Jesus," "Lessons of the Unrecorded Jesus," "John the Baptist," "The Form of Christ's Teaching," "The Apostles," "Gethsemane," &c., &c. (Cassell.)

THE POETICAL WORKS OF MATHILDE BLIND.

EDITED BY ARTHUR SYMONS.

It will be remembered that Mr. Symons put forth in 1897 a selection from Mathilde Blind's poetry, with an appreciation. He now gives us a complete collected edition of her poems, and his appreciation disappears (we regret) in favour of a short preface. However, Dr. Richard Garnett supplies a memoir, in which he gives the simple facts of Mathilde Blind's life, and sums up: "Mathilde Blind would have been more popular if she had been less ardent and more conciliating; she would have been a more accomplished writer if the passion for essential truth had not made her unduly indifferent to artistic finish; but after every allowance has been made, her poetry remains noble in execution as in aspiration, and her character was even more noble than her poetry." (Unwin. 7s. 6d.)

FOUR MONTHS BESIEGED.

BY H. H. G. PEARSE.

Mr. Pearse represented the Daily News in Ladysmith during its siege. Many of his letters never reached his paper, being taken from native runners or blue-pencilled by the censor. Two or three letters did appear, but the rest of the book is new. Mr. Nevinson's book, Ladysmith: the Diary of a Siege (Methuen), appears simultaneously. (Macmillan. 6s.)

1815: WATERLOO.

BY HENRY HOUSSAYE.

This is the French standard work on Waterloo, and its name is familiar in every discussion of Wellington's victory. An English translation was, therefore, much to be desired, and the present version will meet the want. It is made from the thirty-first French edition of Houssaye's great work by the author's permission. A short critical introduction would, we think, have been appreciated by most readers. (Black. 10s. net.)

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 33 (New Series).

THE Pickwickian exercise which we set last week has not tempted a great many competitors. We think that Mr. Lewis Longfield, of 1, Thyra-villas, Ramsgate, has probably entered into Mr. Pickwick's mind, and divined his language more closely than the other competitors. To Mr. Longfield, therefore, a cheque for one guinea has been sent. Mr. Longfield's reply is as follows:

In propounding my somewhat startling Tittlebatian theory I entertain some misgivings as to the reception of the fruit of my unwearied researches. Every novel invention, even where destined to revolutionise existing systems, meets unvarying opposition. It is a small thing to say that the theory of tittlebats has from time immemorial been the fulcrum of the see-saw of scientific discussion. I protest against the commonly accepted solution that the tittlebat originated from the eggs of a little bat, which fell into and were hatched in a pond, and I defy the author of that theory to prove that even a big bat has ever laid a single egg! (Great applause.) I have no doubt that "tittle" is but a dialectal variation of "stickle" or "prickle"; moreover, I am assured that "bat" is merely a corruption of "back." Children and yokels will soon outrage language if the literary policeman is off his beat! (Protracted cheers.) Now the tittlebat possesses a dorsal fin spiked with "prickles." I believe then, nay, I assert, that "tittlebat" is but a demoralised form of "stickleback." (Sensation.) I now call the attention of this learned house to the fact that the perch, a fish vastly eulogised by one Izaak Walton, possesses a dorsal fin, remarkable chiefly for its stickley prickles. Research shows that it frequents the deeper waters, whereas the shallows are the haunt of the subject of our discussion. My theory may be summed up in the phrase, "adaptation to circumstance," and I believe that it establishes a new law which deprives the Perch of any other appellation than that of the Greater Tittlebat! (Vociferous cheers wherein the great man's concluding words were whirled away in the current of applause, thus constituting a loss irreparable both to the scientific world and to mankind at large.)

Among the other replies is this:

What does Izaak Walton say on the momentous subject of tittlebats, or, as he calls them, sticklebags? The kindly, cold-blooded fisherman regards this most interesting of fishes merely as a bait merely as a substitute for minnows. To use his own words: "I know not where he dwells in winter, or what he is good for in summer, but only to make sport for boys and women-anglers!"; and to feed other fish that be fish of prey, as trout, in particular, who will bite at him as at a penk." Thus does man subvert all nature to his own uses: the sun to light his day, the moon (intermittently) to illume his night, and the gallant, invincible little tittlebat to serve him as bait for "trouts"! But what is the true mission in life of this tiny warrior? From our childhood upwards we have observed his swift, subtle movements, the iridescent, plated armour he bears on his sides, and have felt the formidable spines with which his lower and upper surfaces are protected. Is a creature so panoplied, so swift and eager of movement, created for no other purpose than to be the food of sleek, smug, self-satisfied trout? You will find the answer to this question—if I may use the expression—in his mouth. He is not only the most warlike, but the most voracious of fishes. His is the predatory mission to keep down the nadue growth of the piscine race by devouring their spawn. But for him perch and trout might wax and grow till the Hampstead ponds were filled with huge, wallowing behemoths, and the smooth surface of the Serpentine were stirred by the fins of pike as long and lithe as the sharks of Eastern seas.

Competition No. 34 (New Series).

WE offer a prize of ONE GUINEA for the best description of a motor-car by Dr. Johnson. Competitors are to assume that Dr. Johnson met a motor-car, proceeding at full speed, for the first time in a rural walk—say, for instance, during his tour in Scotland, and afterwards gave his opinion of it in his Visit to the Hebrides. Not to exceed 150 words.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, May 15. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the third column of p. 416, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

"...A very delightful book, which will be read from page to page once at least by the average reader, and at least by anyone who may claim to have any special knowledge of the points at issue. In his treatment of the negro problem of the future, Mr. Livingstone exhibits not only a judicious, but also a masterly judgment."

The Literary Week.

THE annual dinner of the Society of Authors held last Thursday was one of the most successful functions this flourishing Society has held. The speeches by Mr. Anthony Hope, Mr. Bernard Shaw, Lord Monkswell, and Mr. Henry Norman, were good and to the point; and the ironic humour of Mr. Pinero, who took the chair, if it bewildered some, pleased others. Mr. Pinero speaks as he writes. As Mr. Norman pointed out, there is always an idea at the back of his levity. As most modern authors are novelists, it was perhaps to be expected that of the three great men referred to by Mr. Pinero as having passed away from us lately—Dr. Martineau, Mr. Ruskin, and Mr. Blackmore—the latter name only should have been greeted with applause. Mr. Anthony Hope referred to the Pension Scheme originated by the Society, and suggested that those present should subscribe half-a-guinea each. One pension will be given next year.

THERE is a swashbuckling vigour about the chapter headings of Mr. Benjamin Swift's new novel, Nude Souls, that is rather attractive. The ball opens thus: Chapter I. "Warns the reader of the true nature of the book." Chapter II. "Again warns the reader to expect no romantic nonsense here, but a most tragic business." Chapter III. "Hopes that all persons sniffing for what they call romance will by this time have laid the book down, at last convinced that there is absolutely none of the exquisite drivel here."

WE could wish that one of the war correspondents in South Africa, instead of adding to the innumerable accounts of the campaign, would narrow his horizon, and write a book under some such title as, say, "Things Seen in War Time." Here is an incident, a "Things Seen" noted by Mr. H. F. Prevost Battersby, known to novel readers as "Francis Prevost," who is doing such excellent work for the Morning Post:

Riding into Osfontein were a bearded scout and a Lancer, the Lancer with a face still pink from home. The scout touched the other's arm and pointed to a field mouse on the veldt in front of them washing his face in his paws. The youngster dug in his spurs, lowered his lance, and lifted the living, quivering little beast impaled like a tent peg on the point of it. He waved it, laughing as he reined round his horse, but was met by a mouth of such damnation as took the colour out of his cheeks. At his sulky expostulation the elder man suddenly checked his tongue, adding, when they had ridden on together, half ashamedly and with eyes averted, "I've seen enough o' dead things."

In spite of the keen eyes and busy pens, it is probable that we who sit at home and wait will never know the real, awful reality of war and its effect on the individual. If the story of the "nine or ten mental cases" referred to in the paragraph that follows could be told by some writer of genius, and remembered, would it not hasten the day of universal peace?

Mr. Lynch came back on the Kildonan Castle. Among the 300 sick and wounded were nine or ten mental cases, men who went out of their minds at Magersfontein.

WE regret to hear of the very serious state of Mr. Stephen Crane's health. He is now at Dover waiting till he is strong enough to be taken to the Black Forest.

Richard Yea and Nay is the title of Mr. Maurice Hewlett's new romance. It is well advanced, but has not yet left his hands. The central figure is, of course, Richard Cœur de Lion.

LORD FREDERIC HAMILTON, who has edited the Pall Mall Magazine since its foundation, has resigned, but he will continue to control the magazine till the autumn.

A SCOTCH correspondent writes: "'C. K. S.' in the Sphere, apropos of Mr. W. D. Christie's excellent edition of Dryden in the "Globe" series, says that he cannot find the editor's name in Who's Who. 'C. K. S.' also regrets that Mr. Christie has done so little literary work. The fact is, that Mr. Christie died in 1874, four years after the "Globe" Dryden was published."

Thirteen Stories will be the title of Mr. Cunninghame Graham's new book. Mr. Graham has had the labour of re-writing them, as the MS. was destroyed in the Ballantyne fire last December.

THE production of Prince Otto on the stage will be an interesting event. Mr. Gerald Gurney and Mr. Thalberg will be responsible for the adaption, which was begun some years ago. When Mr. Gurney wrote to Mr. Stevenson respecting terms, the author of Prince Otto replied:

Savernac Lake, Adirondacks.
DEAR SIR,—It will be time (pardon my pessimism) to think of that when your piece is produced. But I am sure that whatever you and Mr. Thalberg shall think right will gratify me; and, indeed, I am already gratified by your proposal.—With every wish for your success, I am, yours and Mr. Thalberg's,

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.
It may interest you to know that Prince Otto was originally a tragedy, and, by my sooth! in blank verse. I still think it has much that is very suitable to the boards.

R. L. S.

IF we had proposed a competition for the probable reply that Signora Duse would make to an interviewer who asked her opinion on Mr. Samuel Smith's "on-slaught on the drama" in the House of Commons, would the replies, we wonder, have been anywhere near the reality? We are indebted to the Daily Mail for the reality. Said the distinguished actress: "I have just been reading Taine's Restoration of the Drama. His opinions are mine." Neat, brief, and final—just the way to answer an interviewer.

MR. ARTHUR SYMONS dedicates his translation of D'Annunzio's play, "The Dead City," to the author in these terms: "To Gabriele D'Annunzio I dedicate this translation, begun at Arles and finished at Toledo, the two dead cities which I love most in Europe." The play is in five acts, and contains but five characters.

WE have received from Paris the first number of a new monthly magazine called Iris, the first French review, it is claimed, that is exclusively devoted to literature and art. Iris is a comely little magazine, opening with a few columns of paragraphs under the title "Un Peu Partout." These are followed by a conte, and this by an essay under the general title "Opinions." "Mon Livre" is the heading of a series of articles in which authors will describe their forthcoming books, an excellent notion. This month M. Gustave Kahn gives a foretaste of a book he is about to publish entitled L'Esthétique de la Rue. Reviews of books, a dramatic criticism, and a musical article follow; and there are other details. A poem by Emile Verhaeren, called "Les Dunes," is full of descriptive feeling and melancholy cadence. We are tempted to quote a portion of it:

Voici le pays blanc des dunes
Que les siècles ont ravagé
Sommets fendus, vallons rongés,
Montagnes mortes, une à une.

Le ciel, la mer et leur ceinture d'ouragans !
Et ceux qui vont à l'autre bout du monde
Les vents, les vents hurleurs, les vents sifflants
Portant l'hiver, dans leur fronde.

Depuis longtemps, sont morts l'été, l'automne ;
Octobre est loin, avec sa brune monotone,
Avec son deuil de pourpre et son silence ;
Et maintenant, voici
L'hiver, l'hiver sauvage et sans merci
Et ses mois noirs qui recommencent.

Les villages souffrent, là-bas,
Les toits ployés sous la tempête,
Pauvres, tristes, serrés par tas
Comme des bêtes ;
Le soir s'abat, et l'horizon se fend,
La muette entière des nuées
Hurle vers l'ombre et seule une cloche remuée
Répond encore, avec des pleurs d'enfant.

Et sur la plage, où s'échevèlent
Ces denils à l'infini,
Traient, en bandes parallèles,
Les défilés des sables gris ;
Les oiseaux fuient, la grève est vide,
Le navire se fond dans l'étendue humide :
Tout le néant semble marcher
De lieue en lieue, avec la mer.

WE shall notice in detail Mr. Winston Churchill's London to Ladysmith via Pretoria next week; meanwhile, we will quote its dedication, which is not without originality:

THIS COLLECTION OF LETTERS IS INSCRIBED TO
THE STAFF OF THE
NATAL GOVERNMENT RAILWAY
WHOSE CAREFUL AND COURAGEOUS DISCHARGE OF THEIR EVERY-DAY DUTIES
AMID THE PERILS OF WAR
HAS MADE THEM HONOURABLY CONSPICUOUS
EVEN AMONG THEIR FELLOW COLONISTS.

The story of his escape which Mr. Churchill could tell is not fully disclosed in this book, for a reason stated in the Preface: "The fact that a man's life depends upon my discretion compels me to omit an essential part of the story of my escape from the Boers; but, if the book and its author survive the war, and when the British flag is firmly planted at Bloemfontein and Pretoria, I shall hasten to fill the gap in the narrative."

DIPPING into Mr. Churchill's pages we observe that books played some part even in his captivity in Pretoria. While waiting for the favourable moment to elude the sentries Mr. Churchill tried, he tells us, to read

Mr. Locky's History of England, "but for the first time in my life that wise writer wearied me." Again, when his escape had electrified Pretoria the Volksstem observed, as a significant fact, that the fugitive had recently become a subscriber to the State Library, and had borrowed Mill's essay, On Liberty. "It apparently desired to gravely deprecate prisoners having access to such inflammatory literature. The idea will, perhaps, amuse those who have read the work in question." It will.

OUR excellent contemporary, the Dial, of Chicago, published its twentieth anniversary number on May Day, and printed a survey of the development of American literature during its lifetime. "To maintain a high standard of literary criticism, and to advocate the cause of the higher culture," is to be the Dial's continued aim. Among the "Tributes from our Friends" appears this characteristic note from Mr. Andrew Lang:

I hope the Dial's sun will never go back on it (a circumstance unusual, but with Biblical precedent).

THE Goncourt Academy may easily become something of a force in French literature. Its formation has been regarded with somewhat languid interest, but it is quite possible that when it begins making literary awards the eyes of young Frenchmen will see in the dead Goncourt brothers a living Mæneas. The Goncourt prize, which may amount to 5,000 fr., will be awarded this year for the best prose work of imagination published during the year. One gathers that the experimenters, the seekers after new conventions, and all who can show a fresh talent and bold methods, will have the favourable consideration of the judges, who will be ten members of the Academy. One can easily see that the Goncourt Academy may be as useful in evoking young effort as the Academy is in registering permanent success. All depends on the way in which the awards are managed.

THERE appears to be no certainty that the Tennyson MSS. recently brought to light in Sheffield will be published in whole or part. How these documents have been overlooked so long, even when the searchlight was being used by Tennyson's son and biographer, we do not know. The letters in the collection are undated, but are said to have been written in 1832 and 1833. They are the letters of Tennyson and Arthur Hallam to W. H. Brookfield, one of Tennyson's college friends. The poetical MSS. include early drafts of "The Lotus Eaters" and "The Lady of Shalott," showing many variations from the published text. These should be highly instructive to students of poetry. The letters and MSS. are now in the possession of Colonel Brookfield, M.P.

A WRITER in Scribner's Magazine has taken on himself the office of recording angel in respect of the sins of grammar committed by great writers. Among moderns Thackeray seems to have been the least careful of grammatical laws. In The Newcomes he actually writes:

Miss Cann, who was from Bayhams, having been a governess to the young lady who is dead and who now makes such a livelihood as she can best raise, by going out as a daily teacher.

Scott writes in Kenilworth:

They stood now in an avenue overshadowed by such old trees as we have described, and which had been bordered, &c.

Among Mr. Thomas Hardy's slips are the following:

Her first thought was how would she be able to face her parents.—Tess of the D'Urbervilles (xli.).

Like all people who have known rough times light-heartedness seemed to her too irrational.

The Mayor of Casterbridge (xiv.).

LADY BURTON has reissued her husband's poem, the Kasidah [couplets] of Haji Abdü Al-Yazdi [Sir Richard Burton's nom de guerre]. It was composed seven years before FitzGerald's rendering of The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám, with which it is boldly compared by its admirers. It was first printed in 1880, and in 1893 Lady Burton included it in the Biography of her husband; again, in 1894, a limited edition of one hundred copies was printed. In her introduction to the poem as now issued Lady Burton says:

I was laughed to scorn by a small section of the press for the following remark in my late Life of Sir Richard. I said "that I did not believe that this poem had its equal, that it is quite unique." I said "it will ride over the heads of most, it will displease many, but it will appeal to all large hearts and large brains for its depth, its height, its breadth, for its heart and nobility, its pathos, its melancholy, and its despair. It is the very perfection of romance; it seems as the cry of a Soul, wandering through space, looking for what it does not find. I have read it many times during my married life, and never without bitter tears, and when I read it now it affects me still more; he used to take it away from me because it impressed me so."

Lady Burton then quotes two highly eulogistic opinions of the poem by Mr. W. D. Scull and Miss Guglielma Francis Moss. Mr. Scull wrote: "It seems to me worthy to stand level with the greatest poems of the Earth, and in front of most." We shall deal with the Kasidah in more detail. Meanwhile, we will quote a few lines from a poem for which so much is claimed:

But we? Another shift of scene, another pang to rack the heart;
Why meet we on the bridge of Time to 'change one greeting and to part?

We meet to part; yet asks my sprite, Part we to meet?
Ah! is it so?

Man's fancy-made Omniscience knows, who made Omniscience nought can know.

Why must we meet, why must we part, why must we bear this yoke of MUST,

Without our leave or askt or given, by tyrant Fate on victim thrust?

That Eve so gay, so bright, so glad, this Morn so dim, and sad, and grey;

Strange that life's Registrar should write this day a day, that day a day!

Mine eyes, my brain, my heart, are sad—sad is the very core of me;

All wearies, changes, passes, ends; alas! the Birthday's injury!

Friends of my youth, a last adieu! haply some day we meet again;

Yet ne'er the self-same men shall meet; the years shall make us other men:

The light of morn has grown to noon, has paled with eve, and now farewell!

Go, vanish from my Life as dies the tinkling of the Camel's bell.

MR. RUSKIN was one of the wealthiest writers who ever lived in this country, and he used his wealth to develop his own and other people's minds. It is interesting to notice that whereas he inherited nearly £200,000 from his father, his own net personal estate was only a little more than £10,000. In his will, which was published too late for our notice last week, Mr. Ruskin said:

I leave all my estate of Brantwood aforesaid and all other real estate of which I may die possessed to Joseph Arthur Palliser Severn, of Herne Hill, in the county of Surrey, and Joanna Ruskin Severn, his wife, and to the survivor of them and their heirs for their very own, earnestly praying them never to sell the estate of Brantwood or any part thereof, nor to let upon building lease any part thereof, but to maintain the said estate and the buildings thereon in decent order and in good repair in like manner as I have done, and praying them further to accord during thirty consecutive days in every year such permission to strangers to see the house and pictures as I have done in my lifetime.

Mr. Ruskin left his unpublished MSS. and diaries "to Mrs. Joanna Ruskin Severn, and Mr. Charles Eliot Norton, of Cambridge, Massachusetts, to deal with, publish, or destroy all or any of them in such way and to such extent and at such times as they think fit." His copyrights, stocks of books, plates, and wood blocks, &c., &c., were left to Mrs. Severn and Mrs. Alexander Wedderburn, but subject to the condition that Mr. George Allen should be retained as publisher, that out of the profits of publication £100 a year should be paid to Mr. Wedderburn, and then not exceeding £1,000 a year to Mr. and Mrs. Severn for the maintenance of Brantwood, and that any balance of profit should be invested. By a codicil made three years ago Mr. Ruskin modified the condition as to the employment of Mr. Allen as publisher.

MR. DOOLEY and his friend Mr. Hennessy have been talking over the Paris Exhibition, and Mr. Dooley predicts that next winter will be a hard one for the rich—they will spend so much money in Paris:

I ixpict to have people dhroppin' in here nex' fall with subscription-books f'r th' survivors iv th' Paris Exhibition. Th' women down be th' rollin'-mills 'll be sewin' flannels f'r th' disthressed millionaires, an' whin th' childher kick about th' food, ye'll say, Hinnessy, "Just think iv th' poor wretches in th' Lake Shore dhrive, an' thank Gawd f'r what ye have."

Mr. Dooley has his own opinion about the real attractions of Paris this summer:

No, Hinnessy, they'll be manny things larned be Americans that goes to Paris, but they won't be about th' convansion iv boots into food, or vickey varsa, as Hogan says.

An' that's r-right. If I wint over there, 'tis little time I'd be spindin' thryin' to discover how th' wondhers iv mechanical janius are projocced that makes livin' so much more healthy an' oncomfortable. But whin I got to Paris I'd hire me a hack or a dhray painted r-red, an' I'd put me feet out th' sides, an' I'd say to th' dhriver: "Rivolutionist, pint ye'er horse's head to'rds th' home iv th' skirt-dance, hit him smartly, an' go to sleep. I will see th' snow-plough show an' th' dentisthry wurruk in th' pa-apers. F'r th' prisint I'll devote me attintion to makin' a noise in th' sthreeets an' studyin' human nature."

"Ye'd be a lively ol' buck over there," said Mr. Hennessy admiringly. "'Tis a good thing ye can't go."

"It is so," said Mr. Dooley. "I'm glad I have no millyonaire rilitives to be dependint on me f'r support whin th' show's over."

THE impact of the work of one sort of man on an opposite sort of man—as, for instance, of Mr. Kipling's mind on Mr. Le Gallienne's—is always interesting. The personal criticism thus evoked may not stand, but it is of the kind which, by flowing into the sluggish stream of accepted opinion, freshens and even diverts it. As an example of what we mean, take this short review of a new edition of the Letters of Thomas Gray, by a writer of Walt Whitman's school of thought, from the Conservator:

When I read these letters, issued in a mechanical setting of extreme beauty, I do not wonder that Gray wrote but one poem which the world has remembered. The editor speaks of Gray as "beyond doubt a great letter writer fallen on the great age of letter writing." I do not know what constitutes a great letter, nor by what power a letter is carried beyond its own contemporaries. Certainly Gray was not a man vital enough to star into a post-mortem heaven. I am disposed to accept him at his own figure when he describes himself as a "grand picker of straws, and push-pin player in ordinary to her Supinity—the power of Laziness." What word is spoken in these letters which has to us the slightest contemporary interest? I admit their finish in verbal full dress. The reply to my questions is perhaps in the assurance of the publishers that they have sold an edition of the book.

One would not call that correct criticism, yet it tends to correct the best criticism. It is medicinal.

A WRITER who signs himself "A. C. D." makes a vigorous protest in the Pilot against the "six-shilling dreadful"—in other words, against the gloomy novel of the hour which is labelled "powerful":

The trick of this kind of writing is so easy! Few things can be more simple than to place a character or group of characters in disagreeable surroundings, to insist on every detail of their unpleasantness with lingering emphasis, and then to string together enough grimy incidents to fill the required number of pages. Yet many of our critics seem blind to the fact that "disagreeable" is by no means synonymous with "powerful." Novels of another mode—novels in which life is pictured less violently, in which the pigments are less crude and bizarre—are each dismissed by the reviewer in half-a-dozen lines as "an inoffensive little tale." The "depressionist" book, on the other hand, is accorded a column of serious notice, and not seldom of extravagant eulogy. To write a book of this class is to tread an easy path to reputation, so the fact that a number of authors select this road is not surprising. "Yes," replies the critic, "but this is only another way of saying that you care nothing for art. What you like is an old-fashioned, commonplace story, over which you can fall asleep." To which, perhaps, the reader may return a flat denial. He does not want a soporific; but still less does he desire an emetic.

THE collection of prints of Old London which, as we mentioned a fortnight ago, is possessed by the Bishopsgate Institute, is, we find, separately catalogued. The catalogue is sold for threepence.

MR. J. CHURTON COLLINS has prepared for Messrs. Methuen's Standard Library an elaborate edition of Lord Tennyson's Early Poems. It is a reprint of the volume which was published in its definitive form in 1853, with the addition of a long critical introduction and copious notes, textual and explanatory. The work also contains in an appendix all the poems which Tennyson afterwards omitted, permanently and temporarily.

Bibliographical.

I HAVE more than once remarked upon the lack of initiative exhibited nowadays by the "revivers" of English literary classics. Two more instances of that lack have come to light in the announcement that the two next volumes of the "Temple Classics" will consist respectively of Poems by Matthew Arnold and the Silix Scintillans of Henry Vaughan. Of Mr. Arnold's non-copyright verse, surely there are already sufficient reproductions—namely, that in the "Canterbury Poets" (edited by Mr. Sharp), that in Messrs. Routledge's "Olive" series (1896), and that (edited by Dr. Garnett) in the "Nineteenth Century Classics." A fourth seems somewhat of a superfluity. As for the Silix Scintillans, I have before me a copy of the reproduction (in facsimile) of the first edition (1650), published in 1885 with an introduction by the Rev. William Clare. This had been preceded in 1883 by a revised reproduction of the Rev. H. F. Lyte's reprint of the second edition of Vaughan's work (1655), in which the edition of 1650 was augmented by the addition of pieces from Thalia Rediviva. Let us hope that the text of the "Temple" edition will be taken direct, and without variation, from the volume of 1655.

Whence did Washington Irving derive the inspiration for his story of Rip Van Winkle? The other day a publicist asserted positively that the legend of Sleepy Hollow was based upon the old German tale of the Hartz Mountains called "Carl the Shepherd." I believe that Mr. S. J. A. FitzGerald, in the book concerning Rip which he is to issue in connexion with the forthcoming play at Her Majesty's, will argue that Irving found the basis of his tale in that of Peter Klaus, of which Mr. FitzGerald will print an English translation. The point is certainly one of literary interest. Mr. FitzGerald will also sketch the theatrical history of Rip. That has already been done with some thoroughness by Mr. William Winter in his little book on the Jefferson family. See also the Autobiography of the present Joseph Jefferson, wherein will be found a full account of the dramatic version in which he first appeared in England in 1865, and in which the second act (wherein Rip is the sole speaker) was wholly Jefferson's invention.

The promised biography of James Russell Lowell by Mr. H. E. Scudder, though in two volumes, will of course have many interested readers. Lowell was an attractive man, from several points of view, and Mr. Scudder may have something new to tell us about him. And yet one hardly sees what more there can be to say. Seven years ago we had, from Mr. Eliot Norton, Lowell's Letters, in two substantial volumes, and in the previous year we had had, from the pen of Mr. F. H. Underwood, a monograph on Lowell as poet and man. Last year there were two books by E. E. Hale on Lowell and his friends; and, altogether, that estimable writer seems to have received adequate attention. That a full-blown biography should now be on its way to us is a pleasant tribute to his continued popularity.

I see Because of Elizabeth Jane advertised as the title of a new work of fiction. Somehow or other, the phrase reminds me irresistibly of a refrain in a well-known comic opera—"All on Account of Eliza." In the christening of their works, novelists are hard put to it for originality.

Nothing is more notable, in the recent history of popular pastime, than the unexpected resuscitation of croquet—that game which Frederick Locker and Cholmondeley-Pennell celebrated in flowing verse, and in which we middle-aged people used, as youngsters, to delight. Four years ago Mr. J. D. Heath favoured us with The Complete Croquet Player, and in the following year Mr. A. Lillie gave us the History and Rules of Croquet. In 1898 came a "Champion Handbook" to the game; last year Mr. L. B. Williams wrote elaborately on the subject in "The Isthmian Library"; and, as if all this were not enough, we are now threatened with a book on Croquet Up to Date! Personally, I hope the new croquet is a little more difficile and scientific than the old, which was wholly unworthy of the attention of anybody not in his first or second childhood.

A writer in the current number of the Sketch, reviewing a new impression of Dean Stanley's Life of Dr. Arnold, commits himself to the statement that that work "has not till now been reprinted in a cheap form." As a matter of fact, an edition of the Life, at the small price of two shillings per copy, was issued by Messrs. Ward & Lock (as part and parcel of the "Minerva Library") so long ago as 1889. Since then, of course, a new generation of reviewers has arisen, to whom English literary output, prior (let us say) to "the early nineties," is a complete blank!

Poor old Frankenstein! He is still being confused with the Monster he manufactured. I read on page 210 of Miss Violet Markham's South Africa, Past and Present, just published: "We ourselves, by a series of follies in years long past, reared this Frankenstein of Dutch discontent and disloyalty."

Reviews.

Balzac Intime.

Letters to Madame Hanska, afterwards Madame Honoré de Balzac, 1833-1846. By Honoré de Balzac. Translated by Katharine Prescott Wormeley. (Boston: Hardy, Pratt & Co.)

WE dealt in our issue of May 5 with the question of the authenticity of some of these letters. We will now turn to the general matter of them. If ever a book deserved to be called "a human document" this does; it cries aloud for the useworn term, freshens it, and gives it a new significance. Written with a flying pen and a bursting heart at once naïve and profound, in night-moments snatched from incredible labours, full of passionate longing, and pride, and childishness, and debts, and aspirations springing always out of despairs, these letters give a picture of Balzac intime surpassing in poignancy any previous one. The wonder is that they have not compelled more attention, have not yet even been published in this country; for their interest from end to end is of the highest kind. The first letters, composed before Balzac had seen the mysterious Polish woman whose mere handwriting intoxicated him, are the best. Only a man of imagination could have fallen in love with an intelligence and a handwriting, and, having done so, would have dared to whisper to the unseen creature those small secrets of the soul which some men never express at all:

As all my passions, all my beliefs are defeated, as my dreams are dispersed, I am forced to create myself passions, and I choose that of art. I live in my studies. I wish to do better. I weigh my phrases and my words as a miser weighs his bits of gold. What love I thus waste! What happiness is flung to the winds! My laborious youth, my long studies will not have the sole reward I desired for them. Ever since I have breathed and known what a pure breath coming from pure lips was, I have desired the love of a young and pretty woman; yet all has fled me! A few years more and youth will be a memory! . . . And then, what hope that I could obtain at forty that which I have missed at twenty? She who is averse to me, being young, will she be less reluctant then? But you cannot understand these means—you, young, solitary, living a country life, far from our Parisian world which excites the passions so violently, and where all is so great and so petty. I ought still to keep these lamentations in the depths of my heart.

And then, again, this charming confession:

Adieu, then; I have given you a whole night, a night which belonged to my legitimate wife, the Revue de Paris, that crabbed spouse. Consequently the "Théorie de la Démarche," which I owed to her, must be postponed till the month of March, and no one will know why; you and I alone are in the secret. The article was there before me, a science to elucidate; it was arduous, I was afraid of it. Your letter slipped into my memory, and suddenly I put my feet to the embers, forgot myself in my armchair—and adieu to "La Démarche"; behold me galloping towards Poland, and re-reading your letters (I have but three)—and now I answer them. I defy you to read two months hence the "Théorie de la Démarche" without smiling at every sentence; because beneath those senseless, foolish phrases there are a thousand thoughts of you.

But few of the letters are like this. The majority, though the passion in them never for an instant cools, are of a darker and more sinister complexion. That Balzac was always bowed down by debts, and that he killed himself with sheer hard work—his was a suicide of thirty years' preparation—are facts notorious. The present book, however, amplifies these facts as they have not been amplified before. One might say that three-quarters of it is concerned with work and debts. Balzac's fecundity, under the most tantalising conditions, was equal to Dumas'. He dined at five, went to bed before six, rose at midnight and worked till noon: twelve unintermitted hours seems to have been his minimum. He often worked eighteen. "I have of late [he says in 1835] been twenty-six hours in my study without leaving it. I get the air at that window which commands all Paris, which I will some day command." He wrote eighty printed pages of L'Illustré Gaudissart in a single night; and the whole of the second part of Sur Catherine de Medici, twenty-four thousand words as it now stands, in a single night. "Think of that when you read it," he exclaims. He was constantly staggered by his own productivity:

Listen: to settle this point, reflect on this: Walter Scott wrote two novels a year, and was thought to have luck in his labour; he astonished England. This year I shall have produced: (1) Le Père Goriot; (2) Le Lys dans la Vallée; (3) Les Mémoires d'une jeune Marée; (4) César Birotteau. I have done three Parts of the Études de Mœurs for Madame Bêchel; and three Parts of the Études Philosophiques for Werdet. And, finally, I shall have finished the third dizain [of Contes Drolatiques] and Séraphita. But, then, shall I be living, or in my sound mind, in 1836? I doubt it. Sometimes I think that my brain is inflaming. I shall die on the breach of intellect.

And that letter was only written in August! By what magic did he accomplish these feats of generation? He himself attributed his powers to certain peculiarities of parentage. Here is a curious item:

There are few fathers who give themselves the trouble to reflect on their duties. My father had made great studies on this subject; he communicated them to me (I mean their results) at an early age, and I gained fixed ideas which dictated to me the Physiologie du Mariage—a book more profound than satirical or flippant. . . . I am a great proof, and so is my sister, of the principles of my father. He was fifty-nine years old when I was born, and sixty-three when my sister was born. Now, through the power of our vitality, we have both failed to succumb; we have centenarian constitutions. Without that power of force and life transmitted by my father I should be dead under my debts and obligations.

As for his debts, during the greater part of his life they appear to have steadily increased. In a certain sense, he enjoyed them; he decidedly enjoyed talking about them. Not only in his fiction, but privately, he loved the word frances. He might have been one of those terrific financiers who deal gorgeously with millions while on the very edge of bankruptcy:

Must I for the fifth or sixth time explain to you the mechanism of my poverty, and how it is that it only grows and increases? I will do so, if only to prove to you that I am the greatest financier of the epoch. But we will never return to the subject again, will we?—for there is nothing sadder than to relate troubles from which we still suffer.

Then follow a thousand words of fiscal complexities. And, of course, he did return to the subject again. He made an excellent publishing agreement, in 1836, with Bohain, for fifteen years, under which he received fifty thousand francs in cash for urgent debts, and a minimum income rising to forty-eight thousand francs a year. That agreement was to begin a pecuniary millennium. Yet, in the following year, we find:

This letter comes to me at a bad moment. It has singularly added to the dumb grief that gnaws me and will kill me. I am thirty-eight years old, still crippled by debt, with nought but uncertainty as to my position. Scarcely have I taken two months to rest my brain before I repent them as a crime when I see the evils that have come through my inaction. This precarious life, which might be a spur in youth, becomes at my age an overwhelming burden. My head is turning white, and whatever pleasant things may be said about it, it is clear that I must soon lose all hope of pleasing. Pure, tranquil, openly avowed happiness, for which I was made, escapes me; I have only tortures and vexations, through which a few rare gleams of blue sky shine.

Earlier than this the monetary possibilities of the stage had dazzled him, but he dared not grasp at them:

You speak of the stage. The stage might bring me in two hundred thousand francs a year. I know, beyond a doubt, that I could make my fortune there in a short time; but you forget that I have not six months to myself, not one month; and if I had I should not write a play, I should go and see you. Six months of my time represent forty thousand francs; and I must have that money in hand before I can do either "La Grande Mademoiselle" or "Philippe le Discret." Where the devil am I to get it? Out of my inkpot. There is no Leo X. in these days. Work is the artist's bank.

That Balzac made large sums is plain. The mystery is, how he found time to spend them. The correction of proofs, owing to his weird method of composition, cost him a fabulous sum, but even that item could not possibly account for this magical and continuous disappearance of francs. The fact is, he never knew the value of money; and he dearly liked an orgy of extravagance:

Next Saturday I give a dinner to the Tigers of my opera-box, and I am preparing sumptuosities out of all reason. I shall have Rossini and Olympe, his cara donna [afterwards his wife], who will preside. Next Nodier, then five Tigers, Sandeau, and a certain Victor Bohain (a man of great political talents, unjustly smirched) the most exquisite wines of Europe, the rarest flowers, the best cheer; in short, I intend to distinguish myself.

Though made up wholly of artless self-revelations, on one point, the supreme point, these letters are singularly reticent. They show Balzac the man, Balzac the lover, Balzac the debtor, Balzac the prodigious machine for turning out so many pages per night; they scarcely show at all Balzac the artist. If it were not for the unconscious and superb artistry of the letters themselves, and an occasional chance remark, one might think that Balzac was merely a hack-writer preoccupied with the common "dailiness" of life. Miss Wormeley has duly noted this strange reticence, and she notes almost the only passage in which Balzac reveals an artist's soul. It is this:

If you only knew how, after this solitary life, I long to grasp Nature by a rapid rush across Europe, how my soul thirsts for the immense, the infinite; for Nature seen in the mass, not in detail, judged on its grand lines, sometimes damp with rain, sometimes rich with sun, as we bound across space, seeing lands instead of villages! If you knew this, you would not tell me to come, for that redoubles my torture; it fans the furnace on which I sleep.

There are many fine phrases in the volume, and many interesting appreciations of his own work. We will conclude with a few of them. Speaking of his cloistered life, he says: "I seldom go out. I have many personal annoyances, like all men who live by the altar instead of being able to worship it." And this of his love: "To live in a heart is so glorious a life! To be able to name you secretly to myself in evil hours, when I suffer!" Of the "Story of the Emperor" episode in Le Médecin de Campagne: "You will some day read that gigantic fragment, which has made the most unfeeling weep, and which a hundred newspapers have reproduced. Friends tell me that from end to end of France there has risen a cry of admiration. What will it be for the whole work!" Of the Contes Drolatiques he remarks: "They will be my finest meed of fame in the future"; of the Absolu, that it is ten times greater than Eugénie Grandet (!); and of Séraphita, "never did so grand a conception rise before any man. . . . When Séraphita spreads her glorious wings."

Yes, he had his moments of transcendent uplifting. Especially when, for about a day and a half, he contrived to get clear of debt: "No more anxieties, all is arranged! Here are six thousand francs found, five thousand five hundred paid! There remains to the poor poet five hundred francs in a noble bank-bill. Joy is in the house. I ask if Paris is for sale. . . ."

A Plea for Spencerism.

Herbert Spencer: The Man and His Work. By Hector Macpherson. (Chapman & Hall.)

MR. MACPHERSON has produced a thoroughly good book, a book which should accomplish a great deal of missionary work in dispelling illusions and counteracting misrepresentations. It is true that much was expected from Mr. Macpherson, for Mr. Spencer himself took a kindly interest in the book, and freely responded to requests for material. Besides, one or two gifted men have preceded Mr. Macpherson in the task of expounding the Spencerian gospel, and as comparisons were certain to be made, no one would enter the lists unless conscious of that strength which comes from the possession of good mental furniture. But though much was expected, much has been obtained, and those most competent to judge will not be disappointed. It is true that Mr. Spencer's free response to requests for material has not yielded much in the way of additional knowledge of the philosopher personally. It is also true that just as Mr. Macpherson does not slavishly reproduce Mr. Spencer's views, the thorough-going Spencerian will not slavishly endorse all Mr. Macpherson's strictures. Indeed, there can scarcely fail to be expressions of dissent from some of his dicta, and, as a matter of fact, the copy of his book now being handled is freely peppered with notes. But notwithstanding all that, there must be frank recognition of the plain truth that Mr. Macpherson has produced a fresh and original work on a subject which does not readily lend itself to fresh and original treatment; that he has piloted his way through the mazes of many intricate problems with consummate skill, and that he has proved himself a master of vigorous, pithy English, which has no ebbs and flows, but is well sustained throughout.

The biographical part of the book, though meagre, is ample enough from the philosophic standpoint, and the reader is told all that he need know for the purpose of understanding Mr. Spencer's early life and environment, and the evolution of his mind. But that is not the way the general public understands biographical work, and the chapter on personal characteristics will not do much to appease the hunger and thirst for light, gossippy details. What little there is of the personal element will be speedily devoured. We catch a glimpse of Mr. Spencer en pantoufles indulging in racy, pointed conversation, "a bright vivacious personality," and very much at home "among the actualities of life, and withal brimful of humour." We are also told that until considerations of health forbade him, Mr. Spencer delighted in the social side of life, and we are introduced to the philosopher with his coat off enjoying a game of billiards at the Athenæum Club. Nothing is said about Mr. Spencer taking his defeats with philosophic calm, and, according to idle rumour, astonishing his opponents by explaining their success in neat, crisp sentences, based on his generalisations about the redistribution of matter and motion. There is no allusion to Mr. Spencer as a disciple of Walton and Cotton, and that is unfortunate, for though Mr. Macpherson could not be expected to descend from the high level he maintains throughout, and relate one or two anecdotes of the billiard-room type which have got into circulation, or notice the little angler's ditty in which it is stated that will find the handling of a big "twenty pounder," with rod and line, a much more difficult affair than handling the universe, he might have made something of Mr. Spencer as a salmon fisher. Mr. Spencer himself, in dealing with Weber's experiments on the sense of touch, alludes to his salmon-fishing days, and informs his readers that, towards the close of his career as an angler, "I used to observe what a bungler I had become when putting on and taking off artificial flies." And this little personal item is used in a way that has an important bearing on what is called the distribution of tactual perceptiveness. Statements of this kind ought to have been noted, and amplified, by one who was favoured with free responses to request for material, because in a well-known letter addressed to Hooker the notion has been spread abroad that Spencer is sadly deficient as an observer.

Coming round to the question of education, Mr. Macpherson informs us that the prevalent idea that Mr. Spencer's uncle, the Rev. Thomas Spencer, was driven by his nephew's obstinacy to give up the idea of sending him to college, is a mistake. "There was no dispute," says Mr. Spencer. "My uncle gave up the idea when he saw that I was unfit." Mr. Macpherson rightly indulges in a few trenchant sentences on the unscrupulous opposition of university cliques, "who could not bear to see a new thinker of commanding power step forward into the intellectual arena without the hall-mark of university culture." This may seem too sweeping, but in reality it is a well-merited rebuke to those suave-mannered, smooth-tongued Hegelians whose writings, freely spiced though these are with bitter elements, convey but a faint idea of the means taken to bias the minds of students against the master thinker of the age.

In treating of Mr. Spencer's early life in so far as that throws light on the philosopher's mental development, Mr. Macpherson strikes a note to which the present writer cannot assent. He states that Mr. Spencer never needed to reject the orthodox creed because it never appealed to him. It was not with Spencer as with many others, a case of acceptance and rejection, "his mind lay outside of it from the first." Precisely so. With Spencer as with a Gibbon and a Hume there was no room for survivals, and reason reigned supreme, and was not as it unfortunately too often is, the humble slave of those base ingredients that still trouble the soul of the "improved Gorilla." But this important factor entirely escapes Mr. Macpherson, who contends that Spencer is the poorer for not having shared the spiritual experiences of his contemporaries, that for lack of such experience his mind works under serious limitations, and that those thinkers who have endeavoured under emotional fervour to "strike the note of ascetic sanctity receive an almost intuitive insight into the deeper religious problems of the age—an insight denied those who come to the study of religious psychology with the foot-rule of the logician, and the weighing scales of the statistician." This is surprising enough from an expounder and sympathetic disciple of Herbert Spencer. The world has seen many prophets and teachers of the kind Mr. Macpherson is enamoured of, men who had plenty of emotional fervour and worked under no limitations whatever, but soared into space and swayed to and fro like a weathercock in a gale. Let us be thankful that Spencer possesses something better than "emotional fervour" and "spiritual experiences,"—to wit, clear, cool reason and philosophic calm. No doubt Mr. Macpherson will contend that thinkers who do not trouble themselves with the "foot-rule of the logician and the weighing scales of the statistician," but appeal to humanity through the emotions, hold sway over the minds of countless generations. That, indeed, is only too true; but then, one who writes as he at times does about the "meridian glory of the age of reason," the "long night of authority and credulity," and who takes a somewhat lyrical view of the Revolution epoch, should be the first to say "tant pis pour l'humanité." Again, Mr. Macpherson contends that for lack of adequate equipment Mr. Spencer fell into the error of supposing that science and religion would find a basis of agreement in recognition of the Unknowable, the terms proposed by science being said to "resemble those of the husband who suggested to the wife as a basis of future harmony that he should take the inside of the house and she the outside." But then we are told in various other parts of the book that "science will increase rather than diminish the feelings of wonder, awe and humility which are the real roots of religious emotion"; that "thus the Spencerian philosophy shades into religion," and that "already science when reduced to its last analysis supplies a rational basis for the belief in a mysterious awe-inspiring power," all of which statements do not very logically hang on to the sweeping dictum that Spencer's basis of agreement is an error. And it is significant that one who will not be accused of lack of "emotional fervour" and "spiritual experiences"—Paulsen of Berlin—proposes to reconcile religion and science in practically the same way as Mr. Spencer has done.

The evolution of Mr. Spencer's evolution theory is an important matter, for it has been affirmed and repeated that Synthetic Philosophy has been built up by a priori methods without reference to facts, and one does not need to be very learned in psychology to understand the potent influence of affirmation and repetition. Mr. Macpherson states that he himself once believed in this popular error, but that Mr. Spencer in conversation demonstrated to him that the cardinal principles of Synthetic Philosophy were reached by slow steps during many years of patient toil. And that statement does not rest on the ipse dixit of Mr. Spencer, for one has only got to read his books to trace the development of his theory, from its first germs in his first book—Social Statics, published in 1850—to its full expansion as a conception of evolution at large. And one has only to compare dates to see that Mr. Spencer had slowly worked his way to the conception of evolution at large before Darwin's Origin of Species appeared. Mr. Macpherson's treatment of this part of his subject is clear and pointed, and his vigorous sentences ought to prove a telling blow against a deep-seated misconception of Spencerian methods.

Having dealt with one or two points of general interest in Mr. Macpherson's book, it is impossible in brief space to do more than express unqualified admiration of Mr. Macpherson as a literary craftsman, and a bold, independent thinker. He possesses a rare grasp of Mr. Spencer's teaching, and powers of lucid exposition of the first order. His courage is unbounded. In these days, when the "young lions" who fill our university chairs have fused ethics, political economy, and sociology into "celestial economics" based on the will of God Almighty, it is not everyone who would, as Mr. Macpherson does, champion Spencerism into the extremes of political thought. But he does it, and does it well, albeit that he plays a little off his own bat.

A Professor on the Warpath.

The Chaucer Canon. By the Rev. Walter W. Skeat, Litt.D., D.C.L., LL.D., Ph.D. (Clarendon Press. 3s. 6d.)

PROF. SKEAT's polemic is not of a character which, even were he a Civil Servant, would be likely to call down upon him the disapproval of the First Lord of the Treasury. It is distinctly professional, and is devoted to the justification of the critical methods employed in his admirable and standard editions of the works of Geoffrey Chaucer. There are two ninepins to be bowled at. Almost simultaneously with Prof. Skeat's Students' Chaucer appeared another excellent edition, the "Globe" Chaucer. And a reviewer of the two, "with that perfect recklessness which is born of irresponsibility," asserted—we trust not in these columns—that there is a wide difference between the two, the text in the Students' Chaucer being "eclectic," and that in the "Globe" Chaucer being "scientific."

Now, Prof. Skeat is nothing if not "scientific," and he resents the imputation; which, moreover, he professes himself unable to understand. He proceeds, therefore, to demonstrate, firstly, that there is practically no difference between the texts, which is certainly the case; and, secondly, that so far as there is a difference, it is all in favour of his own edition. The "Globe" edition is, in his opinion, unnecessarily faithful to the spelling of the famous Ellesmere MS., by preserving "the idle, or archaic, final -e" in cases where a syllable is not required for the scansion of the line. "We gather," he jibes, "that by a 'scientific' text is meant one in which the final -e is retained in places where the scribe inserted it wrongly, as well as in places where he inserted it rightly." This ninopin is toppled over, to the satisfaction of all parties, in an early chapter, although it appears to require a rolling kick at intervals throughout the treatise. The more serious adversary, however, of the learned professor is the critic who denies or mistrusts the applicability of the "philological" methods used by nearly all Chaucerian scholars to distinguish the genuine works of Chaucer from those incorrectly, and upon small evidence, assigned to him. The real object of the book is to restate and defend these methods.

Prof. Skeat gives a lucid and elaborate exposition of them; and we are bound to say that, within their limits, they seem to us quite trustworthy. Briefly, the point is this. Chaucer wrote the Midland English of the fourteenth century. This still retained the Middle English inflexions of the parts of speech, ending in -e, -en, -es, which later English usage dropped; and it still retained the distinction between certain vowel sounds, such as "close" and "open" o, or "close" and "open" e, which later English usage obscured. It is not necessary to go into details here; suffice it to say that Chaucer's use of inflexions and Chaucer's selection of vowel sounds for purposes of rhyme are perfectly regular, and have been classified by Prof. Skeat and others with considerable exactness. But even when Chaucer wrote, the Middle English system of inflexions and the Middle English system of vowel-sounds were beginning to break down. Shortly after his death a rapid process hurried them into oblivion. It follows that a fifteenth-century, and still more a sixteenth-century, imitator of Chaucer trying to write "Chaucerese" would be writing an extinct and unfamiliar language. He might, perhaps, get a little nearer than Spenser's "Shepherd's Calendar," but he would be almost sure to fall into grammatical and rhythmical solecisms which Chaucer's ear would never have endured. The same would be true in great measure of a Northumbrian contemporary of Chaucer who should attempt to substitute for the forms of his native speech those of Chaucer's East Midland. The "fake" might pass, even as Chatterton's did, but only in an uncritical age. The philological method of determining the "canon" of Chaucer consists in the examination of all works claiming to be his by the tests of rhyme and inflexion, and rejecting such as fail to conform to his usage in these respects. The three main poems around which dispute has raged are "The Romaunt of the Rose," "The Court of Love," and "The Flower and the Leaf." Applying the philological method, Prof. Skeat decides that no one of these is throughout by Chaucer. "The Flower and the Leaf" is by an imitator of the fifteenth century, who appears, from internal evidence, to have been a woman. "The Court of Love" is probably not earlier than the sixteenth century. The case of "The Romaunt of the Rose" is more complicated. We have Chaucer's own authority for it that he did translate the French "Roman de la Rose." But the existing translation has been shown, not by the philological tests, to be really made up of three independent fragments; and Prof. Skeat now uses these methods to support a theory that the first fragment only is by Chaucer, the second by a Northumbrian imitator, and the third by yet another Midland writer.

As a rule, it will perhaps be admitted, internal tests of authorship are hazardous things to deal with. The attempt to find authors, on grounds of grammar and style, for anonymous Elizabethan plays, has led to much baseless conjecture. But the case of the Chaucer canon is rather peculiar. The imitators are writing in what has become to them an archaic dialect. They are not scholars. If Prof. Skeat chose to write a pseudo-Chaucerian poem, it would probably not be detected—by the philological method. Nor, again, could the tests satisfactorily distinguish Chaucer's work from that of an East Midland contemporary, using the same inflexions and the same rhymes. Only there does not seem to have been any such poet whose work, at least, has got confused with Chaucer's. Nor, as such a poet, even if anonymous, might exist, could the tests well be used to support by themselves a positive attribution of any poem to Chaucer. But they are not called upon to do this, for all Chaucer's important works are either ascribed to him by trustworthy MSS., or else claimed by name in the "Legend of Good Women." It is only the existence of this bulk of undisputed work resting on external evidence, and covering the whole period of Chaucer's working life, which enables any satisfactory philological tests to be framed at all. And even now it would be impossible had Chaucer's style developed in respect of his usage of inflexion and rhyme, as it did in more important respects between his earlier and his later years.

Ne sutor ultra crepidam. It is a singular study in the water-tight compartment character of modern literary specialism to watch Prof. Skeat's proceedings when he gets outside the borders of philology. Within them he is a master, moving easily and with assured knowledge of what is and what is not philological proof. But when he passes to consider the debt of Chaucer's fifteenth-century disciples to their master, and their methods of imitating him, the reader suddenly begins to rub his eyes and to wonder whether he has read the printed page aright. Some of Prof. Skeat's conceptions of the way in which Lydgate, or James I., may be supposed to have worked, seem to us, from the point of view of literary psychology, perfectly incredible. As an argument in favour of the Chaucerian authorship of "Fragment A" of "The Romaunt of the Rose," Prof. Skeat says:

Lydgate, in the course of his Complaint of the Black Knight, supposed to have been written in 1402, actually quotes from Fragment A expressly, and must have had before him! For it so happens that he quotes just the very words which are NOT in the French original.

The French has (l. 1399):

Eator les ruisseaus et les rives
Des fontaines cleres et vives
Poignoit l'erbe freschete et drue."

Fragment A translates it thus (l. 1417):

"About the brinkes of thise welles,
And by the stremes over-al elles,
Sprang up the gras, as thikke y-set
And softe as any veluēt."

This Lydgate reproduces thus ("Black Knight," l. 78):

"The gravel gold, the water pure as glas,
The baukes rounde, the welle envyrning,
And softe as veluēt, the yonge gras
That thereupon lustily cam springing."

We thus find Lydgate, who expressly took Chaucer as his model, quoting from Fragment A soon after his master's death.

"Soft as velvet" has, we take it, been a stock description of turf at all times since velvet was invented, and the passages from Chaucer, if it was Chaucer, and Lydgate appear to us in other respects about as ingeniously different as two renderings by contemporary writers of the same French original could well be. A page further on Prof. Skeat declares that when Lydgate wrote

And with myn head unto the welle I raughte,
And of the water drank I a good draughte,"

he is imitating "a convenient form of rimes" in Chaucer's:

And forth him heed and nekke out-straughte
To drinken of that welle a draughte.

Well, they are not the same rimes, but that is a trifle. Dear Professor, the thing is not done like this. No poet would have the time for it, not even a "monk of Bury."

Even more amazing is the proof that King James I. knew Chaucer's fragment of "The Romaunt of the Rose," based on certain supposed similarities to "The King's Quair." Thus:

Perhaps it is worth noticing a line in the very next stanza—viz., st. 48: "Aboute his nek, quhite as the fyre amaille" [enamel]. For, though there is nothing remarkable about the phrase "Aboute his nekke" in Fragment A, l. 1081, it is a singular coincidence that the last word in the preceding line is the scarce word amaled [enamelled]. And next, if we look a little more closely at the same stanza, we shall find that there is a description of a chain hung about the same neck, to which was attached a ruby that shone like a spark of fire. This I take to be Chaucer's carbuncle, mentioned only forty lines farther on, which enabled people to travel a mile or two by night time, because "such light sprang out of the stone."

Tut, tut!

Mr. Le Gallienne Protests.

Rudyard Kipling: a Criticism. By Richard Le Gallienne. (John Lane. 5s.)

VISION of the complete Kipling is, apparently, hidden from Mr. Le Gallienne. He is restricted by his temperament, which is the antithesis of Mr. Kipling's. As the expression of a temperament, his book is able and interesting. It is a form of that criticism which dates from the eminent French writer who defined criticism as the recital of the adventures of the soul among masterpieces. And perhaps the right way to notice such books is just to take them as they are—to interpret, not to criticise.

With much of Mr. Le Gallienne's book the most ardent Kiplingite can approve. With this, for example:

To him had been given the wonderful knack of doing with the pen what so many delightful men, quite inglorious and often hardly respectable, do daily in bar-parlours and other haunts of anecdote by fleeting, fascinating word of mouth.

Indeed, two out of the three sections of the book, the running criticism of "The Poetry" and "The Stories," are indubitably the work of a critic who knows his own mind, who brings a real love of literature to the task, and who can appreciate excellence in work to which innately he is antipathetic. If a score of admirers were asked to draw up a list of the twenty best poems and stories by Mr. Kipling, the majority of those selected by Mr. Le Gallienne for their excellence would certainly be included; but the score of admirers would disagree with such a statement as this:

Most of Mr. Kipling's stories (and probably those which have most advanced his general reputation) belong to science rather than art.

Neither do we agree with Mr. Le Gallienne when he says that one great and disappointing surprise about Mr. Kipling's stories is the facility with which we forget them. Who having read, to name a few at random, "The Story of the Gadsbys," "The Man who would be King," "My Lord the Elephant," "Love o' Woman," and "William the Conqueror" can easily forget them? Or who forgets the Jungle Stories, or "The Miracle of Purun Bhagat"?

The first two sections of Mr. Le Gallienne's book are an able and reasonable statement of preferences and dislikes; but the third section, that devoted to "Mr. Kipling's General Significance and Influence," opens another door. In these pages we learn what has been troubling Mr. Le Gallienne. It was to say what he has said in this chapter, that Mr. Le Gallienne, with set face and bitter expression, dipped his pen into the ink. He is aghast at the prevalence and the popularity of blood-stained fiction. As Mr. Kipling is the Field-Marshal of this army he tilts his lance at him.

For progressive thought there has been no such dangerous influence in England for many years.

As a writer Mr. Kipling is a delight; as an influence he is a danger.

Perhaps no one ever wrote so profanely of death as Mr. Kipling, or with such heartless vulgarity.

We are in the thick of one of the most cynically impudent triumphs of the Philistines the world has seen.

Everywhere the brute and the bully—and for the ape and tiger truly a glorious resurrection. . . . For this state of things in England Mr. Kipling is the most responsible voice.

And so on, and so on. What is there to say to all this but that Mr. Le Gallienne fails to see things clearly, fails to see them whole? He sees but one side of Mr. Kipling, and he hears but one popular voice—the voice that cries the loudest. The desire to help those who need it, the care of the sick and the wounded, the seeking for holiness "which has its sources elsewhere than in history"—the flowing undercurrent of these things was never stronger than it is to-day. But you must not seek news of them on the placards of the evening papers, or in the speeches of politicians. And as for Mr. Kipling, surely it is the writer's right to choose his subjects where he lists, and if Mr. Kipling makes Dick Heldar say—"God is very good—I never thought I'd hear this again. Give 'em hell, men! Oh, give 'em hell!" what of that? The Dick Heldars in khaki are saying such things daily:

When 'Omer smote 'is bloomin' lyre,
He'd 'eard men sing by land an' sea;
An' what he thought 'e might require,
'E went an' took—the same as me!

Because a writer in the flush of virile youth feels the compulsion to write of virile things, because he chooses his puppets from the ranks of men of action rather than men of thought, is no reason why he should be charged with materialism in the grossest form. Moreover, as to moral influence, there is enough and to spare in the story of the millionaire's son in Captains Courageous, in "The Miracle of Purun Bhagat," in "The Ship that Found Herself," in "William the Conqueror," and in the example of strenuousness, grit, and the fine quality of doing a thing well for its own sake, shown in a dozen and more of Kipling's stories of Englishmen set down in lonely autocracy on the Empire's edge.

The Stones of Normandy.

Highways and Byways in Normandy. By Percy Dearmer. With Illustrations by Joseph Pennell. (Macmillan. 6s.)

MR. DEARMER goes to Normandy to ride his hobby, which is the study of architecture and stained glass. He is no epicurean trifler like Sterne, and no all-round observer like Defoe. Still less does he go with that determination to be literary and capricious which in Stevenson produced such admirable books of road gossip. Nor, lastly, does Mr. Dearmer say fine things about the spirit of place, and dot his route with fragments of his soul. He just says: "Are you interested in Gothic churches and mediæval castles and glass? Then come along, and bring your bicycle; carry your money in banknotes, wear wool; no, never mind a mackintosh—ah, here is Gisors . . . Gisors was the key to Normandy in the days," &c. Yet these pages are not at all "stodgy." You are in good hands, and Mr. Dearmer finds time, after all, to be genial as well as clever. For although, in a first glance, he appears to be wholly occupied with ambulatories and spindle buttresses and fosses and mangonels and upper lights, he has really something to say about scenery, and shows at country fairs, and plutocratic hotel life at Granville, and the un-French ruddiness and fair hair of the people of Lisieux. But these are his asides. His colour mounts when he tackles a mediæval stronghold like the Chateau-Gaillard, and can start a paragraph with the words, "Being now in possession of the bailey C, the French began to lay siege to the inner bailey." Not that in his architectural pages he is always darting ahead in quiverings of special knowledge. Often he shares with you broad, easy impressions. Take part of a round in Evreux. We are to see the Cathedral, but Mr. Dearmer will have us approach it in a certain way; so he takes us first to the Place de la Mairie to look at the belfry and the bell.

You feel, as soon as you see the tower, that it was all built for this bell, which is, as a matter of fact, eighty-four years older than the tower itself. Height was needed to allow the sound full play, and to give a wide view to the watchman who scanned the country round, and from hour to hour announced that all was quiet, or rang, if need were, the great bell to call the burgher soldiers to the ramparts. And strength was needed too, for the rough times that the ancient town had so often to endure. There are plenty of bullet marks in the stone to remind us of one of the latest of those struggles when Evreux was besieged for nearly a year during the Fronde.

Here, too, sounded the hour bell, the curfew, the festival bourdon, and the tocsin of fire. In the notes that vibrated through the stone walls lay all the history of the town, its common daily life, its joys, its tragedies.

The street of the belfry, the Rue de l'Horloge, takes us up to where the north transept of the Cathedral lies under the dear, crazy old spire of leaded wood. Look well at this transept: it is triumphant Gothic in all the boundless profusion of its pride. . . . Did any one realise, as he watched the masons performing their miracles in stone, that the force of Gothic could no farther go, that this triumph was a veritable Trionfo della Morte?

Go now to the west front. The nephew and successor of Ambroise, Gabriel Le Veneur, built it only thirty years after the north transept was finished. The Middle Age, which seemed almost to have conquered the law of gravitation in its soaring audacity, has entirely passed away: its art is in thirty years so utterly forgotten that the records of centuries have been wiped out as if in shame. The children of Clovis, in art at least, have set themselves again to burn what they had adored and to adore what they had burnt.

That is as "purple" as anything in the book, which, however, does not lack a reasonable glow and sparkle. Mr. Dearmer never gushes; he is honest enough to suggest that some parts of Normandy may bore you, and that some are to be hurried over, or avoided altogether. Consequently his praise of a place tells. When he says that Beaumont-le-Roger "is just one of those places where one could spend a summer holiday" one accepts his recommendation as one of real import, like his statement that the grouping of the shafts in the nave of Coutances Cathedral is stiff.

We have left ourselves little space to notice Mr. Pennell's drawings. They are wonderfully clever. One sees that he poses a landscape, a church, a city lane, as carefully as a portrait painter poses a woman or child or strong man. The sky is chosen with reference to the landscape. Mr. Pennell never hesitates to make his towers "cloud-capt," to make earth and sky, cloud and tree, conspicuous allies in an artistic intention; and yet it is a rare thing to feel that artifice is hustling art. One feels it sometimes in sky effects, to which Mr. Pennell is apt to help himself too generously. The illustrations, by the way, have no close connexion with the text; they are a book in themselves. But one does not resent the fact that author and artist seem to find each his Normandy in Normandy. Between them Mr. Dearmer and Mr. Pennell have produced a book which need fear no rival in its own field for many a day.

Other New Books.

ROMANTIC EDINBURGH.

BY JOHN GEDDIE

"The bulk of the Waverley Novels were written at No. 39, North Castle-street, neighbours across the way marvelling at the daily vision of the hand that travelled ceaselessly across the paper. . . ." In the above sentence the gentle art of guide-book making is fairly well illustrated. The "neighbours across the way" may or may not have marvelled (according as they happened to rise as early as Sir Walter), but their introduction serves to make a big historical figure alive by juxtaposition. For the same reason an artist draws dust in the wake of a bicycle or a straining hare by the side of a train. Thus the immovable canvas gives the idea of motion. Many are the lively ghosts who throng Mr. Geddie's pages. Montrose spat on from the balcony of Lady Hume's lodging on his way to execution; the beautiful Duchess of Gordon (hostess of Burns) riding as a girl on a vagrant pig in the High-street; David Hume, happy with "a maid and a cat" in Riddle's Close—there were no end to the list. Vandalism, that inexorable servant of municipal convenience and hygiene, has set its hoof on Edinburgh; and Lord Rosebery has prayed that the spirits which possessed the Gadarene swine may enter into some of her monuments and statues to incite them to "run down a steep place into the sea." But the soul of Edinburgh remains, and we may reasonably hope that the opening of the New North Bridge does not presage destruction to it. We may add that Mr. Geddie's method is less ideally precise than that of Mr. Laurence Hutton, the author of The Literary Landmarks of London; but an excellent index establishes the value of his gossipy and pleasant volume as a work of reference. It is a pity that the illustrations are not better. (Sands & Co. 6s.)

PIONEERING ON THE CONGO.

BY THE REV. W. HOLMAN BENTLEY.

We have it on the authority of Mr. Leonard Courtney, in a presidential address before the Royal Statistical Society, that the net business result of placing the Congo State in the hands of the King of Belgium for "commercial and philanthropic exploitation" was that "the Congo trade represented but little more than 0.7 per cent. of the total trade of Belgium." Anent this statement Sir F. S. Powell thought "this country ought to be congratulated that the Congo State did not belong to us." But there is no land on the face of the earth that does not belong to the British missionary; and Mr. Bentley, of the Baptist Missionary Society, shows, in this rambling but nearly always interesting record of noble work, that even to-day no limit is set on the price of salvation. In 1879 he went out with Mr. Thomas Comber and a few colleagues. Mr. Comber's wife was the first victim to the climate; he himself succumbed in 1887, and four others of his name laid down their lives in African mission work. The result of the first decade of pioneer Baptist labour on the Congo is thus summarised:

There were in the end of 1888 six stations, reaching 500 miles into the interior, and the whole navigable river had been explored with the exception of an affluent of the Upper Kasai. A Christian Church had been formed at San Salvador, and during the year 1888 twenty-two converts had been baptized.

Mr. Bentley himself compiled a dictionary and grammar of the language, and his wife aided him with translations. Congo cannibals have now, we gather, the advantage of a Peep of Day and a Holy War in their own tongue. Mr. Bentley's volumes are a mine of curious and often horrible information on tribal customs and superstitions, and the numerous illustrations are both apposite and interesting. His greatest triumph as a Christian advocate we take to be his dissuasion of Sélulundi, a newly converted polygamist, from taking a sixth woman to wife with whom he was earnestly in love. The Baptists, be it said, show their good sense in not attempting the breakage of irregular marriage bonds already formed. (Religious Tract Society. 16s. net.)

Fiction.

From Door to Door: a Book of Romances, Fantasies, Whimsies, and Levities. By Bernard Capes. (Blackwood. 6s.)

WE had hoped that Mr. Capes would "tak' a thought and men"; but the pyrotechny of Our Lady of Darkness is repeated with new effects in these short stories. Mr. Capes has a fine imagination, and considerable knowledge of the human heart; but it does not seem to be remembered by him that all the great stories of the world have been told in simple language, and for the story's sake. When Mr. Capes tells a story, he seems to be willing to do so only on condition that we allow him to try effects of language at the same time. Of course a writer is entitled to an original style, but it is a question of more or less. Mr. Capes's style is felt to be a thing by itself. There is one glory of the tale, and another glory of the style, and they get in each other's way. The motto placed above his first and principal story, called "The Sword of Corporal Lacoste," might be transferred to the title-page with a critical intent: "'Tis many a wise Man's hap, while he is providing against one Danger, to fall into another: and for his very Providence to turn his Destruction." Mr. Capes is so anxious to avoid banalities in thought and language that he falls into extravagance.

Corporal Lacoste, "cuirassier in the following of Murat," loses his regiment, and is led by a monk to a forest inn, where he forces an entertainment, and makes drunken love to the landlord's daughter. While Lacoste sleeps, monk and landlord plan to murder him and in the morning offer him treacherous guidance through the forest. A pack of wolves which would have devoured the three is sent flying by the strategy and sword of the Corporal, who saves his murderers only to fall beneath their foul blows in a quiet dell of the forest. Nemesis begins at once: the snow falls; the two villains are lost; nameless terrors beset them; then the pack returns.

It is a good story, and even the clutter of new locutions and strange similes which Mr. Capes imports into the telling cannot prevent it seizing on the imagination. But one has to labour through the style, as the lost Corporal did through unending forest to the light of an inn. It is excess of literature that baulks us. What do you think of this?

The dragoon's throat had been pierced by a sword-thrust. A thread of vermilion yet crawled from it down his swarthy neck, like the awkward tracing by a schoolboy of a river on a map.

Presently it is:

For all the trees, great and small, that overstooped the lip and sprouted from the sides of the pass, were hung with monstrous lustres of ice, up which millions of little reflected suns travelled like beads of champagne rising in specimen-glasses.

Anon and anon:

He [the monk] was more ostentatious of his teeth, the under-row of which broke up his conscious smile into unlovely intervals, and were like little dilapidated grave-stones to the memory of deceased appetites. . . . In moments of excitement, he would relapse into his native Low German, the barbarous gutturals of which, shouldering their way amongst the crisp, bowing idioms of the more courtly tongue, would confound the intelligibility they sought to emphasise. . . . The monk was no coy toss-pot. He pledged the other glass for glass, till his heated face glared forward of its cowl like a great opening nasturtium bud.

We could quote and quote again; but that nasturtium bud is a sufficient goal. Mr. Capes is fond of buds, and just here we can illustrate his want of thrift. This story fills thirty-seven pages, and three times within its small limits does Mr. Capes invoke the aid of buds. On page 19, where he is describing the beauty of the landlord's daughter, he says:

One might wish to cull her face at its slender neck like a flower, and put it in a vase of fragrant water to watch the blue eyes bud and open.

One would suppose that after that flight Mr. Capes would leave buds alone. Literary tact demanded there should at least be no echo of such an ambitious utterance.

But two pages later we have the monk's faced compared to a nasturtium bud.

Finally (we could weep for vexation) Mr. Capes uses the word with a daring felicity, an audacious rightness, which ought to have withered both preceding buds out of the tale. For in describing the return of the wolves after dusk had fallen, and the murderous monk's terror when he sees Lacoste's avengers, Mr. Capes thrills us with the sentence:

A score of rabid snouts budded through the gloom before him.

What is one to say to a writer who can so make literature, and so mar it? We have again been betrayed into attending only to Mr. Capes's style. His matter is excellent, and we can honestly say that "The Sword of Corporal Lacoste" will haunt us for long.

The Collapse of the Penitent. By Frederick Wedmore. (Hutchinson & Co.)

Nor vehement, not passionate, but refined, exact, tempered, self-conscious, subtle, and calmly convincing—such is this record of a pretty and talented Bohemian's fall. Mr. Wedmore's concern has always been with the arts—every art—and although his chemists are justly notable, he is more at home and more successful with characters of an artistic temperament; he knows intimately their atmosphere, and can put in the local colour with a hand at once discreet and lavish. In Rose Damarel, pianist, daughter of Bohemianism, he has selected precisely the person to suit his peculiar powers. And he triumphs with brilliance over the difficulties of the character. Rose is a woman of surprising moods—chiefly caused, perhaps, by "the dreadful obligation to be what is called 'respectable.'" All her instincts are wild and free, against regularity. From the first memorable day, at Henley, when she meets Lister the dramatist, her tendencies, in the quietest suggestive hints, are plainly revealed. With her, sooner or later, it is bound to be flight and the boat-train to Dover. But by what extraordinary steps, after what feints, retreats, self-deceptions, and noble aspirations, does she reach Charing Cross with her unlicensed lover! Mr. Wedmore's handling of the complex problem has the assurance of mastery. Everywhere—whether Rose is nursing with fervid adoration the sick child of her lawful union, or casting herself into the arms of Lister, or repenting in the nick of time, or flaunting it, so sensitively, with "Tommy Worsley of the Guards," or dying at the cacophonous piano of a fifteenth-rate Parisian brasserie à femmes—one has the stern, comfortable feeling that "this was so," and was so inevitably. In the virtuosity of its analysis of the feminine heart we can only compare The Collapse of the Penitent, among recent novels, with Marcel Prévost's Le Jardin Secret. We think that Mr. Wedmore will not object to such a comparison.

Most of the few other characters are done nearly as well as Rose. Mr. Vasey, her husband, the man whose business, as a picture-dealer dans le mouvement, it was to "place" men, is drawn in a vein of fierce and inexorable satire; he is repellently alive. Old Damarel, the violin-mender, is surrounded with an exquisite tender sentiment. The failure among the characters is certainly Lister; Lister is a figure set up, but not breathed upon with the breath of life. The minor characters are admirable. And the writing, the wit, the observation are admirable. Mr. Wedmore may have done a better book than this, but we doubt. It is a novel about an artist written by an artist for artists. Slight, minute and delicate, it will yet float surely and conspicuous, on the vast grey unimportant sea of modern English fiction.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE WEST END.

BY PERCY WHITE.

A study of smart society. Writing in the person of the shrewd, crippled, private secretary of John Treadaway, jam manufacturer and merchant prince, Mr. White tells us how that worthy deliberately sets up his tabernacle in Belgravia, and invades Society. It is a capital study, full of satire and observation of something more than the "smart" order. "This is a big scheme we've got in hand, Rupert," says the jam-manufacturer, as he watches the builders finishing a winged lion over the porch of his new home, "a deuced big scheme." (Sands & Co. 6s.)

FATE THE FIDDLER.

BY HERBERT C. MACILWAINE.

The author of that excellent story of Australian life, Dinkinbar, again gives us Australia for a background. "A stretch of untilled, untouched Australia" lies before us in the first paragraph, and in the second we are told that this is "the simple tale of the struggles of two ordinary young Britons—against the elements, including man, their latest born—to make a living, and, if it might be, a fortune, in their adopted country." (Constable. 6s.)

A MAN: HIS MARK.

BY W. C. MORROW.

A short, strong novel by the author of The Ape, The Idiot, and Other People. Adrian Walden finds himself snowed up in his hut under Mount Shasta with a lady whose leg has been broken in a coach accident. The two are imprisoned for weeks by an avalanche and the continued snowfall. A situation of great delicacy is delicately treated, and a very careful study is made of the two characters, who discover that they have had much to do with the shaping of each other's lives. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.)

WOMAN AND ARTIST.

BY MAX O'RELL.

In his first chapter Max O'Rell discusses the charge brought by Englishmen against Frenchmen that they do not know the meaning of the word "home"; but the chapter ends on this subject, and has no real connexion with the story, which is a study in the blighting effects on home life of social ambition. Philip Grantham, A.R.A., is serenely happy in St. John's Wood until, in the desire to see his beautiful wife reign as a West End hostess, he neglects painting and invents a shell which is purchased by the French and Russian Governments. We follow Philip and his wife through the maze and blaze of Belgravia life. Philip's diseased ambition runs its course, and love and art and St. John's Wood are restored. (Warne & Co. 3s. 6d.)

COMRADES TRUE.

BY ANNIE THOMAS
(MRS. PENDER CUDDLIP).

This is such a novel as one would expect from the author of The Siren's Web. It is pleasant reading, and there are two heroes (comrades true) and two heroines, not to mention Jock, the fox terrier. An unusual method of personal description is this: "What was she like? Very much like the central figure in Leslie's charming picture called 'School Revisited.'" (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

BY THE EARL OF ELLESMERE (CHARLES GRANVILLE).

"The Extraordinary Adventures of an Ordinary Man" is the sub-title of this novel by the author of Mrs. John Foster. The hero wakes up, commonplace and fancy-free, on his thirtieth birthday, to find that a capital sum of £75,000, on which he has hitherto had the interest, is to be made over to him. He is an ordinary man when he goes to Lord Carnforth's bank to draw this sum; his "extraordinary adventures" begin when he finds that the money has been drawn by a young lady professing to be his private secretary. The developments are many and curious. (Heinemann. 6s.)

A LADY OF THE REGENCY.

BY MRS. STEPNEY RAWSON.

The story is laid in London and Northumberland, and opens about the year 1813 in George the Third's court. Many historical personages are introduced. Byron, for instance, leaning on the arm of Lord Alvanley, is encountered on page 153. Says Lady Curragh to Alvanley: "For this renewal of my friendship with Lord Byron I thank you. You always bring me wit; to-day you bring me soul as well." (Hutchinson. 6s.)

BEQUEATHED.

BY BEATRICE WHITBY.

Miss Whitby's novels grow steadily in number, and this resembles its predecessors in being a thoroughly pleasant story, in which the course of love runs fairly smoothly under quiet, English, and probable circumstances. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

THE TEMPTATION OF OLIVE

LATIMER.

BY MRS. L. T. MEADE.

In the frontispiece the heroine is reclining in a basket chair above the explanation, "Geoffrey watched her anxiously." Elsewhere she is carressing "Trots"; and in one picture we are permitted to see her adjusting her hat before her bedroom looking-glass. A readable domestic story. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE SHADOW OF ALLAH.

BY MORLEY ROBERTS AND MAX MONTESOLE.

"Being the Adventures of Sarif ak Rarasy, the Circassian, in Stamboul." Local colour and vernacular are put in with a generous hand: "'Inshallah,' added the Softa, 'the Padisha has now discovered the perfidy of his viziers, and he will send them to Djihenna with their Muscovite paymasters.' 'What can you expect, after all,' whispered a tchibouk merchant, 'from the Farmacion?'" The story is full of action and footnotes. (John Long. 6s.)

THE DEVIL'S KITCHEN.

BY A. B. LOUIS.

This is one of those perplexing novels in which the title re-appears as the title of a novel in the story. However, it is a readable tale, introducing a publisher and his clients, one of whom, maddened by the rejection of his stories, committed a murderous assault on a wrong man, and was "detained during Her Majesty's pleasure." He was consoled by the merciful delusion that he had climbed the ladder and was a great novelist. To visitors to the asylum he would loftily say: "Never despair. If I had given in, I should not be where I am now." (Sands & Co. 3s. 6d.)

A GENTLEMAN IN KHAKI.

BY JOHN OAKLEY.

Chapter headings like "How Ladysmith was Saved" and "The Tangle of the Tugela" prepare the reader for a war story full of the actualities of the present struggle in South Africa. (Chatto & Windus. 1s.)

Tinkering the Bible.

THERE has been a notion abroad in recent years that the language of the Bible, as we have it in the Authorised Version of 1611, needs to be modernised in order that it may make a lively appeal to modern minds. But the efforts made in this direction have not been very hopeful. Even the Revised Version was, for most people, a gigantic bubble, which burst as soon as born; and the small private attempts which have been made since have burst as quietly in its wake. The latest product of this well-meaning crusade is Dr. Henry Hayman's work, entitled The Epistles of the New Testament: an Attempt to Present Them in Current and Popular Idiom (A. & C. Black). We propose to examine Dr. Hayman's aim and execution with some care, for we believe that such enterprises as his are at least useful in demonstrating the impregnability of a work of literary art like the Authorised Version; and that they exhibit certain fallacies which it is well to dissipate. Dr. Hayman's professed aim in re-wording the Epistles has been "to present them in current and popular idiom." That he presents them in no such garb is the first conviction that is forced upon the reader. Dr. Hayman employs neither the words nor the constructions of everyday life. The mere retention of "thou" and "thee," of "art" and "hast," of "couldst" and "wouldest," is a clear breach of the design, these words forming no part of current and popular idioms. It is quite a common thing for Dr. Hayman to replace clear English by difficult English, and a familiar construction by a rare one. Thus, Paul's simple sentence, "For he that is dead is freed from sin," becomes, in Dr. Hayman's version, "For the dead to sin is enfranchised from its power"—a change, surely, in the very opposite direction to that proposed in the author's plan. Again, the words in Romans x. 21: "All day long I have stretched forth my hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people," become: "All day long I stretch forth my hands towards a people refractory and recusant." Here, again, the change seems to be precisely antagonistic to the aim announced. Two adjectives are latinised, and the idiom which, in the Authorised Version, places them before the noun they qualify is exchanged for an idiom, certainly less current and certainly less popular, which places them after that noun. Concerning the purely literary effect of the changes we need say nothing. An astonishing example of Dr. Hayman's work is afforded by a comparison of the two versions of a passage in the Epistle to the Philippians, which everyone knows by heart:

AUTHORISED VERSION.

Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things.

DR. HAYMAN.

Finally, brethren, let every principle of truth, reverence, rectitude, purity; all that is endearing, all that is auspicious; whatever there be that is excellent and praiseworthy; dwell in your thoughts.

Here Dr. Hayman substitutes long words for short, and a faulty construction for a good; and he simply underpins and brings down the rhetorical scheme of the passage which he professes to improve. For that Dr. Hayman hopes to improve every sentence he alters seems clear. Otherwise he would not expressly declare in his Preface that some phrases in the Authorised Version cannot be improved upon, and will therefore be retained unaltered in his own version. However, this admission prepares the reader to witness Dr. Hayman's courage rather than his discretion, for there are few passages on which he does not exercise his skill. Even Paul's entreaty to the believers at Corinth, "Greet one another with an holy kiss," becomes, "Exchange a kiss of sanctity with one another," leaving us astonished by the moderation which did not impel him to write: "Exchange osculations of sanctity with one another." Dr. Hayman's handling of the Authorised Version is seen at its boldest when he alters the words "encompassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses" into "encircled with so vast a cloud of attesting spectators." "Encompassed" is not necessarily "encircled," and "witnesses" means (precisely) "attesting spectators," with the obvious advantage that it is a comely English word instead of two words of Latin complexion and little charm. The sacrifice of charm is the unvarying feature of modernised versions of the Bible. Take this example:

AUTHORISED VERSION.

Charity suffereth long, and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up,

Doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil;

Rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth;

Beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.

DR. HAYMAN.

Charity is long suffering, is kindly, is void of envy, is no braggart, is not inflated, preserves decorum, avoids self-seeking, is not irritable, imputes not the evil done, has no joy at evil doing, but rejoices on the side of the truth; puts up with all things, gives credit for all things, hopes all things, endures all things.

Sometimes the flight is nearly from the sublime to the ridiculous. Thus:

AUTHORISED VERSION.

I therefore so run, not as uncertainly; so fight I, not as one that beateth the air:

But I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection; lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway.

DR. HAYMAN.

I accordingly so run as if I meant to win; and so plant my hits not as idly sparring; but I hit home at my own fleshly frame, and tame it into subserviency; for fear I, who proclaim the contest to others, should come to be rejected myself.

These examples of an effort to modernise the Bible language are so surprising, that it may be well to seek further light on Dr. Hayman's actual intentions. The most significant sentence in his Preface is this: "I have striven to answer to myself the question, How would these fathers of our faith have expressed themselves, if the vernacular English of our own day had been their medium of expression?" This calls for thought. The vernacular should mean the whole vernacular, or it is nothing. To credit Paul, Peter, and James, in imagination, with a knowledge of only those English words of to-day which approximately reproduce the meanings of their own words, would be to beg the question. It would be to raise the question of correct translation, whereas the question raised by Dr. Hayman is clearly that of expression in its largest sense. If we really are to inquire how Paul would have expressed himself in the English vernacular of to-day, we must begin by imagining that he possessed as full a knowledge of that vernacular as ourselves—his readers. We must also—it is inevitable—impute to him a knowledge not only of all our words, but of all they stand for; in a word, we must credit him with the same heritage of knowledge as we ourselves enjoy, including (oh, confusion!) our knowledge of himself derived from the Authorised Version. We might then—pace all absurdities—receive Paul's Epistles from his hand in the English vernacular of to-day, and hear him draw his illustrations from such vernacular facts as the rotundity of the earth, wireless telegraphy, forbidden incense, and the prosyletising zeal of Mr. Mallock. And a daring writer might conceivably endeavour to personate this modern St. Paul, and re-think and re-write his Epistles for men and women of to-day. This would be, at any rate, a logical attempt to show—what Dr. Hayman proposes to show, but does not—how Paul of Tarsus would have expressed himself “if the vernacular English of to-day had been his medium of expression.” But the result would not be the Bible. The Bible was written in certain periods and in certain languages, and all that can be done is to translate a given portion from the language in which it was first written into the language in which it is proposed to be read, taking verbal equivalents as we find them, and submitting to the disadvantages arising from differences in the knowledge, tastes, and ideals of the two periods. The Authorised Version was a supremely good example of translation, because it not only did this task work, but took on a rare beauty and energy of its own. Moreover, it carried out Dr. Hayman's own plan: it presented the Bible in “current and popular idioms.” That the need for such presentation was infinitely greater in 1611 than it is in 1900 does not need to be demonstrated to anyone acquainted, however slightly, with the development of the English language. Since 1611 the language has grown enormously, but has altered little; and it is certain that Shakespeare, in the Elysian Libraries, reads The Ring and the Book with far greater ease than he reads The Romaunt of the Rose. But granting that the Authorised Version presents the Bible in an English form which has been devitalised by the changes that have come over the language in the interval of nearly three centuries, and that these changes justify an attempt to present the Bible in the “current and popular idioms” of to-day, still the mere substitution of new idioms for old is a very small part of the matter. Language is inseparable from thought, and the thought of the few is warmed and coloured by the thoughts of the many, and things possible in one age are impossible in another. In 1611 English faith was at its strongest. The language had passed triumphantly out of its old inflectional stages, and had fulfilled itself in Shakespeare's Plays. It had reached, as far as we know, its utmost serviceableness to literature, and literature had reached its utmost power to employ the language. The beauty of words was felt, and verbal melody was a habit rather than a secret. As the child of his age, Shakespeare wrote his plays. As children of their age, the translators of the Bible produced the Authorised Version. They had the perceptions and immunities which belong to a great literary epoch. We cannot wholly account for their success: the wind bloweth where it listeth. But it is as unwise to tamper with a Bible which our age could not have produced as it is to meddle with cathedrals which our age could not have built. The value of a Version is not so much a question of idioms as of idiosyncrasy, and we must not change the one until we can match the other. In a new fervour of the race we may build a new York Minster or a new Bible; but—the wind bloweth where it listeth. This lesson is sufficiently enforced by Dr. Hayman's book, in which, side by side, we may read:

For we know in part, and we prophesy in part.

But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away.

For partial now is our field of knowledge, and partial our scope of inspiration. But when our full development shall be reached, all that is partial shall be superseded then.

Things Seen.

“A Certain Priest.”

HE had a way of sitting a little apart from the rest, with his head thrown back and his profile in strong relief. From this you will remark that he has a profile. No man who had not would dare to sit like that. In this position he was wont to listen to other people's sermons—meditating, perchance, his own.

Nature had been very kind to him. She had mirrored in his face and form the beauty of his soul. She had given him, moreover, a haunting voice, and the power of reaching others.

There is a picturesque way of doing most things. And that was his way.

This is how he said the Creed. I have sometimes thought that he was the only man I ever knew who understood how to say it, and how to stand, and look, when he did say it.

He wheeled slowly round to the East—his head raised slightly, his thin hands loosely folded. At the Incarnation, Death, and Burial he knelt instinctively, as the natural expression of the humiliation he so evidently felt. At the sound of the “Resurrection” the whole man thrilled with a sense of its triumph and wonderful love. Throughout the whole, his eyes were fixed on the cross on the altar before him. . . . And yet, somehow, I thought he saw beyond. . . . He always remained facing eastward a little longer than anyone else, and he always lingered a moment on “The Life of the World to come.” . . . I used to wonder what those words meant for him. . . . But now I know. . . . One day I heard him tell the children that the New life would be just the Old made perfect . . .

The Old made perfect! . . . Amen to that, dear Stranger.

The Automatic.

I FOUND I had to change at the Junction.

There were a good many people waiting on the other platform; evidently an excursion. Two—an old labourer and a child—had wandered across to my side. All the man's remaining vigour was in his grip on the little one's hand. She seemed to be a grandchild he was pleasuring.

They were on the return journey, yet the child was plainly unsatisfied.

They wandered up the platform and stopped by an automatic machine.

“See y'ere, dearie, what's this?”

“There's sweets in that. You puts a penny in there an' they comes out there!”

The child looked up; she grasped the nature of the machine at once.

Swinging heavily forward she watched the box, then the man's face, eagerly.

“I knows. Put it in.”

This demand seemed a thunderbolt to the old man.

Still gazing helplessly at the automatic, he jerked his stiff hand to his pocket, fumbled awhile, and jerked it out again.

His wrinkles deepened a little. Making a clumsy effort he tried to set scholastic pride aflame.

“Look at them pretty letters. You can read 'em, can't yer? What's that big un? C, ain't it? And that's a H, an' a O. There's another C.”

“Choc'lat,” said the child. “I knows what that is. I likes it. Ain't it time to put the penny in?”

The old man worked gallantly on.

“There's another big letter. B, ain't it? an' 'U, an' two T's.”

“I'd rather 'ave choc'lat,” said the child, almost dancing with excitement.

"Where do you put the penny in? Show me."

She tilted her face up to the old man's, and then she began to foresee disappointment. Her words poured forth fast and furious.

"Put it in. Put it in now."

Then shrilly: "Ain't yer got one? Carn't I 'ave none?"

The old man pulled her towards the subway, and I saw no more of them.

Mr. Andrew Lang on Fiction.

SIR,—That Mr. Lang contemns the literature which takes the form of a novel it is impossible to doubt. That he is unable to estimate its value, to classify it or in any way to realise what that very comprehensive word "fiction" actually embraces, is equally impossible to doubt after reading "The Supremacy of the Novel," from his pen, in the Westminster Gazette of May 7. But with this contempt there are not a few amazing statements in the article, made to further some kind of argument that the world of letters has fairly gone to the dogs because of the prevalence of the novel (not frankly said, but insinuated), that display a want of discrimination really provoking from a man of letters.

Mr. Lang extensively quotes Bulwer-Lytton's summing-up of the literary market of his time, and asserts "all this might have been written to-day." With the exception of some vague generalisations, the remarks are wholly inapplicable to our day.

Mr. Lang further writes: "Greece and Rome and pre-Revolutionary Europe produced literature in all its species while we tend to produce novels only." In Mr. Andrew Lang's lifetime there have probably been more works of philosophic value, historic accuracy, and poetic merit (of this last, excluding the sixteenth century) than at any other period of the world's history. That novels of a paltry value by the side of these have been produced to an overwhelming number and purchased by the public only signifies that to-day there is an immense population that in past generations never read anything. This taste of the crowd neither augments nor diminishes the number of serious readers, unless, indeed, towards reading at all, which it must be admitted is always a step to better things from the grosser pastimes of illiterate ages. But the public that reads serious literature is equally greater in number than at any other period. It may be asserted that such writers as Darwin, Spencer, Huxley, Bain are more universally read than ever were Descartes, Locke, and Condillac. We know that Carlyle, Ruskin, Arnold, Emerson have been sold in immense numbers. Such fine novels as may be counted literature have not had a much greater sale. Mr. Lang confuses things. We have never heard that such masters as Nathaniel Hawthorne, George Meredith, and Henry James had the extensive sales Mr. Lang seems to envy, peculiar to certain novels of the moment. Popular work in all branches finds a big market not less than cheap and inferior goods of other manufacture. It is a pity to confound this merchandise with Art be it fiction in prose or verse.

Such books as have been written by Mr. Meredith or Mr. Henry James rise above, indeed tower above, in every kind of way, the expositions of subjective philosophers, metaphysical meanderings, tirades of criticism, or catalogues of historical events Mr. Lang deprecates as no longer read.

Would Mr. Lang have us believe that Lost Leaders is of the stuff, shall we say, of Tit-Bits (yet both come under the heading of journalism), and force us to cry out at its immense sale? Nevertheless, Lost Leaders hardly has the sale of Tit-Bits.

A great novel is an amazingly difficult article to produce,

Mr. Lang must have found that, and his contempt expressed in the suggestion that a novel is barely literature falls equally upon such fiction as "Hamlet," The Scarlet Letter, The Egoist, The Odyssey, or the beautiful stories told in Holy Writ.—I am, &c.,

An Index Expurgatorius of Words.

SIR,—Your correspondent "H. B." does not seem to me quite accurate in stating that one of the words prohibited by Mr. W. Cullen Bryant in his Index Expurgatorius is the appellation "esquire." There is nothing to show that Mr. Bryant objected to the use of this word in any one of its legitimate meanings. In the list given in the ACADEMY of April 28 it was the abbreviation "Esq." that Mr. Bryant wished to place in the Index. It is obvious that "Esq." covers a much wider range of ideas than "esquire." To the different categories of persons who, according to "H. B.," are alone entitled to use the designation "esquire" should, I think, be added officers in the army of the rank of captain or above it, together with those holding corresponding relative rank in the navy, who are designated as esquires in the Queen's commission. I do not feel quite certain of the ground on which bachelors of divinity, law, and physic base their claims to the appellation.

Nearly every word in the list will admit of some discussion, but want of space forbids this excursion into the realm of academics. Lengthy, as you well point out, is by no means a vulgar synonym of long. To take a single instance, Walter Pater, whose fastidiousness in the choice of words amounted almost to a weakness, says, in speaking of Mrs. Humphry Ward: "In truth, that quiet method of evolution, which she pursues undismayed to the end, requires a certain lengthiness" (Essays from the Guardian, p. 60). The use of the word on this occasion is justified by the fact that no other could, even approximately, so well express the writer's meaning. And so with many others tabooed by Mr. Bryant.—I am, &c.,

W. F. P.

Henry Lawson.

SIR,—In view of the vast amount of rubbish which has recently been poured out under the name of patriotic verse, perhaps some of your readers might not object to my bringing before their notice a poem which is probably unknown to them, and which possesses no less poetic ring than true patriotism. Written some few years ago, before there was any indication of a grand Imperial struggle, Henry Lawson's "Star of Australasia" must be regarded as prophetic of the present colonial military enthusiasm. It was published in 1896 in a volume entitled In the Days when the World was Wide, but the book, though containing many good things, would be difficult to buy in this country. The poem to which I make special reference begins with the assurance that the day will come when Australasia will be able to forget the sordid first chapter of its history, and that "The Star of the South shall rise in the lurid clouds of war." It continues:

There are boys out there by the western creeks, who hurry away from school
To climb the sides of the breezy peaks or dive in the shaded pool,
Who'll stick to their guns when the mountains quake to the tread of a mighty war,
And fight for Right or a Grand Mistake as men never fought before;
When the peaks are scarred and the sea-walls crack till the furthest hills vibrate,
And the world for a while goes rolling back in a storm of love and hate.

There are boys to-day in the city slum and the home of wealth and pride
Who'll have one home when the storm is come, and fight for it side by side,
Who'll hold the cliffs 'gainst the armoured hells that batter
a coastal town
Or grimly die in a hail of shells when the walls come crushing down.
And many a pink-white baby girl, the queen of her home
to-day,
Shall see the wings of the tempest whirl the mist of our dawn away—
Shall live to shudder and stop her ears to the thud of the distant gun,
And know the sorrow that has no tears when a battle is lost or won—
As a mother or wife in the years to come, will kneel, wild-eyed and white,
And pray to God in her darkened home for the "men in the fort to-night."

The poet goes on to tell that in the struggle Australasia will awake to feel and see the "soul of the world," and that in success or adversity their lungs will inbreathe a larger life.

They'll know the glory of victory—and the grandeur of defeat.

Every boy will be wanting to fight; the children will "run to the doors and cry, 'Oh, mother, the troops are come!'"

And fools, when the fiends of war are out and the city skies aflame,
Will have something better to talk about than a sister or brother's shame,
Will have something nobler to do by far than to jest at a friend's expense,
Or to blacken a name in a public bar or over a back-yard fence.
And this you learn from the libelled past, though its methods were somewhat rude—
A nation's born where the shells fall fast, or its lease of life renewed.
We in part atone for the ghoulish strife, for the crimes of the peace we boast,
And the better part of a people's life in the storm comes uppermost.

I fear to quote more lest you should consider me unfair in my demand upon your space. It is a very simple matter to find artistic blemishes in the piece—indeed, in most of Henry Lawson's work—but his vigour, his freshness of expression, and his sanity must surely commend themselves to the reader.—I am, &c.,

May 7, 1900.

ARTHUR MAQUARIE.

The Missing Word.

SIR,—I cannot see that the missing word is wanted.
Why are we to nickname ourselves? Let others call us Englishers, Britishers, and so forth. I was born of Irish parents at the Cape of Good Hope. I have spent most of my life in India, where my children were born. What are the two ties which bind sons and daughters of the Empire together? Firstly, we are all under the rule of an English Queen (who, I may say in passing, does not call herself an Anglo-German!); secondly, we all, with varying accents and idioms, speak the English language; collectively, to ourselves and others, we are English. St. Paul, though a Hebrew of the purest blood, was not ashamed to be a Roman citizen, nor was Tarsus despised because she was a libera civitas of Rome. The "missing-word" notion is a new one. No Anglo-Indian wished to be labelled Hiberno-Indian or Scoto-Indian. We are all of us English in our loyalty to our English Queen and her English empire, and I am, for all my Irish origin, colonial birth and Indian domicile—

AN ENGLISHWOMAN.

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

INTERPRETATIONS OF POETRY AND RELIGION.

BY GEORGE SANTAYANA.

Prof. Santayana's work, The Sense of Beauty, published three years ago, was a stimulating performance, though its metaphysics, like all metaphysics, were open to much criticism. Into this volume Prof. Santayana has gathered a number of papers which he hopes tend in their various ways to uphold the idea that religion and poetry are identical in essence, and differ merely in the way in which they are attached to practical affairs. "It would naturally follow from this conception that religious doctrines would do well to withdraw their pretensions to be dealing with matters of fact. That pretension is not only the source of the conflicts of religion with science and of the vain and bitter controversies of sects; it is also the cause of the impurity and incoherence of religion in the soul, when it seeks its sanctions in the sphere of reality, and forgets that its proper concern is to express the ideal." It will be seen that Prof. Santayana's book at least contains bold and interesting thoughts. (Black. 6s.)

TWENTY FAMOUS NAVAL BATTLES: SALAMIS TO SANTIAGO.

BY EDWARD KIRK
RAWSON.

Mr. Rawson is Superintendent of Naval War Records to the United States Navy, and the title he has chosen for these two fairly bulky volumes is a sufficient explanation of their contents. It would be too much, however, to describe this as an episodic history of naval warfare.
From Salamis to Actium and from Actium to Lepanto are long leaps. The illustrations are good and numerous.
(Isbister. 2 vols. 21s. net).

OUR FLEET OF TO-DAY.

BY CAPTAIN S. EARDLEY-
WILMOT.

This is a revised edition of the author's well-known work, The Development of Navies during the Last Half Century. The growth of foreign navies in the last ten years has necessitated the elimination of the chapter dealing with this branch of the subject, which would require a separate volume. The development of our own navy from 1840 to the present date is now the sole subject dealt with.
A chapter on "Lessons of Recent Naval Wars" forms part of the added matter. (Seeley & Co. 5s.)

AMONG THE BIRDS OF NORTHERN SHIRES.

BY CHARLES DIXON.

Mr. Dixon's ornithological books are becoming numerous.
His present volume may be considered as the counterpart of his Bird Life in a Southern County. In it he devotes much space to comparisons between the birds of the northern shires and those of the south of England. For the number and interest of its birds Mr. Dixon unhesitatingly gives the palm to the north as against the south, and he makes many comparisons between the birds of the two districts. The subject of migration, too, naturally occupies far more space here than in the earlier and companion volume. (Blackie & Son. 7s. 6d.)

THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

BY THOMAS CARLYLE.

Messrs. Macmillan's "Library of English Classics" is growing apace. We have had many "dainty" editions of masterpieces, but those who desire something in the nature of a library edition, handsome, spacious, and yet light in the hand, will do well to acquire the volumes in this "Library"; they are excellent specimens of the art of book-building. (Macmillan. 2 vols. 7s.)

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 34 (New Series).

WE asked our readers last week to furnish such a description of a motor car as Dr. Johnson might have written in his Visit to the Hebrides if he had encountered one of these vehicles in his travels. Several competitors, ignoring the terms of our competition, have personated Boswell instead of Johnson. F. L. A., of Ealing, would have been awarded the prize if she had not made Johnson's description a spoken instead of a written one. We asked for such a description as the Doctor might have given in his Visit to the Hebrides, and we are bound by the letter of our offer. We have awarded the prize to Mr. S. Berkley, 34, Springfield-road, St. Leonards-on-Sea, to whom a cheque for One Guinea has been sent. Mr. Berkley's answer is as follows :

That the eye may be the victim of hallucination, that the sense of hearing may misconceive its own internal impressions, believing that to be external to itself which is occasioned only by its own imperfection; nay, that even the olfactory organs, quickened by desire, or enfeebled by disease, may leap to conclusions unwarranted by fact and contrary to probability — each of these things separately is possible, and indeed borne out by experience; but that three senses should simultaneously combine to delude one who has hitherto called himself a reasonable being would be incredible but for the following circumstance: Yesterday, on the high road, within full view of the mansion of my host, there flashed, crashed, shot by me, with what appeared unexampled velocity, a machine, a portent, hideous as unexpected. Unaided by visible force external to itself it precipitated offensive igneous vapour as it passed, and instantly disappeared.

Among other answers are these :

In the morning we rose to pursue our journey, with the alacrity imparted by the refreshment of repose. But although the influence of Somnus had invigorated our limbs, it had not, it would seem, succeeded in imbuing us with that mental fortitude requisite for the encountering of unforeseen and formidable danger. For, I must confess, it was not with the intrepidity of a Fabricius that I first came in contact with that monstrous prodigy of human invention, the Motor Car. We were making the ascent of a somewhat uneasy road, when my companion, in vehement and inelegant vernacular, called upon me to beware; and in the space of a moment, with incredible velocity, and with a noise compared with which the bulls of Lucania were assuredly harmonious, this novel vehicle passed by. Alarm, however, for my personal security, and disgust at the nauseating odour that saluted our nostrils after its departure, could not but temper my admiration for the superiority of Human Ingenuity. [S. F.]

No, sir, I shall not be persuaded that any consideration of public profit or private convenience, any reasoning of the refined intellect or instinctive apprehension of the vulgar mind can estimate the guilt of the man who contrived this contemptible vehicle. It is a savage chariot, unarmed, indeed, with scythes, but emitting groans of the damned and odours of Tartarus. It disturbs the innocent games of childhood and the peripatetic meditations of the philosopher. Popular wisdom prohibits the setting of the cart before the horse. Here you see a horseless cart whose reckless speed surpasses the swiftest horses —

"qualis equos Thracissa fatigat Harpalyce" — a car which resembles the incredible inventions of Arabian magi. In the shadows of the rough mountains of Caledonia, in the depopulated valleys of the north, this monstrum horrendum may be suffered. But I refuse to imagine its irruption into the orderly bustle of Fleet-street. [F. L. A., Ealing]

AN IMPORTANT ADDITION TO WELSH HISTORY.
THE WELSH PEOPLE: their Origin, History, Laws, Language, Literature, and Characteristics. By JOHN RHYS, Principal of Jesus College, and Professor of Celtic in the University of Oxford; and D. BRYNMOR JONES, Q.C., M.P. With 2 Maps. Cloth, 16s.

AN EARLY REVIEW.
"All intelligent Welshmen and others interested in all questions connected with Wales, will give it a welcome worthy of the high standing of the authors and of the importance of the work. It is decidedly the most important work dealing with Wales published since the appearance of Sir Thomas Phillips's well-known, but far less valuable, volume on the same subject. For its general excellence and accuracy as a book of reference, and an authoritative account of Wales past and present, the names of the authors afford a sufficient guarantee."—Western Mail (Cardiff).

Pioneering ON THE Congo.

By W. HOLMAN BENTLEY,

Chevalier de l'Ordre Royal du Lion; Author of "The Dictionary and Grammar of the Kongo Language," "Life on the Congo"; Translator of the New Testament into Kongo, &c.

This is a work of exceptional interest, and narrates the author's twenty-one years' experience of life along the shores of the great Congo River, and the Congo tribes which inhabit them. Mr. Bentley was one of the first missionaries sent to the Congo by the Baptist Society. He visited the Congo tribes while they were practically untouched by any foreign influence, and has lived in close contact with the people. He has given in this work a full record of the triumphs of the Gospel among these savage tribes.

The work is very fully illustrated from photographs and sketches, and will be found rich in matters that should appeal to all who take an interest in the geography and ethnology of Western Africa, and in the progress and development of barbarous people and wild countries.

"The book is one which should appeal to a much wider circle than that specially concerned with missionary enterprise. It forms a distinct addition to existing accounts of pioneer work in tropical Africa."

Morning Post.

"While the narrative is essentially a missionary's, it contains much ethnological and political matter."—Academy.

"Mr. Bentley's book is so brightly written, and is so crammed with interesting information, that, apart altogether from the missionary element, it should be one of the most popular books of the season. To those, however, who follow the progress of missions with sympathy, 'Pioneering on the Congo' will be simply fascinating. It is one of the best illustrated missionary books we have seen."—Christian World.

"Mr. Bentley's book, with its abundant pictures, is a valuable contribution to our knowledge of this dark and obscure region."

The Literary Week.

M. MAETERLINCK will contribute an article to the June number of the Fortnightly Review called "The Evolution of Mystery." Mr. Alfred Sutro has made the English translation.

M. FLAMMARION'S new, and in some quarters eagerly awaited book, The Unknown, is a work of close upon five hundred pages. Four hundred of them are devoted to "cases" of telepathic communications made by the dying, transmission of thought, premonitory dreams and divination of the future. In a final chapter called "Conclusion" we find this sentence: "It is certain that one soul can influence another soul at a distance, and without the aid of the senses."

THE Poet Laureate was not inspired when he sat down to sing of Mafeking in seven stanzas. They appeared in the Times. We must be content with quoting one:

Once again, banners, fly!
Clang again, bells, on high,
Sounding to sea and sky
Longer and louder
Mafeking's glory with Kimberley, Ladysmith,
Of our unconquered kith,
Prouder and prouder.

Confound this wretched verse,
So plaguery hard and terse:
Just makes a poet curse
Working for hours:
Bother old Drayton's shade,
Bother the verse he made,
Bother "The Light Br gade,"
Now for my flowers.

We should add that the second of the above stanzas is from a parody of the Laureate's verses in the Daily News.

THE title of Mr. Kipling's new novel is, we understand, Kim of the Rishiti.

Lest We Forget Them, a souvenir of the war by Lady Glover, will shortly be issued by the Fine Art Society. The souvenir will be illustrated by Mr. M. D. Hewerdine, and will contain original poems and new songs by A. Scott-Gatty and Mrs. Salmond. The profits from the sale of the work will be devoted to the widows and orphans of our soldiers and sailors

A CORRESPONDENT assures us that memoirs are of three kinds:

respondent.

Mr. Hellawell ..... Daily Mail..... } Captured.
Mr. George Lynch... Morning Herald }
Mr. Hales ..... Australian ..... }

To which must now be added the names of Mr. John Stuart, of the Morning Post, who has been captured, and Mr. Charles Hands of the Daily Mail, who was severely wounded in the advance on Mafeking. Mr. Lynch arrived in London last week. At Durban he was very ill for several weeks with enteric fever.

THE war-correspondents whose graves are now to be sought on the veldts of South Africa are not likely to be forgotten when the duty of raising monuments in London begins—as it soon must. The names of the war-correspondents who fell in Egypt fifteen years ago are commemorated on a large brass tablet in the crypt of St. Paul's Cathedral. The inscription is as follows:

In our "Bibliographical" column we deal with a letter we have received from Capt. E. Arthur Haggard, written from Bloemfontein, in which the gallant officer corrects some particulars given in our issue of March 17 of his literary work. It is pleasant to find that a soldier who is wielding his sword for his country can sit down to deal with literary matters.

THE current North American Review contains a dramatic poem by Mr. W. B. Yeats, on a theme drawn from Irish legend. Mr. Yeats is one of the few who handle such legends, not as mere exotics, but in a spirit truly and natively kindred to their own. "The Shadowy Waters" seems to us the best thing he has done in this kind for some time. It is very simple, recounting the voyage of the prince Feargal in search of an immortal love foretold by the gods. He finds it in Dectora, a captive woman brought to him from a captured ship among the misty seas; who has herself sailed to find a divinely foretold hero in an unknown holy place. The poem ends with their sailing away alone, to find immortal rest among "the streams where the world ends."

BUT this simple tale Mr. Yeats infuses with all that magic of vaporous dream which is his peculiar and sole secret among living poets. Yet the expression which produces this effect is as pellucid as rain-drops. Full of beauty, it is handled in his finest manner—a manner which recalls his early Wanderings of Usheen. For instance:

He who longs
For happier love, but finds unhappiness,
And falls among the dreams the drowsy gods
Breathe on the burnished mirror of the world
And then smoothe out with ivory hands and sigh.

Or again:

Her eyelids tremble and the white foam fades;
The stars would hurt their crowns among the foam
Were they but lifted up."

It is evident that Mr. Yeats retains his full gift—if, indeed, we have yet seen all that is in its possible development.

MR. CHURTON COLLINS's edition of the Early Poems of Alfred Lord Tennyson, to which we shall return again, is one of the most instructive volumes that a young poet, or any young writer, can place on his shelves. It shows in foot-notes all the alterations of phrase and melody which Tennyson introduced into these poems in successive editions; and in a scholarly introduction Mr. Collins summarises the literary effect produced by these alterations. The student can thus follow step by step the process by which Tennyson wrought a poem to its final beauty. The improvement effected by very simple alterations is often magical, as Mr. Collins is at pains to show. Take, as an instance, the alteration of the lines in the "Dream of Fair Women":

One drew a sharp knife thro' my tender throat
Slowly,—and nothing more,

into

The bright death quiver'd at the victim's throat;
Touch'd; and I knew no more.

In the same poem:

What nights we had in Egypt! I could hit
His humours while I cross'd him. O the life
I l'd him, and the dalliance and the wit.

is altered to

We drank the Lybian Sun to sleep, and lit
Lamps which outburn'd Canopus. O my life
In Egypt! O the dalliance and the wit,
The flattery and the strife.

In the verses to J. S. two words are altered:

A tear
Dropt on my tablets as I wrote becomes

A tear
Dropt on the letters as I wrote.

Again, in the Lotus Eaters "three thunder-riven thrones of oldest snow" is bettered by the simpler phrase "three silent pinnacles of ancient snow." The text adopted by Mr. Collins in these poems, which number considerably over a hundred, is that of 1857, but he has been permitted by Messrs. Macmillan to record all the variants which are still protected by copyright. It may be doubted whether any English poet has altered his published verses so freely as did Tennyson. The result is that this is a work of much complexity as it is certainly of much value.

IT occasionally happened that Tennyson made an alteration in the interests of truth rather than of style. In all editions of the Lotus Eaters until 1884 he allowed the following to stand:

The lizard, with his shadow on the stone
Rests like a shadow, and the cicala sleeps.

Unfortunately the cicala does not sleep at noonday, but is then at his loudest. At last Tennyson banished him from the poem, and wrote "and the winds are dead." To correct what he believed to be another error in natural history he altered in "The Poet's Song" the line "The swallow stopt as he hunted the bee" to "The swallow stopt as he hunted the fly." A correspondent of the Westminster Gazette has just pointed out that this alteration was needless, as swallows do catch bees, a fact noted by Virgil and Aristotle, and easily observable to-day where there are hives and swallows.

"THE Romance of Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford," as a subject for an historical novel, was suggested in one of our recent competitions. In the following weeks two writers, Mr. Frank Matthew and Miss Dora McChesney, anxiously wrote to inform us that they were already engaged upon novels based on the career of Strafford. A third writer, Miss E. Aceituna Thurlow, now informs us that she, too, is at work on a novel dealing with this subject. At this rate we shall soon have to set up some telepathic theory to account for these synchronising labours.

IN their "Modern Plays" series, Messrs. Duckworth will shortly issue Gerhart Hauptmann's "Das Friedensfest," translated by Mrs. Charrington (Janet Achurch), under the title of The Coming of Peace.

IN Mr. H. Sutherland Edwards's Personal Recollections, to which we make reference elsewhere, there are many literary anecdotes and reminiscences. Mr. Edwards knew Thackeray well, and pronounces him to have been "without affectation or false pride of any kind."

He did not mind speaking of himself; and in answer to my inquiries (after a conversation which had lasted some time) as to whether the success of Vanity Fair had taken him at all by surprise—"Very much so," he replied. "And not myself alone," he added. "When a little time before I had asked for permission to republish some tales from Fraser's Magazine, it was given to me with a smile—almost an ironical one, as much as to say, 'Much good may you get out of them.' They bring me in three hundred a year now. . . ." He told me, moreover, that Turguénieff had called upon him without an introduction, simply in the character of a foreign admirer of his works, and without saying one word about his own literary position.

MR. EDWARDS has an interesting chapter on Edward Tinsley, the publisher, and the writers he gathered round him. Tinsley was the son of a Hertfordshire game-keeper, and "in unguarded moments would inform his friends that he came up to London in a billy-cock hat, on the top of a hay-cart. . . . Sometimes, on reviewing the incidents of a previous night, he would say: 'Did I talk about coming up to London in a billy-cock hat, on the top of a hay-cart?' 'No, you didn't.' 'Then I couldn't have been very far gone." The causes of Tinsley's success were his honesty, his liberality to authors, and his curiously attractive simplicity and self-confidence. He became no mean critic, but his fundamental ignorance was such that when Mr. W. S. Gilbert talked of writing a visit to the Hebrides for him, Tinsley said: "When shall you be back?" "In about a month," was Mr. Gilbert's reply. "A month! Why, it will take you three months to get there! The Hebrides are on the other side of the world." He was thinking of the Antipodes. Tinsley's business was founded on his purchase from Miss Braddon of her novel Lady Audley's Secret. Mr. Edwards's account of that transaction is amusing:

"Taking a truly audacious flight, he proposed to purchase from Miss Braddon her next new novel, and, being without cash at the time, offered her a thousand pounds for it.

In those days a thousand pounds was a pretty good price for a novel, even for a novel by Miss Braddon, who had just made her first great hit with Aurora Floyd. As the offer was made in business-like form, Miss Braddon's husband, the late Mr. Maxwell, wrote to accept it. An agreement would, of course, have to be signed, and the money was to be paid in advance. Nothing could be simpler from the vendor's point of view. . . . He now called upon Messrs. Spalding & Hodge, of Drury-lane, saying that he had made a very advantageous contract with Miss Braddon for her next novel, and that he wanted to know on what terms they would supply the paper.

They were quite ready to give credit; and Tinsley then went to a large firm of printers, saying that Spalding & Hodge would furnish the paper, and that he should be glad if they would undertake the printing. This they were prepared to do on easy terms. A novel of Miss Braddon's would be sure to sell; and if Mr. Tinsley had bought the copyright of her next book, and had arranged with Spalding & Hodge about the supply of paper, they could, of course, give credit for the printing.

Then it occurred to the ingenious young Tinsley that he had not bought anything at all from Miss Braddon: he had only promised to do so. He confided his difficulty to Messrs. Spalding, who, unwilling that good business should be spoiled for want of a thousand pounds, gave him a cheque for that amount.

MR. EDWARDS was much in Paris in the 'fifties, and he was intimate with Gavarni, the caricaturist, who was intimate with Balzac.

"How is Balzac in ordinary conversation?" I once asked Gavarni. "Il est bête," was the reply.

"But what do you mean by 'bête'?" I inquired.

"What everyone else means. He had no wit, except pen in hand, and he found it very difficult to get to work. He would cover a sheet of paper with words, and phrases, and sentences, without any particular meaning, just as you have sometimes seen me cover a wood-block with initial letters and fantastic designs of all kinds. Then, when he had once got under weigh, he would go on working for hours without stopping, beginning perhaps in the evening, and working throughout the night."

MR. HENLEY's causerie in the June Pall Mall Magazine is "Concerning Atkins. Incidentally, Mr. Henley recalls Mr. Kipling's early connexion with the National Observer, and we have this interesting passage:

It was my privilege, as the editor of a journal still remembered fondly by the chosen few who wrote for it, still regretfully recalled by the chosen fewer who read it—it was my privilege, I say, to print, from week to week, those excellent numbers of which a faint and feeble echo is heard in what is probably the most popular song of any age—"The Absent-Minded Beggar," to wit. I do not think they did the journal any good—these songs of the barrack and the march: fresh, vigorous, vécues, surpassingly suggestive as they were, I do not think they did the journal any good—in fact, I know they did it none at all. But they were presently collected (together with "Cleared" and "Tomlinson" and "The Flag of England," to name no more, all from the same print) into a book; and that book has been for years perhaps the most popular array of verses in the English tongue.

A NEW American magazine, called the Magazine of Poetry (Daniel Mallett), is a typical booklet of its kind. We confess we find it a too miscellaneous and facile selection. It consists of poems old and new—poems by Milton and Ida Whipple Benham, Herrick and Eaton S. Barrett, Waller and Abbie Farwell Brown, Cowper and Ethel Lynn Beers, Byron and Dwight Anderson. The subscription is a dollar a year, and the poems are chosen and cut to fit two or three to a page. Certainly, it is pleasant to have poetry brought before one in the very stress of life; and that, we take it, is the mission of the Magazine of Poetry. Poetry for the breakfast-plate, the luncheon-hour, and the odd moment is what it provides. Hence it is, perhaps, unfair to find anything incongruous in its advertisements of the Breeze-Net Underwear, and the Flexible Pot and Kettle Scraper.

CLAUDIUS CLEAR of the British Weekly has been deploring the decadence of the Quarterly and Edinburgh Reviews, declaring that instead of attracting good writers they "seem to take what they can get." The charge would have been more difficult to reply to if Claudius Clear had not, with his usual courage, ventured into judgments in matters of detail. He suggested that these reviews had published no papers that have excited a "real sensation" since Deutsch's article on the Talmud in 1867. This was magnificent, but Mr. Murray, who replies in the British Weekly on behalf of the Quarterly, seems to have the best of the argument in the following remarks:

"Exciting a real sensation" is a vague term. We neither expect nor wish that the Quarterly should excite sensation among the readers of cheap magazines and scrapet literature, but that it has produced a sensation among educated readers on many occasions during the past thirty years is a simple fact "which nobody can deny." Possibly Mr. Clear has never heard of the articles on "Our National Defences," on "The State of English Architecture," on "Disintegration," on "Bolingbroke," on "Keats," on "Virgil," on "The Roman Catholics in England," or of Dean Burgon's articles on the Revised Version, or of Sir Henry Maine's on "Popular Government," or of Mr. Gladstone's article on "Macaulay," to name only a very few. He tells us of his wonderful discernment in detecting Mr. Froude's work in the Westminster, and of his admiration for Deutsch's famous article on the Talmud; and yet both these writers contributed other articles to the Quarterly Review during the period under condemnation, but have failed to satisfy your critic.

Our own belief is that the Edinburgh and Quarterly papers are as good as they were in 1867, but that, like buildings which have been "built round," these Reviews have ceased to excite awe. Their stature is as great as ever, but they have no longer the advantage of isolation.

So the newspaper proprietor has turned, and has declared war against the paper-maker. If the mantle of the author of The Market-Place has fallen upon any living novelist, he should find material in the news "of the greatest possible interest for all engaged in journalism," given by "A Man of Kent," in the British Weekly. It is to the effect that "one of the most powerful, determined, and enterprising newspaper firms in London has acquired a very large property in Spain for the cultivation of Esparto grass, and they expect not only to satisfy their own huge demand for paper to supply immediate needs, but to do a great deal more. We shall soon have further news of this startling development, as important in its way as any that has been announced of late."

Bibliographical.

THE issue of the Early Poems of Tennyson, with elaborate notes by Mr. Churton Collins, shows us that the unhappy poet is now well in the hands of the annotators. A classic already, he must needs suffer for the distinction. His work has, for some years past, been dished up "for the use of schools." There was a "school edition" of the Poems so long ago as 1884. In 1888 came a volume of "Selections, with Notes." That was the beginning of the annotating business. Since then we have had reprints of Aylmer's Field, "with Notes" (1891); The Coming and Passing of Arthur, "with Notes" (1891); Tennyson for the Young, "with Notes" (1891); Geraint and Enid, "with Notes" (1892); Gareth and Lynette, "with Notes" (1892); The Princess, "with Notes" (1892); The Holy Grail, "with Notes" (1893); Morte d'Arthur, "with Notes" (1894); Guinevere, "with Notes" (1895); Lancelot and Elaine, "with Notes" (1895); and again The Princess, "with Notes" (1899). Many more, no doubt, will follow, till school-children become as well and as unwillingly acquainted with Tennyson as they are with Virgil and Horace.

There is, by the way, one point of Tennysonian bibliography on which I must correct Mr. Collins. He reprints, in an appendix, such of Tennyson's poems, published in 1830 and 1833, as were either temporarily or finally suppressed. Those which (he says) were suppressed altogether he prints in small type. Among these small-type pieces I note (p. 295) the "National Song" beginning:

There is no land like England,
Where'er the light of day be.

But this song cannot truthfully be described as "suppressed." It consists of two stanzas, with a double "chorus"; and those stanzas were incorporated by the poet in the second act of "The Foresters," each with a new chorus. Arthur Sullivan set the lines to music, and to very stirring music withal, which mine ears did hear when "The Foresters" was produced at Daly's Theatre. The poet's new choruses answer their purpose excellently, but the old are worth remembering for their patriotic fervour:

Our glory is our freedom,
We lord it o'er the sea,
We are the sons of freedom,
We are free.

Dr. Garnett, in his memoir of Miss Mathilde Blind—just issued by way of preface to her Collected Poems—tells us that the lady was a keen admirer of the work of Elizabeth Barrett Browning. Of that fact there is proof positive in one of Miss Blind's lyrics—the one entitled "Rest" (pp. 427-8). This lyric begins:

We are so tired, my heart and I,
Of all things here beneath the sky,

and ends:

But we are tired. At Life's crude hands
We ask no gift she understands,
But kneel to him she hates to crave
The absolution of the grave.

This, obviously, is an echo, in part, of Mrs. Browning's poem, "My Heart and I," which opens thus:

Enough! we're tired, my heart and I.
We sit beside the headstone thus,
And wish that name was carved for us.

Mrs. Browning, however, closes more cheerfully than Miss Blind does. She says:

And if, before the days grew rough,
We once were loved, used—well enough,
I think, we've fared, my heart and I.

Some weeks ago I had a note about the publications by living writers of the name of Haggard. The first to make that name well known and popular was, of course, Mr. Rider Haggard. Later on it became obvious that there were other Haggards in the literary field—a fact complicated by the adoption by one of them of the nom de guerre of "Arthur Amyand." A letter received by my editor from Bloemfontein (dated April 28) puts the matter in a pleasantly clear light. The letter is from one of the Haggards in question—Captain E. Arthur Haggard—now on active service in South Africa. Herein we find particulars which will enable the public to differentiate Captain Arthur Haggard from Lieut.-Col. Andrew Haggard, who is also a penman. Captain Arthur Haggard's publications, so far, are four in number: Only a Drummer Boy (1894), With Rank and File; or, Sidelights on Soldier Life (1895), Comrades in Arms (1895), and The Kiss of Isis (1900). The first two of these were issued under the pseudonym of "Arthur Amyand." So was the first edition of Comrades in Arms; but when that work appeared in a second edition, the author's real name, as well as his pseudonym, was given on the title-page, and this latter arrangement has also been adopted in the case of The Kiss of Isis.

Lieut.-Col. Andrew Haggard is responsible for the story called "Dodo and I," issued in 1889, and also, I believe, for books entitled Ada Triscott, Leslie's Fate, Tempest Torn, Under Crescent and Star, and Hannibal's Daughter. Now, I think, the matter, as between "Arthur" and "Andrew," may be said to have been made intelligible.

It has been stated that the memoir of Queen Victoria which Messrs. Cassell are now issuing was the last piece of literary work done by the late Mrs. Oliphant. I think that if careful inquiry were made it would be found that the final effort of Mrs. Oliphant's pen was the appreciation of "The Sisters Brontë" which she contributed to the volume called Women Novelists of Queen Victoria's Reign, published by Messrs. Hurst & Blackett in the summer of 1897. That essay, though bearing marks of haste in composition, is one of the most vigorous things produced by Mrs. Oliphant, and ought to be in the possession of every enthusiast about the Brontës. Why do not the publishers issue it as a separate publication, as they did in the case of Mrs. Parr's essay on Mrs. Craik? It was, and is, by far the best section of a very interesting book.

I cannot "enthuse" over the fact that Mr. Charles Firth has written a monograph on Oliver Cromwell for the "Heroes of the Nations" series. I think there are already by far too many books about Cromwell. There is no occasion to go back so far as Carlyle's famous work. Take only the two last decades. In the course of that period we have had biographies of Cromwell by J. A. Picton and F. W. Cornish (1881), E. Paxton Hood (1882), Frederic Harrison (1888), Arthur Paterson (1899), C. H. Polle (1899), Sir R. Tangye (1899), and S. R. Gardiner (1899). As if that were not sufficient, we have had Cromwell as Protector (1890), Anecdotes of Cromwell (1891), an account of Cromwell in Ireland (1896), Cromwell's Place in History (1897), The House of Cromwell (1897), The Religion of Cromwell (1897), Cromwell's Scotch Campaigns (1898), and Cromwell as a Soldier (1899). I venture to say that, for the time being, this is enough. Let Cromwell have a rest.

There is an announcement of a memoir of the late Captain Mayne Reid by his widow; but surely this can be nothing, or little, more than a new edition of the memoir of her husband published by that lady just ten years ago. Mrs. Mayne Reid, it would seem, is the author of "a romance of the West" called George Markham. Will Mayne Reid himself ever find a worthy successor? There are many excellent writers for boys, but to me it seems as if none of them altogether takes Mayne Reid's place.

The Celtic Mind.

The Divine Adventure; Iona; By Sundown Shores: Studies in Spiritual History. By Fiona Macleod. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)

THIS latest volume of Miss Fiona Macleod's is a very miscellaneous collection, united only by the common spiritual outlook which is the writer's heritage from her race. It is less fictional in form than her previous books, and more directly personal in its reminiscences of her country's native legends. The opening piece is a somewhat lengthy allegory, of unusual conception, which is followed by a paper of about equal length dealing in very interesting fashion with the legendary associations of Iona. To this succeed a number of short pieces treating of Gaelic superstitions, and the book very appropriately ends with an essay on the Celtic Movement, in which Miss Macleod is so prominent a figure.

We have not in the past been enthusiastic admirers of Miss Fiona Macleod. We have been repelled by what seemed to us the defects of her literary style; the uncouth "word-painting," the overstrained picturesqueness and effects of verbal colour, with which she endeavoured to enhance the natural imaginative power of ancient story; above all, the effort after poetic imagery, just missing the mark of true originality and completion, which is more irritating than total incompleteness. As regards these matters, Miss Macleod appears to us to have made great advance in power. "The Divine Adventure" she will not have to be an allegory, but a "symbolical presentment." There is no need to quarrel about names. It is virtually an allegory, though not of that kind in which the primary and secondary meaning run side by side without intermixture. Here the two are varyingly intertwined, so that the story is not complete in itself without the underlying significance. In spite of the abhorrence which she professes of vagueness, her "symbolical presentment" seems to us to err by vagueness, the result (we are inclined to think, with all respect) of incomplete personal insight. But what immediately concerns us is, that it is told with real beauty of imagination and frequent beauty of expression. And the same throughout the book. Indeed, those pieces in which she adopts the direct note of personal reminiscence and confidence contain some of her best writing. She has gained in taste, the set description and "word-painting" is sparser; now and again is a phrase or word of striking aptness, vivid without being forced, or an image in the true sense poetic. When, for instance, she sees a fairy "like the green stalk of a lily and had hands like daisies," or feels herself in dream "lifted on sudden warm fans of dusk." Other and yet better touches there are, which we cannot at this moment go back upon. To dream of being the wind is almost in itself warrant of poetic temperament, did the writer give no other evidence of it in these pages. Enough that it is no longer possible to doubt we have in Miss Fiona Macleod a writer of true imagination and steadily growing gift of expression—not yet, perhaps, quite mature.

But passing from this matter, it would be an error to overlook the final essay, called simply "Celtic," in which Miss Macleod treats of a question which has much exercised the minds and pens of English writers. What is the Celtic Movement? As one of the principal figures in that movement, she is peculiarly qualified to speak; and to a distinct utterance on the subject from a principal writer concerned in it, we are peculiarly glad to listen. Miss Macleod, perhaps, rather seeks to dissociate herself from some of the ideas put forth by the critics or friends of the movement than directly to elucidate its nature; but in doing so she actually sheds more light on its character than any writer we have read. To disclaim what it is not goes a long way towards stating what it is; nor does Miss Macleod leave us without positive utterance on its aims. It is the wisest counsel that has been put forth by any of the Neo-Celtic writers, and does much to set the Celtic Movement on the only track possible for it, if it is not to follow futile and self-stultifying ends. She is, like most of us, somewhat sick of the title, and of the mistaken notions which have been identified with it. She protests against the idea that it is an attempt to reconstruct the past. For herself, she does not seek to reproduce old Celtic presentments of tragic beauty and tragic fate, but to discover their secret of beauty in the nature and life of the present, by means of imagination, which can still exercise the myth-making faculty on the existence of to-day. She avers (and we sympathise with her) that she is no great believer in "movements" and "renaissances." But so far as the Celtic Movement is a fact, she considers it the expression of "a freshly inspired spiritual and artistic energy," coloured by racial temperament, and drawing its inspiration from "the usufruct of an ancient and beautiful treasure of national tradition." Its aim is, or should be, to pour that treasure into the common treasury of English literature, informed with all the qualities of the Celtic nature, and so enrich by its infusion the common life of the Britannic race. For in the opening of this great fountain of Gaelic legend lies the power and opportunity of the Celtic writers.

Miss Macleod, as will be discerned from the foregoing, protests strongly against any partizan interpretation of the movement; and this protest is further emphasised when she comes to the question naturally arising next: What are the characteristics of the Celtic nature, as exhibited in a Celtic literature? Miss Macleod tells us:

Intimate natural vision; a swift emotion that is sometimes a spiritual ecstasy, but sometimes is also a mere intoxication of the senses; a peculiar sensitiveness to the beauty of what is remote and solitary; a rapt pleasure in what is ancient and in the contemplation of what holds an inevitable melancholy; a visionary passion for beauty which is of the immortal things, beyond the temporal beauty of what is mutable and mortal.

Yet she adds:

Even in these characteristics it does not stand alone, and, perhaps, not pre-eminent. There is a beauty in the Homeric hymns that I do not find in the most beautiful of Celtic chants; none could cull from the gardens of the Gael what in the Greek anthology has been gathered out of time to be everlasting; not even the love and passion of the stories of the Celtic mythology surpass the love and passion of stories of the Hellenic mythology. The romance that of old flowered among the Gaelic hills flowered also in English meads, by Danish shores, amid Teuton woods and plains. I think Catullus sang more exquisitely than Baidé Honeymouth, and that Theocritus loved nature not less than Oisín. . . . That there is in the Celtic peoples an emotionalism peculiar in kind and, perhaps, in intensity, is not to be denied; that a love of nature is characteristic is true, but differing only, if at all, in certain intimacies of approach; that visionariness is relatively so common as to be typical, is obvious. But there is English emotion, English love of nature, English visionariness, as there is Dutch, or French, or German, or Russian, or Hindu. There is no nationality in these things save in the accident of contour and colour.

It is a frank acknowledgment which many a perplexed Englishman will hail. It is in accordance with our own inward protest and perception that we find in English and other literatures what is supposed to be specially Celtic. It is not, then, solely Celtic, but wholly Celtic. Others have it, but the Celts nought else. In Celtic literature it is absolute and unmingled. This may be a merit or it may be a limitation, but it is undoubtedly a distinction, a differentiatious. And we are glad to find it stated by one so competent to speak as Miss Macleod.

Nor will she admit the notion that the new movement is to be a throwing off the yoke of English literary tradition, a kind of separatist movement in literature, a literary '98. "As though a plaster-cast, that is of to-day, were to revolt against the Venus of Milo or the Winged Victory, that is of no day," she exclaims.

There is no law set upon beauty. It has no geography. It is an open land. And if, of those who enter there, per-adventure any comes again, he is welcome for what he brings; nor do we demand if he be dark or fair, Latin or Teuton or Celt. . . . I do not know any Celtic visionary so rapt and absolute as the Londoner William Blake, or the Scandinavian Swedenborg, or the Flemish Ruysbroeck; or any Celtic poet of nature to surpass the Englishman Keats; nor do I think even religious ecstasy is more seen in Ireland than in Italy.

That is the right spirit. And she goes on to say:

When I hear that a new writer is of the Celtic school, I am left in some uncertainty, for I know of many Anglo-Celtic writers, but of no "school," or what present elements would inform a school.

It is exactly our uncertainty. "It is obvious," she concludes, "that if one would write English literature, one must write in English and in the English tradition." That is a true word, said in a needful season. "When I hear that 'only a Celt' could have written this or that passage of emotion or description, I am become impatient of these parrot-cries, for I remember that if all Celtic literature were to disappear the world would not be so impoverished as by the loss of English literature, or French literature, or that of Rome or Greece." So declares Miss Macleod, and she finishes her protest against "pseudo-nationalism" by the statement that "as for literature, there is, for us all, only English literature. All else is provincial or dialectic."

The Celtic Movement, then, according to her view, is a movement in English literature, and its object is to infuse that literature with the qualities of vision, subtle emotion, intimacy with nature, and aspiration towards the spiritual world, which the Celt possesses more singly and tenaciously than other races, though they do not belong to him exclusively. And its peculiar advantage for this purpose lies in its storehouse of Gaelic legend, virgin and unexhausted by the English-speaking world. It will be distinctive in so far as racial temperament naturally and subtly tinges it, not by any deliberate distinctions of form or style. The pronouncement is interesting and, as we have said, timely, if only for what it protests against and condemns, for its extinguishing of false lights. That Miss Macleod's own work conforms to the ideals she has thus set forth no reader of the present book can doubt. She sees the whole world transparent (as it were) by the contained light of the Unseen. How different, even at the present day, are her countrymen from anything possible in an Englishman, a single story in her book is enough to show. It concerns a chandler in an Argyll village, respectably prosaic enough at ordinary times, whom the author personally knew; but at certain prolonged seasons he became féy of the sea; he would steal from his house, strip himself naked, and sit gazing at the sun; or he would rush down to the sea, and stoop and lift handfuls out of the running wave, and throw the water above his head, while he screamed or shouted strange Gaelic words. Once he was seen striding into the sea, batting it with his hands, defying and deriding it, with stifled laughter that gave way to cries and sobs of broken hate and love. He sang songs to it; he threw bracken and branches and stones at it, cursing; then falling on his knees would pray, and lift the water to his lips, and put it on his head. He loved the sea as a man loves a woman.

Once, when he had been away five weeks, he returned, hair and beard were matted, and his face was death-white; but he had already slipped into his habitual clothes, and looked the quiet, respectable man he was. The two who were waiting for him did not speak. "It's a fine night," he said; "it's a fine night, an' no wind. Marget, it's time we had in mair o' thae round cheeses fra Inverary."

From such a race something distinctive should come in literature, could it get itself uttered. Meantime, those who would understand something of it, and the living past which goes to make it what it is, should read this exceedingly interesting and finely written book—the most personal Miss Macleod has given us, and to us in many ways her best.

New Studies in Old Subjects.

Pro Christo et Ecclesia. (Macmillan.)

Cranmer and the Reformation in England. By Arthur D. Innes, M.A. ("The World's Epoch-makers.") (F. & T. Clark.)

Village Sermons in Outline. By the late Fenton John Anthony Hort, D.D. (Macmillan.)

Ephesian Studies. By Handley C. G. Moule, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

The Rise of the New Testament. By David Saville Muzzey, B.D. (Macmillan.)

The Genius of Protestantism. By R. M'Cheyne Edgar, M.A., D.D. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

ONE opens a little unsigned tractate in pale blue, entitled Pro Christo et Ecclesia, without any wild excitement of expectancy; therefore it is with the larger satisfaction that one finds realised the hope he had not dared to entertain—the hope, to wit, of finding within the dainty boards the fruit of sincere and original thought. The anonymous author approaches the Gospel records with a mind admirably balanced between the Christian tradition of nineteen centuries and the freedom characteristic of the twentieth and of an age of unrestrained criticism. He brings to his study a heart of personal devotion and a singular power of concentration, which could hardly fail to shed light upon some unfamiliar facet even of a life which, as far as the scanty record will allow, has been the subject of innumerable and lifelong meditations.

The fruit of his contemplation seems to be a kind of gentle antinomianism tempered by the obligations of humility and love. The bitter denunciation of those excellent persons the Pharisees—what was its motive? Why were all those woes hurled against men "well known to be straining every nerve to attain an ideal of righteousness in which they honestly believed"? Because such striving after perfection involved separatism, which is, so to speak, the obverse of pride; and pride it is which, instead of delighting in personal service, says, "I must be, must do, must have something better than you are, do, have." The habitual wistfulness of divine desire for human love is reflected by glimpses in the soul of the lover or parent, and particularly at the moment of flouting or ingratitude. It is to a like attitude towards all men, for the sake of that which in each is good, that the teaching of the Christ exhorts; in whose life we see "the great value which God sets on bonhomie, the godlikeness of simple good-nature." In fine, of Jesus we read: "It is the clearness of his insight into the all-pervading pride of humanity and the humility of God which is surely the keystone of his character and the highest proof that he comes from above and not from beneath." We commend, by imitation, the discarding of the initial capital with which, by a paltry convention, it is customarily sought to give dignity to the august pronoun.

The turning-point of English ecclesiastical history was, of course, the sixteenth century; and it may be taken as a favourable sign of the character of our own times that the men and women of that epoch are beginning to emerge from the incredible disguises in which the prejudices of historians had enveloped them, to be revealed as the mixed human beings that it was antecedently probable that in fact they were. Mr. Innes's popular book about Cranmer is an evenly balanced estimate of the man's character, set in a temperate record of the process by which the English Reformation was accomplished; a record from which even the reader to whom the subject is already familiar may rise with an added sense of comprehension, and without any irritated suspicion that he has been victimised by a pleader of the cause of any particular school of Anglicanism.

Cranmer succeeded Warham in the chair of St. Augustine—last primate but one of the old succession, first doctor of the new heresy—in 1533. Chance had brought him to the royal favour—the report of his suggestion that “the king's matter” (the question of the divorce) should be referred to the universities, and that upon their decision, without further reference to the Holy See, his majesty should take a final step. This was to reduce the papal authority to the level of a mere expert opinion, and precisely in this elevation of the civil power above the spiritual consisted the originality of Cranmer's position. The man was further fitted to serve the ends for which Fate designed him by a character abnormally susceptible to the suggestions of a stronger will.

With men like More and Fisher [writes Mr. Innes] conscience was too independent. A Wolsey might be too much influenced by personal ambitions. Gardiner had too large a share of the wisdom of the serpent. But Cranmer was not ambitious; he was not astute; and, although he was not likely to go against his conscience, he was of the type of those who take their conscience with them into unexpected situations. The chances were that if Cranmer found the royal conscience and his own in opposition he would think that his own had made a mistake.

Again:

Unhappily his amiability was coupled with an entire lack of self-reliance, which to more virile minds assumes the aspect of a slavish obsequiousness to the ruling powers. Yet the man was no self-seeking hypocrite, no adventurer like Cromwell, no intriguer like half the courtiers of the day. But to all appearance, whenever he was brought into contact with a really masterful personality, such as Henry's or Cromwell's, he lost the power of independent judgment, and found himself impelled to surrender to the dominating force.

His weakness was the weakness of the man “who never trusts his own judgment if it is opposed by that of another in whom he has learned to place implicit reliance”; hence “he was ever alternating between intellectual convictions which he trembled to avow and avowals which went beyond his convictions.” In the hearts of posterity he has but few friends:

To the extreme “Catholic” party, he is the man who betrayed the Church to Erastianism; to the Puritans, he is a Mr. Facing-both-ways; and to those who join neither extreme, he is a guide whose shame they cannot deny. Despite that great rallying of his courage, when he retracted his recantation and faced his doom, steadfast in self-abasement, every deed of his career is coloured by one pitiful failure.

The least of martyrs he may be; let us remember him then rather for his incomparable rendering of the prayers of the liturgy, and confess that English literature owes him a debt that a great indulgence can only partially repay. After all, it must be very painful to be burnt alive.

In the late Dr. Hort's village sermons there is nothing daring; but though perfectly orthodox, and though written merely in outline, they may be studied consecutively with a placid satisfaction, and without their leaving with the reader any sense of incompleteness. Nor by any person familiar with English village life will they be found lacking in a certain charm; for in the simplest words they speak, out of the abundance of a great scholar, simple thoughts to the simple souls of peasantry. The parts of the Prayer Book services, and the doctrine of the sacraments as understood by the Church of England, the Sermon on the Mount, the Resurrection, are subjects of which each furnishes a course. Take as an example of Dr. Hort's manner a passage on that rather difficult subject the indiscriminate use of the Psalter in public worship:

No other book of prayer or praise would bear to be so boldly treated. There would be a constant sense of jarring and unfitness. None will really feel this in the Psalms who try to follow them, who try to suit their own words [moods?] to the words of those who wrote them. The Psalms above all the rest of the Bible are full of that which is the mark of the whole Bible, the mixture of God's part and man's part. . . . Often we cannot separate the two, we cannot say whether man is speaking or God, for, indeed, God's voice is never so entirely Godlike as when it speaks through the deepest experience of a man; and a man is never so much himself as when he loses himself in the thought of God's doings, “standing still to see the salvation of God.” This mingling of God's part and man's part belongs especially to worship. . . . Only Christians, who know how God and man met in the person of their Lord and Saviour, can fully reap the benefit of this character of the Psalms.

Dr. Moule's “Expository Readings” of the Pauline Epistles are continued by this running commentary on the letter to the Ephesians. The extraordinary difficulties of this most characteristic document are well known, and to their solution the Norrisian Professor brings all the resources of scholarship and enthusiasm. It is, perhaps, by an idiosyncrasy that we are disabled from unqualified admiration of the results of his labours in the form here put on. Here, for example, is the second verse of the “Celestial Letter.” It runs, briefly and poignantly, in the Authorised Version thus:

Grace be to you and peace from God, our father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

Dr. Moule expands this into:

Grace to you and peace, free and benignant divine favour, and its fair resultants of reconciliation with the Holy One and inward rest through his presence in the heart, from God our Father and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

One might almost imagine that the actual process had been reversed—that the Apostle had strengthened his final transcript by deleting the words which, in fact, his commentator has inserted. Shall some happy generation be born to see The Ecologist treated thus?

The little volume which its author calls The Rise of the New Testament is written with a good deal of spirit. Therein Mr. Muzzey is minded to give the general reader a comprehensive view of the methods and results of modern—and particularly of German—criticism. In his introduction he claims for it especially that it lays emphasis upon “the mediation of the methods of research rather than upon its bare results.” Emphasis there is, indeed, in plenty; the essay is fiercely rhetorical in its denunciation of all views of Scriptural Inspiration, and of the Church, which are generally accounted orthodox; but of methods of criticism we seem to have learnt from it little enough. Nor, with all respect to Mr. Muzzey, can we bring ourselves to believe that this particular kind of little book is well adapted to wash away that original sin of “native omniscience” which incidentally he denounces. A certain recklessness of heterodoxy which is to be felt throughout is fairly exemplified in the following sentence. Of our inherited theology Mr. Muzzey writes:

It knows Astronomy better than Copernicus, biology better than Darwin, medicine better than Harvey, and philosophy better than Kant.

The sentence is obscure; but interpreting it so that it shall bear upon the matter in hand, we are unable to excuse it of at least three categorical falsehoods. For the theology we have inherited does not deny the heliocentric system, has no opinion as to the origin of species by progressive differentiation, and does not dispute the circulation of the blood. As to its attitude towards the teaching of Kant—well, even Mr. Muzzey himself must make a choice among rival metaphysicians: the fundamental laws of thought forbid us to accept them all.

"The fact that Jesus was present in bodily person at the first Supper must have made it impossible for the disciples to have taken literally his words 'This is My body.'" So easily does Mr. M'Cheyne Edgar dispose of the figments of Rome. On a similar note he writes:

"But lo! by this auricular confession an intruder enters the family Paradise, and insists as confessor upon knowing individual and family secrets, worms his way into what should be forbidden ground, and soon has the household at his mercy.

This is crudity. There does not seem to be any pressing reason why any one should read this book.

A Poet with the Heartache.

Images of Good and Evil. By Arthur Symons. (Heinemann.)

A POET is what he is, and it is idle to complain that he is not something else. But when a poet has the gifts that Mr. Arthur Symons undoubtedly possesses, one cannot but regret that he should cultivate just one poor little field of all the world's pastures. His is a wan and weary muse; his philosophy of life is attenuated and anæmic; he never escapes from himself. He is all cries, and laments, and regrets. The sun never shines upon him, the birds never sing. He is tired of sorrow, he is tired of rapture, and he "would wash the dust of the world in a soft green flood." We have searched his book in vain for one single, healthy emotion. Even the spring is a distress:

Something has died in my heart: is it death or sleep?
I know not, but I have forgotten the meaning of spring.

And yet in his own perverse way Mr. Symons is a poet. His diction is simple and often exquisite; many of his passages have a haunting and melancholy beauty, but it is the beauty of emotion, not of feeling.

He is ever dallying with a maudlin sentiment that, with him, goes by the name of love. It is never absent from his observation of life. When he sees old women "creeping with little satchels down the street," what is the thought that animates his mood? That age comes bringing its own lamp? Oh no!

And all these have been loved,
And not one ruinous body has not moved
The heart of man's desire, nor has not seemed Immortal in the eyes of one who dreamed
The dream that men call love. This is the end
Of much fair flesh; it is for this you tend
Your delicate bodies many careful years,
To be this thing of laughter and of tears,
To be this living judgment of the dead,
An old grey woman with a shaking head.

Here is his song to "Night":

I have loved wind and light,
And the bright sea,
But, holy and most secret Night,
Not as I love and have loved thee.

God, like all highest things,
Hides light in shade,
And in the night His visitings
To sleep and dreams are clearest made.

Love, that knows all things well,
Loves the night best;
Joys whereof daylight dares not tell
Are His, and the diviner rest.
And Life, whom day shows plain
His prison-bars.
Feels the close walls and the hard chain
Fade when the darkness brings the stars.

In writing of Mr. Symons's poetry we cannot dissociate it from his philosophy of life, for the two are so mingled, and he insists on their conjunction. The sensuousness, to say nothing of the falseness, of some of his verse is objectionable. What are we to say of a poet who writes and prints such a passage as this?

I drank your flesh, and when the soul brimmed up
In that sufficing cup,
Thee, slowly, steadfastly, I drank your soul;
Then I possessed you whole.

There is far too much of this kind of thing in the book. The trail of it is over the so-called religious poems. Such a passage as this, from a poem called "Sponsa Dei," invites one to close the book and throw it away:

All night because of Thee, Christ, I have lain awake,
Night after night I have lain awake in my white bed;
The pillow is as seething fire beneath my head,
The sheets as swathing fire, all night, Christ, for Thy sake.
Night after night I have waited for Thee, all night long,
Mystical bridegroom of this flesh that pants to close
The aching arms of love's desire in love's repose
About Thy conscious presence felt: O Lord, how long?

Mr. Symons is an adept in the choice of words, and his thought, such as it is, is never obscure. He attains simplicity without baldness. Many of his descriptions are beautiful. This, for example:

On some nights
Of delicate Springtide, when the hesitant lights
Begin to fade, and glimmer, and grow warm,
And all the softening air is quick with storm,
And the ardours of the young year, entering in,
Flush the grey earth with buds; when trees begin
To feel a trouble mounting from their roots,
And all their green life blossoming into shoots,
They too, in some obscure, unblossoming strife,
Have felt the stirring of the sap of life.

What he lacks is virility, and that wide and sane outlook upon life which should follow and take the place of the lyrical cry which flames and fades with a poet's early youth. He works the emotions of regret and satiety threadbare, and he uses certain phrases and epithets again and again. He gives us "my indifferent swift feet," her "white, secret, wise, indifferent feet," "the thin white feet of many women dancing," "the daughters of Herodias, with their eternal, white, unfaltering feet"; "the sweet, intolerable thing," "the intolerable fruit of love," and, again, "the sweet, intolerable thing."

"Who shall deliver us from too much love?" is his eternal cry. Well, he might for a change try as an antidote what George Borrow found so much to his taste: "Life is sweet, brother. . . . There's day and night, brother, both sweet things; sun, moon, and stars, all sweet things; there's likewise a wind on the heath." In answer to this, Mr. Symons might point to his "Wanderer's Song." But even that song does not bear the stamp of sincerity. When he sings:

The grass calls to my heart, and the foam to my blood, cries up,

we shake the head.

Give me a long white road, and the grey wide path of the sea,

And the wind's will and the bird's will, and the heartache still in me.

That is Mr. Symons all over. He has the heartache before he has packed his bag.

A Gallery of "Characters."

In a Quiet Village. By S. Baring-Gould. (Isbister.)

THE task which Mr. Baring-Gould accomplishes in this little book was well worth attempting: the record of some of the more notable village "characters" whom he has known. Carlyle said once that every parson should write the history of his parish, if only to keep him out of mischief; but if the history of the parish seem too considerable an undertaking, the history of some of its oddities, jotted down from time to time, much as Mr. Baring-Gould has done, might well take its place. For the honest description of any quaint personage is a document, and it is documents that we are needing.

The fact that Mr. Baring-Gould's "quiet village" seems sometimes to be in Wales and sometimes in Devonshire matters very little; it is a circumstance incident to the collecting of odd articles from periodicals, and placing them under one restricted title. The matter of the book is the thing, and that for the most part is good, full flavoured, like all this author's work, if somewhat (also a characteristic of Mr. Baring-Gould's) hastily done. Among the queer men and women whom he tells of is Dan'l Coombe, who for thirty-five years worked secretly on a concordance to the Bible, totally unaware that such a thing existed, and broke his heart with disappointment when the great work was done, and the parson thoughtlessly showed him Cruden's anticipation of it; Haroun the Carpenter, whose thoughts were centred ever in the Arabian Nights, and who translated the life of the village into that of Baghdad; and Henry Frost, a local poet, who bought his wife for half-a-crown. Concerning the sale of wives Mr. Baring-Gould has this reminiscence:

Much later than that [1823] there lived a publican some miles off, whom I knew very well; indeed, he was the namesake of a first cousin to a carpenter in my constant employ. He bought his wife for a stone two-gallon jar of Plymouth gin, if I was informed aright. She had belonged to a stonecutter, but, as he was dissatisfied with her, he put up a written notice in several public places to this effect:

NOTICE.

This here be to binform the publick as how G — C — be dispozed to sell his wife by Auction. Her be a dacent, clanelly woman, and be of age twenty-five ears. The sale be to take place in the — Inn, Thursday next, at seven o'clock.

In onumerating cases of the sale of wives Mr. Baring-Gould might have mentioned Mr. Hardy's novel, The Mayor of Casterbridge.

One of the pleasantest of the chapters is that describing George Spurlie, an old post-boy. George kept a list of all the folk that he had driven, and this was the conclusion thereof:

Adventurers, photographers, explorers of Mont Blanck [sic] and Africa. Commercial [sic], astronomers and philosophers and popular auctioneers, Canadian rifles, American merchants, racehorses in vans with gold caps. Mackerel [sic] fish and several deans and bankers. Paupers to onions [sic]. Some idgots and Sir H. Seale Hayne Bart.

This was the end of poor George:

He fell ill very suddenly and died almost before anyone in the town—where he was well-known—suspected that he was in danger.

But he had no doubt in his own mind that his sickness would end fatally, and he asked to see the landlady of the inn.

"Beg pardon, ma'am!" he said from his bed, touching his forelock, "very sorry I han't shaved for two days and you should see me thus. But please, ma'am, if it's no offence, be you wantin' that there yellow jacket any more? It seems to me post-boys is gone out altogether."

"No, George, I certainly do not want it."

"Nor these?—you'll understand me, ma'am, if I don't mention 'em."

"No, George; what can you require them for?"

"Nor that there old white beaver? I did my best, but it is a bit rubbed."

"I certainly do not need it."

"Thank y', ma'am, then I make so bold might I be buried in 'em as the last of the old post-boys?"

Mr. Baring-Gould's book is full of quiet entertainment. We recommend it cordially to the desultory reader, and we should like to know that the example which it sets to local historians was yielding fruit.

Feminine Humour.

The Diary of a Dreamer. By Alice Dew Smith. (Unwin.)

MRS. DEW SMITH writes exactly as some of the characters in Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler's novels would write. Her book has passage upon passage like this:

We had no difficulty, however, in finding an empty house. Numbers of people have houses they do not want, and which they are willing to let other people live in for a consideration. The one we found was a sleepy old affair, full of dust and cobwebs, sitting in the middle of a garden that had grown into a wilderness all round it. It had been empty for three years, and had apparently got tired of waiting for some one to come and live in it, for it had gone sound asleep, and we had to shake it and bang it before we could get in.

And, again:

From the day it entered my room I positively adored that kettle. Whether it cast a spell over me, or whether it arose from a disordered state of my imagination, I do not know. But nobody I have ever come across, either in or out of a sick room, could shed such a feeling of warm cosiness and comfort as that diminutive kettle when it set cooing on the hob. I lay and watched it all day long. I counted the hours till I could ask nurse to fill it with water and set it to boil. I listened with suspended breath for its first little purr. If it was allowed to boil over without being lifted off at once I felt nearly frantic. I was in a fever of impatience as soon as the tea was made till it had been sent off to the kitchen to be cleaned, fearing that the black might sink it if it was left too long; in an agony of suspense till it came back again, and perfectly miserable if it stayed away five minutes longer than usual.

In this book may, in fact, be studied, in its most complete expression, the domestic humour of the cultured English-woman whose mind runs to facetiousness. Everything is here: the sweeping generalisations, the exaggerations, the elaborations of the obvious. Women who are funny are nearly always funny in the same way, and that way is crystallised in Mrs. Dew Smith's pages. The trick is patent. "Take a common object [the recipe might run] and say everything that occurs to you about it as smartly and jumpily as possible before you release it again." Here is another scrap to the point:

You tumble a pile of furniture into a room and leave it there while you go and see to something else, hoping that if you leave it alone for a little it will dispose of itself in some way—get into the corners at least, instead of blocking up the doorway. You go back and look at it, anticipating that such an adjustment has taken place. You find it blocking up the doorway in precisely the same clumsy pile as when you left it, with precisely the same blockhead expression of stupidity. You go away and give it another chance. You look in again, and there it sits. Then you give it an impatient push, when it falls heavily on to your toe, and sits there—too loudly imbecile to move off—till your screams call the household to your aid. That anything possessed of four legs, or, at the least, feet, should be so devoid of intelligence makes one positively gasp.

All funny women, as we have said, adopt this formula. Witty women, of course, are more individual; but this is not a witty book. It is a bright, garrulous commentary on every-day affairs, the work of a lively fancy and a very ready pen.

Strength and Obscurity.

The Sunken Bell: a Fairy Play in Five Acts. By Gerhart Hauptmann. Freely Rendered into English Verse by Charles Henry Meltzer. (Heinemann. 4s. net.)

IN England Gerhart Hauptmann is a name only; but he has visited America—Hannele was produced in New York after an altercation of the first virulence—and thereupon a cult was established. This slim and pretty volume is a fruit of that cult; it has all the look of an exotic tenderly fostered by enthusiasms, and not meant to endure the withering glance of a vulgar eye. Hauptmann may be, undoubtedly is, a distinguished playwright, but we doubt if he possesses the essential greatness which is claimed for him. He is not wholly fortunate in the ecstatic esteem of Mr. Meltzer, for this admirer lacks precisely what a serviceable admirer should not lack—critical balance and critical tact. Mr. Meltzer has not even the literary sense. In his "foreword" he belauds the play in phrases which would render any praise valueless. "The drama," he says, referring to The Sunken Bell, "has, aptly enough, been likened to a symphony. Who would dare say that he has fathomed the whole meaning of the grand 'Choral'? Or even of less certain master works?" Mr. Meltzer has obviously taken immense pains with the translation, but—he is capable of rhyming "Madonna" with "honour"! Though occasionally he arrives at a certain mild beauty, his work, on the whole, is not even felicitous; it is mediocre, the effort of an industrious and amiable amateur. We regret to have to utter these strictures upon Mr. Meltzer's labour of love, for we are convinced that he was animated by the best impulses; but the inefficiency of a self-constituted champion can only prejudice the cause of the championed, and no good object can be served in disguising the fact.

The Sunken Bell is a remarkable and beautiful play—often vague, often shadowy, sometimes fumbled, but the production of an original and strong imagination. Amid the rout of elves, dwarfs, trolls, wood-sprites, and "elemental spirits," the figure of Heinrich, the bell-founder, is firmly placed as only a poet could have placed it. Rautendelein, the "elfin-creature," who is at once the salvation and the ruin of Heinrich, is a lovely and exquisite creation, free, wayward, joyously tender, and, at the end, poignantly pathetic. Her final descent into the well, the prey of the Water-Man, is one of the fine, sad moments of the piece. In the matter of symbolic incident the play seems weak, unsure. It has the fatal defect of meaning either too much or too little. The parable floats before us elusive as a will-o'-the-wisp. The downward crash of the bell into the mere, the injury of Heinrich and his rejuvenation, the tolling of the sunken bell by the dead hand of Heinrich's earthly wife—of what secret import are these happenings? And the last failure of Heinrich—wherein is the moral of it? What does this passage mean?

HEINRICH.

Ah, woman, list! . . . I know not how it came
That I did spurn and kill my clear bright life:
And, being a master, did my task forsake,
Like a mere 'prentice, quaking at the sound
Of my own handiwork, the bell which I
Had blessed with speech. And yet 'tis true! Its voice
Rang out so loud from its great iron throat,
Waking the echoes of the topmost peaks,
That, as the threatening peal did rise and swell,
It shook my soul! Yet I was master still!
Ere it had shattered me who moulded it,
With this same hand, that gave it form and life,
I should have crushed and ground it into atoms.

WITTIKIN.

What's past is past: what's done is done, for aye
Thou'lt never win up to thy heights, I trow.
This much I'll grant: thou wast a sturdy shoot,
And mighty—yet too weak. Though thou wast called.
Thou'rt not been chosen! . . .

It appears to us that Heinrich is made to fail solely because he did not put off humanity entirely, and consent to become a monomaniac of his craft. At the conclusion of Act IV., where his earthly children bring him an urn containing their mother's tears, and simultaneously the corpse-tolled bell sounds up from the lake, the alternative is placed before him in a short scene of extraordinary dramatic intensity and impressiveness; but this scene seriously vitiates the succeeding act.

Continually suggestive, and full of half-stated problems, The Sunken Bell might be discussed and glossed ad infinitum—with no really useful result. It must be accepted for what it is—a rather fanciful fairy-drama by a writer whose imagination and technique have matured earlier than his theory of life, morals, and art. We are told that in youth Hauptmann wandered across Europe with a copy of Childe Harold in his pocket. The Sunken Bell is the production of a temperament given to wandering. Probably it was written "in two moods." At any rate, we doubt if even the author could reconcile it with itself.

CHARTERHOUSE.

By A. H. TOD, M.A.

Boys are most interesting creatures, if we do not tell them so and thereby make them self-conscious. Contemporary public schoolboys are perhaps less interesting collectively than private schoolboys, because they have so much history at their back, and so precocious an instinct for journalism. On the other hand, their schools afford perpetual delight to the antiquary. Charterhouse, the subject of this well-illustrated and readable "handbook," by one of its assistant masters, was opened near Smithfield in July, 1614, in accordance with the bequest of Thomas Sutton. In 1872 the school entered into its present home at Godalming, bearing with it enough traditions to impart an air of venerableness to a new structure. The head monitor of Saunderites sleeps upon Thackeray's death-bed, and it is thought that cake is called "hee" from a wilful misunderstanding of the lines in that old Carthusian's "Little Billee":

There's Bill, as is young and tender,
We're old and tough; so let's eat HE.

Among early Carthusians the name of Richard Crashaw stands out; he was a pupil of Robert Brooke, who "was ejected for flogging boys who did not share his political views." Major-General Baden-Powell, who kept goal in 1875-6, took a very liberal view of a goal-keeper's functions. His voice enabled him to direct the forwards at the other end of the ground, and his agility enabled him to cheer the spectators with impromptu dances when he had nothing pressing to do.

For a nervous boy Charterhouse should be an ideal school. "Fights have almost ceased . . . and are punished if detected." Pelting with lemon-peel on Shrove Tuesday has been stopped, so has "pulling out," a custom by which a younger son of the Earl of Suffolk lost his life in 1824. The draconic encouragement of gentlemanly behaviour may have developed a singular sensitiveness in the Carthusian who, in 1894, fell with many others from a "wooden structure," where the school was posed for a photograph. This boy "ran home and declared that he was the only survivor." As a matter of fact, a broken arm was the worst injury received by anyone in this promiscuous tumble. HOW TO DEAL WITH YOUR BANKER.

By HENRY WARREN.

Few are they who completely master the technique of banking, and we know a nice old lady who is in the habit of getting the rent-collector to make out the cheque wherewith she pays him. Mr. Warren's manual contains all the information required by our friend, and much more besides, of which business men are often ignorant. Judging, however, from the evidence of this book, one might be chary of dealing with a banker at all. If you are a business man, he "will try his hardest to obtain a commission on the turn-over"; if you have a "deposit account," he will evade the payment of justly-incurred interest; if you are rich, he will make you pay commission twice over by charging it on a "balance brought forward"; if you die, he will be too overcome to acquaint your executors of any balance unknown to them lying to your credit. You have perhaps thought of the banks as providing an occupation for the sons of gentlemen. Not at all: they treat their clerks "with the greatest brutality"; and "those who are appointed to the counter have generally had most of the pluck knocked out of them, and really have not the courage, even when they are driven, to make a dash with their cash." For a specimen of the anecdotal matter of the book let the following suffice:

A somewhat impudent fraud was perpetrated upon a Manchester bank by one of its customers, who opened an account with some few hundreds of pounds. The gentleman, after a few weeks, drew two cheques, each within a pound or so of his balance, and, selecting a busy day, presented himself at one end of the counter, while an accomplice, when he saw that his friend's cheque had been cashed, immediately presented his own to a cashier at the other end. Both cashiers referred the cheques to the ledger-clerk, who . . . thinking the same cashier had asked him twice, said "right" to both cheques. . . . The thieves were never caught.

The book has two faults. The "index" is merely a table of contents, and the animus of an ex-employé is perceptible in several passages. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.)

WIDE WORLD ADVENTURE.

The notorious Fat Boy of Pickwick would have delighted in this book, which contains twelve "representative narratives from the pages of the Wide World Magazine." The narrative of a servant of the Chartered Company, who was mauled by a lion in 1897, supplies the subject for the picture on the cover. In truth, it was a fearful experience. Ernest Brockman was awakened by a sniff one night, and straightway "huddled all the pillows and bed-clothes up over [his] head and face": "No sooner," he says, "had I done this than the lion, with a horrible purr, purr, grabbed me by the right shoulder and dragged me out on to the floor, bed-clothes and all. The brute immediately commenced to suck the blood that streamed down my neck and chest, and every time I moved he bit the more savagely." Suspense in Mr. Brockman's, as in other cases, proved an anæsthetic, and so, although he could "distinctly feel each bite," he "was conscious of a strange numbness" in the part attacked.

A striking example of the power of the instinct of self-preservation is the case of Prof. Schmidt, who, finding himself inextricably caught in a Bosnian bear-trap, cut down with his clasp-knife the beech tree to which it was attached, and walked off with the trap on his leg.

Heroism is represented by Dr. Franz Hermann Mueller, who headed the Austrian "plague expedition" to Bombay about two years ago. He took the malady after an exhausting bout of nursing:

Up to the very last all his thoughts were devoted to the task of advancing the interests of science. Every quarter of an hour he analysed his condition, and wrote down the observations he had made on his own body. . . . As long as he could he took his temperature, counted his respirations and his pulse-beats, drew the fever curves. . . .

Women are among the contributors to the volume. One of them went to Klondike; another fell down a chimney. In fine, it is clear that truth, as a story-teller, has nothing to fear by comparison with M. Louis de Rougemont. (Newnes. 2s. 6d.)

Fiction.

The Bath Comedy. By Agnes and Egerton Castle.
(Macmillan. 6s.)

JASPER in books is usually a villain; it is refreshing to find him for once merely "a fine gentleman" with "a neat leg," a passionate temper, and a jealous disposition. Our collaborators bring him through the wildest storm that ever raged in a tea-cup. He is pledged to "pink every auburn buck in the town," because he has found a letter in his wife's drawing-room enclosing "a crisp auburn curl," and containing these words: "The lock was white before you touched it, but you see you have turned it to fire." So poor frantic Sir Jasper Standish goes so far as to pluck the wig off the head of an elderly colonel and to lay hands on the Lord's anointed. But Sir Jasper is not the only person careering about in the tea-cup. The fair witch whose incantations produce the storm therein has lovers galore, and juggles with them finely.

The Bath of this story is, in truth, a place very different from that of which Mr. Swinburne wrote:

Peace hath here found harbourage mild as very sleep.

But the events recorded by the two Castles are laid in the second part of the eighteenth century, and Bath has had time to settle down.

Mistress Bellairs is unscrupulous, but delightful. What could be better than her reply to the heroine's feeble inquiry, "Would you have me coquette with my husband?" "La you there, there is the whole murder out! You are the man's lawful, honest wife, and therefore all tedium and homeliness."

Be it said that the brightness and dash of the novel are unfailing. We are not among the realities, but was there ever anybody among them in Bath when the Old Great Pump Room was the capital of the world of fashion?

Becky. By Helen Mathers.
(Pearson. 6s.)

If we were omnipotent we would appoint somebody to prevent Miss Helen Mathers from spoiling her work. It is a pity that he would be too late to rescue "Becky" from the absurdity of the "head." The head in question is not King Charles's, except for the purpose of metaphor, but the baked head of an Indian warrior and the cause of "that ugly bulge [in David's breast-pocket] which always discounted so grievously the joint benefactions of Nature and his tailor." There is murder on account of that head, but nothing lifts it into dignity or importance, or relevance: it is just a bad joke.

In the following passage, strength and weakness lie side by side. David, it should be explained, loves Becky, but is engaged to another woman; this fact does not, however, prevent him from taking Becky to task for her conduct during a dinner party:

"Then you remarked à propos of a pair of lovers near that man was exactly like a tom cat; when courting he was all alive, but when he wasn't courting he sulked, and made himself a nuisance at home, like a cantankerous married man!"

"What a memory you have," said Becky in admiring wonder; "really I had no idea I said so many smart things. I'll buy you a note-book, and you shall be Boswell to my Johnson, and publish it, and we'll divide the swag!"

"There are plenty more," said David, who was striding about the room. "You told Melville that you thought it would be lovely to be born a rich widow!"

"So I do; cut the cackle and come to the horses, you know," murmured Becky sweetly.

David fairly clucked his hands with rage.

"And you call yourself a decent woman," he said, with a sneer that made him positively hideous.

It does not take a detective to see that this conversation is simply a clumsy vehicle for showing off [Becky's "smartness," for no man could lash himself into a temper in such a ridiculous way. It is also obvious that while David is here a mere puppet through which Becky's wit is handed down to us, Becky herself has individuality and animation. There lies the strength of the novel. Becky is alive. It may be added that, though very high-spirited, she is one of the many women who enjoy being beaten by the right man. A fervid Imperialistic note sounds in the book, which is the apotheosis of the pioneer.

"Thank God we have Rhodes," said Billy.

"Rhodes is South Africa and South Africa is Rhodes," said Walter, "and we do thank God for him."

From this fragment of conversation it will be perceived that the book, though unconventional and sometimes grotesque, is not lacking in piety. Moreover, it is readable.

Anima Vilis: a Tale of the Great Siberian Steppe. By Marya Rodziewicz. Translated by S. C. de Soissons. (Jarrold.)

LIKE so much of what comes to us from her countrymen, the work of this Polish lady, new to the English-speaking public, is of a melancholy cast.

Antoni Mrozowiecki is a young man of blameless manners; yet from the cradle, wherein he was defrauded of his patrimony, to the moment when he is presented to us reduced by the hazard of the road to his last halfpence upon his way to the Siberian village of Lebiaza, he is ever the football of malignant destiny. In the house of his host he is still pursued by ill-luck; at every turn he finds himself in a false position, his honesty discredited, his most hopeful enterprises turned to shame and ridicule. His benefactor is driven to doubt his honesty, and presently he is haled to Tobolsk for a murderer. Finally, within twelve hours of his marriage he is overwhelmed, with his Marya, by a blizzard. So that the despondent exclamation of his good friend Andryanek—"Even if we find them they will be frozen. How unfortunate my poor friend is!"—has the effect, by its very inadequacy, of comic relief. Here, however, is the end of his troubles. Marya can predict, "Antoni, it is our last misfortune"; and he liturgically may reply, "Thank God!" For such immunity is attributed by Siberian superstition to him who has cheated the blizzard.

But the strange community—the weird land! Antoni's host is a doctor of medicine who buys and sells oxen and millinery, furnishes dram-shops with liquor, and peddles scythes through the countryside when the black eight-months winter has broken down before a sudden breath out of the Asiatic desert. "Within two days the steppe was black; in five it showed signs of life; in a week it was green."

In the melting of Marya the intelligent reader may easily trace an analogy to this change of the season:

"I never said anything about it to anyone," she said thoughtfully, "but it has always seemed to me that this perpetual martyrdom this longing which must be overcome, has made me wicked. I think that one to whom it is forbidden to love his own country cannot love anything. Such a man or woman does not attain his full growth—he does not blossom, but becomes dried-up stubble. . . ."

"Do you know that there are some days when one is afraid to touch a knife . . . !"

Of the natives, she asks:

"Have you not noticed that they never laugh heartily? They are never merry without vodka! This country stunts the human mind."

Already, when she has become so communicative, the first warm breath has blown upon her soul. Presently she softens altogether, and blossoms like a peach on the sombre brown of the story.

Miss Rodziewicz is a writer of power and intensity of vision. The translator, however, can hardly be said to have done her justice.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE QUEST OF MR. EAST.

BY JOHN STANE.

An original and well-thought-out novel. The spiritual and material adventures of Edward St. John in his quest of Mr. East—a kind of modern hermit—are good reading to those who, like St. John, are in quest of "the principle of unity in history and in modern life" which, if found, would compose all the differences of creeds. An important, if improbable, character is Father Optate, a learned Roman Catholic priest, who before he dies delivers his soul in an astonishing manner. (Constable. 6s.)

A DREAM OF A THRONE.

BY CHARLES FLEMING EMBREE.

The story of a Mexican revolt. Says the hermit to the hero: "Child, to save a lost and fallen race is the noblest calling that a man can have. If that race be your own, and its blood leap in you, and you be fighting the battle of your butchered fathers, and winning that which is by God's right yours, the task is infinitely great. Do you know, child, whose is that task? . . . Boy, that task is yours." The tale is full of action, and is enlivened with patios, jefes, mozos, and sopladors. (Gay & Bird. 6s.)

THE MYSTERY OF MUNCRAIG.

BY ROBERT JAMES MUIR.

The kailyard again, with ministers and whisky and the Psalms of David—and Scottish life generally, by one who knows it. The story opens in Edinburgh in 1861, and the hero is charged with piracy in the South Seas, a circumstance which provides a pretty proposal scene later. "You haven't asked me yet." "No! It has never been my way to ask for things." "Oh!" said Isobel, trying to look in his face, "I suppose you—pirates—just—take—things?" "We do," said Rob. And he took one." (Unwin. 6s.)

THE NORTHERN BELLE.

BY JOHN WERGE.

A "Diamond Jubilee Romance," in which a major brings his daughter to London and talks to her, by the page, like this: "We are now passing the Hotel Cecil, but it is partially obscured by these shops, which, however, are soon to be removed. Down this street is the Savoy Hotel and Theatre, and here is Terry's Theatre. There are some very handsome shops between the places I have named, but they are nearly all closed at this time of night. Now we are at Somerset House, a large building extending to the Embankment, and having a fine river frontage." (Digby, Long & Co. 6s.)

THE QUEEN WASP.

BY JEAN MIDDLEMASS.

A story of society match-making and shady finance, opening on an evening when Grosvenor-place was "instinct with life and aglow with light." "Lady Sabina looked round. 'Harry, dear,' she suggested, 'will you go and tell the bandmaster to begin playing?' He did as he was bidden. Harry Jolliffe always tried to do what his wife wished. He was desperately in love with her—worshipped the very ground she walked on. Alas! it is not always those who love the most who bring to others the greatest meed of happiness." (Digby, Long & Co. 6s.)

BETTINA.

BY MAY CROMMELIN.

Bettina's fate is to be left by her Russian mother at the door of an English merchant at St. Petersburg. Her bringing up in England, and the discovery of her romantic and aristocratic origin, make the story, which is quite readable. (John Long. 6s.)

THE DESPATCH RIDER.

BY ERNEST GLANVILLE.

This story, by the author of The Kloof Bride, gives us the atmosphere of the early days of the Boer war in Natal. The first days of the siege of Ladysmith and the arrival of General Buller are described. (Methuen. 6s.)

The Vogue of "Reminiscences."

THERE is a magic in all remembrance of one age by another. The past within a past—how remote, how vivid it seems! How we warm to Cicero, and feel his antiquity in a flash, when we find him remembering the figures that moved about Rome in his boyhood.

There was old Caius Duilius, Marcus's son, he that gave the first blow to the pride of Carthage by sea. Many a time, when I was a youngster, have I stood to look upon him as he was marching home after supper, with a wax-taper to light him, and a violin playing before him. That was always his humour, and the great reputation of the man easily justified the levity.

How that figure engages itself to live in the mind, and gives the sense of immemorial distance. And why? Because it is recollected by Cicero, not related by Mommsen. It would be easy to collect such passages. One we will quote for its beauty. It seems more than probable that Defoe described his own boyish curiosity, and insatiable love of a story, when he wrote this passage about his boy hero, Captain Jack—a passage which no Englishman can read without a thrill.

In this way of talk, I was always upon the inquiry, asking questions of things done in public, as well as in private; particularly, I loved to talk with seamen and soldiers about the war, and about the great seafights, or battles on shore, that any of them had been in; and, as I never forgot anything they told me, I could soon, that is to say, in a few years, give almost as good an account of the Dutch war, and of the fights at sea, the battles in Flanders, the taking of Maestricht, and the like, as any of those that had been there; and this made those old soldiers and tars love to talk with me too, and to tell me all the stories they could think of, and that not only of the wars then going on, but also of the wars in Oliver's time, the death of King Charles I. and the like.

Nor does the power of reminiscence end soon. While it enlarges and flatters our grasp of life it is all the time making that grasp more sane, more deliberate, less childish tight; it is preparing us to let all go. We see how men were witty, were fed, were in love, were powerful, were eccentric, were envied—but how they, who differed so widely and piquantly in life, were huddled into Charon's boat together. There is a page of Hazlitt that is something to the point. Calling on Northcote one day, he found the painter half regretting that he had just sold a whole-length portrait of an Italian girl, which had become an old friend. The purchaser had said to him: "You may at least depend upon it that it will not be sold again for many generations." The picture was still in the studio, and Northcote showed it to Hazlitt.

On my expressing my admiration of the portrait of the Italian lady, he said she was the mother of Mme. Bellocchi, and was still living; that he had painted it at Rome about the year 1780; that her family was originally Greek; and that he had known her, her daughter, her mother, and grandmother. She and a sister, who was with her, were at that time full of the most charming gaiety and innocence. The old woman used to sit upon the ground without moving or speaking, with her arm over her head, and exactly like a bundle of old clothes. Alas! thought I, what are we but a heap of clay resting upon the earth, and ready to crumble into dust and ashes.

However careless, "genial," and superficially chatty recollections may be, they are, at least, a personal record of the world when it was preparing itself for your own distinguished advent; and out of that adjacent past, and out of the crowd of men so nearly your contemporaries, who might have been your uncles, there issues many a sharp analogy, many a conversation one would like to have carried further, many a stray shot at the conscience which the reader must ward off as he can.

To-day the flow of reminiscences is a torrent without precedent, but not without proportion or explanation. For there was never an age in which writing was so fashionable or recollection so rich. An old man who has never dreamed to distinguish himself as an author through all the years of his strength, may do so if he will only sit down and dictate to the phonograph what he remembers of the tinder-box. Is it strange that many do it?

So wonderfully has the social life of England changed in the Queen's reign that the personal identity of the nation has almost wanted proof; and this proof the reminiscence writers have furnished. It may be found, in infinite witness-box variety, in the published recollections of Mr. Justin McCarthy, Henry Vizetelly, Sir Algernon West, Sir Edward Russell, Dr. B. W. Richardson, the Right Hon. Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff, Mr. W. J. Linton, Fanny Kemble, Mrs. Anne Thackeray Ritchie, Sir Harry Keppel, Mr. A. J. C. Hare, Stacey Marks, Dr. Newman Hall, Frederick Locker, Mr. Joseph Arch, Miss Betham-Edwards, Mr. G. W. E. Russell, Sir Charles Gavan Duffy, Admiral Sir John C. Dalrymple Hay, Mr. James Payn, Mr. T. A. Trollope, Mrs. M. C. M. Simpson, Prof. Max Müller, Walter White, Mrs. Oliphant, Mr. Baring-Gould. If this list, written down from memory, seems wearisome, consider its utter incompleteness! We will add to it only the name of Mr. Sutherland Edwards, who has just published his Personal Recollections through Messrs. Cassell. His anecdotalage, which is gay and tragic, and wholly readable, begins at a time when Fleet-street was paved with cobbles, and when no omnibus charged less than sixpence to carry a Londoner the length of the Strand.

Those who had business to transact in the City went there in cabs; but there was little communication between the two extremities. . . . Ladies did not use these cabs. They were out of everything. No lady was admitted into a restaurant, nor into the coffee-room of an hotel, nor into an hotel at all if travelling by herself. Ladies who, in the middle of the day, were kept from home by the pleasures and pains of shopping, went for lunch to pastrycooks' shops, where they got indigestion by eating raspberry tarts. . . . In families where no carriage was kept ladies going out for the evening had to take what was called a "glass coach." . . . A lady living alone in apartments could not in those days receive a visit from a gentleman; still less could a gentleman living alone receive a lady in his rooms. . . . It was scarcely fashionable to go to the play, and few persons went there in evening dress. The theatrical saloon, whose abominations were put an end to by Macready, was a disgusting place. . . . Very little money was spent on stage production. Painted calico did duty for silk and satin, spangles for jewellery; it was held and believed that for stage purposes imitation was better than the real thing.

This is the world which Mr. Edwards peoples with men like the seven Mahews, the three Salas, Macready and Hans von Bülow, Douglas Jerrold and Shirley Brooks, Gavarni and Albert Smith, Edward Tinsley the publisher, and E. S. F. Pigott, the Censor of Plays—Thackeray and Browning, and Rubenstein lending their distinction. The same world has been described very, very often, but apparently people do not tire of hearing of these men and their times. A faint odour of palled punch and stale tobacco is wafted from the pages, and strange tints of old play-bills are flashed on one's vision, and kind things are said of good fellows who went to the wall in the fifties by the methods then in vogue, and skits, and "witty" articles, and "agreeable" satires are quoted, and it is all amazingly ancient-modern. This vein of early and mid-Victorian anecdote will be worked out presently; and then? Will our own day have its small chroniclers? Will men write quaint and much quoted pages about the first cinematograph shown in London, and the Vagabonds' Club, and the late Mr. Aubrey Beardsley, and the supremacy of the novel, and the automatic scent sprinkler, and the motor omnibuses, and the Aerated Bread Company, and the "Souls." And will Mr. Bernard Shaw, and Mr. Andrew Lang, and Mr. John Kensit, and Mr. W. B. Yeats, and Bugler Dunne shine as stars in the anecdotal firmament of 1950? Doubtless. But the present fervour of reminiscence must, we think, pass away. It is natural that the Victorian era and the Nineteenth Century should put their papers in order. It is between those two worlds of Matthew Arnold, the one worn out, the other not ready to be born, that the cataracts of reminiscence have been heard all day long. It will be under similar conditions that the next wave of Reminiscence will arrive.

The Scholars and the Poet: a Parable.

ONCE there were four Scholars who all their lives spent much time and labour and learning in studying the works of a great Poet. And it chanced that they all died on the same night, and came together to the place of departed spirits; and, because they had given much devotion to this task, it was granted them for a boon that they should each make one request of the Poet himself. So they were brought to where he sat; and around him many were gathered, but at a little distance, for they might not draw nearer unless he called them.

And when the first Scholar was bidden approach, he said: "Tell me, I pray you, of your courtesy, concerning those sonnets of yours, whether they were in truth written of a certain lord." But the Poet only answered: "Look, yonder is my lord himself of whom you speak. Go and see whether he will talk with you of the matter."

So the Scholar turned away sorrowful.

And the second asked of a certain work of the Poet's youth, which of its lines were written by himself and which by another. But the Poet smiled and said: "Nay, I cannot now remember. But yonder is a learned Doctor who has studied the matter more nearly than I have. He will reveal it all to you if you ask him."

And the third Scholar said: "Know you not that some of your writings are deemed to be immoral in their essence, and others in their form, and therefore there are some who speak ill of you. Tell me how you would defend yourself against their accusations." And there was no displeasure in the Poet's smile as he answered: "Perchance my words thereon would not satisfy you. But here is a grave Professor who has written a book on this very matter. Inquire of him concerning it."

So this Scholar turned away like the others.

But when the fourth Scholar came, who on earth was accounted to have more love and understanding of the Poet than they all, he sat down at the Poet's feet, and, looking up into his face, said, as the children say, "Tell me a story." And the Poet's eye was kind, and his voice was gentle, as he told the Scholar a new story of love and joyousness and happy laughter. But the others were still held in talk by those to whom the Poet had sent them, and being a little way off they could not listen to the story. So they never heard it.

A Laureate's Satire.

Is Mr. Alfred Austin's satire, The Season, on sale at his publishers'? I should fancy it is not. "A new and revised edition, being the third," came out in 1869 with the imprint of Mr. John Camden Hotten; that edition, I take it, was disposed of long ago, and I have not heard of its being followed by another. The work is not of the kind which appeals to its writer when he has achieved a position of less freedom and more responsibility. Much has happened in Mr. Austin's public life since 1869. In 1862, when The Season first came out, matters were different. Its author was then only twenty-six years old. He had already published two books, but one of them had been anonymous, and neither had made any particular impression.

Practically, when The Season appeared, Mr. Austin made his literary debut. It was the foundation, certainly, of his literary reputation. "Dedicated to Disraeli," says Mr. Escott in a recent volume (Personal Forces of the Period), "it secured the warmest recognition of Mr. Gladstone and his old select literary and scholarly friends." The book was not dedicated in the first instance to Disraeli. The first edition contained no dedication; it is in the second edition, issued very soon after the first, that we find the inscription: "To the Rt. Hon. Benjamin Disraeli, M.P., by one who reveres his genius and exults in his success."

The first edition had been issued by Robert Hardwicke, of Piccadilly; the second bore on the title-page as publisher the name of George Manwaring, of King William-street, Strand. Had Mr. Hardwicke been alarmed by the hubbub which The Season had created? For it did create a hubbub—and no wonder. There had been nothing in the way of rhythmic satire, at once so vivid and so vigorous, since the appearance of The New Timon—an interval of fifteen years. The writer had his literary spurs to win, and did not hesitate to lay about him with a will. He was, or persuaded himself that he was, very much in earnest. In one place he wrote:

I am, I must insist,
A most uncompromising moralist.

And in another:

Who think by verse to better make the bad,
I grant it freely, must be vain or mad. . . .
Yet in an Age when each one deftly hides
The scorn he feels for every one besides,
I claim the precious privilege of youth,
Never to speak except to speak the truth.

He certainly seems to have lashed himself into a state of violent indignation. The slightest thing would set him off. The anger which he could not introduce into the rhymed text overflowed into the prose annotations. Thus, below a couplet on the younger Lytton—

Compete with [Owen] Meredith; discreetly steal
Your plot, your apophthegms, and top "Lucile"—

one found these sentences:

This clever but somewhat spasmodic young man, who is too modest to write under his patronymic, is perhaps too modest likewise to have his own opinions. But if he will not adopt the name to which he has a right, why does he adopt and dress up again for the public, already well acquainted with them, the dicta of his father, to which he has none?

Neither of these passages is to be seen in the third (and latest revised) edition of the Satire, which nevertheless includes all the most pungent portions of the original work. If you possess a copy of that third edition, you have all that is best in The Season as first published. And some of that best is excellent of its kind. A good deal of it, of course, is necessarily somewhat jejune after the lapse of so many years. The scorn poured by Mr. Austin upon designing damsels and match-making mammas, upon the popularity of "La Traviata" and the opera-ballet, and upon the morale of the ball-room generally, strikes one nowadays as trite. It was expressed, however, in a style which deserves to be remembered. Some of the writer's single lines, such as that about "the half-drunk" leaning over "the half-dressed," are assuredly pointed, if a little brutal. Genuinely epigrammatic, too, are such couplets as these:

What is the spell that 'twixt a saint or sinner
The difference makes? a sermon? bah! a dinner.
The odds and ends our silken Claras waste
Would keep our calico Clarissas chaste. . .
A hundred pounds would coy have made the nude,
A thousand pounds the prostitute a prude.

The poor votaries of fashion have never, probably, been so severely lashed as by this satirist in his twenties:

The padded corsage and the well-matched hair,
Judicious jupon spreading out the spare,
Sleeves well designed false plumpness to impart,
Leave vacant still the hollows of the heart.

So with ladies at the opera:

Their rounded, pliant, silent-straying arms
Seem sent to guard, yet manifest their charms.
Mark how the lorgnettes cautiously they raise Lest points, no pose so thoughtless but displays,
A too quick curiosity should hide—
For they who gaze must gaze at be beside.

There was, I fancy, only one person about whom in the first edition of The Season its author had something pleasant to say; and that was Her Majesty the Queen, whose virtues were eloquently celebrated. This, at any rate, is a passage on which Mr. Austin can afford to look back with satisfaction. Elsewhere in the satire he had ironically suggested that contemporary bards should, with other things,

Industriously labour languid lays,
Beloved of Courts, and snatch the Poet's bays!

Only the very ungenerous would nowadays turn these lines against their writer.

The stiff press criticism to which The Season was subjected led Mr. Austin to pen (in the same year) a reply, also in the conventional couplets, called "My Satire and its Censors." In this, again, there is much that is vigorous and vivid, but nothing quite so excellent, in a literary sense, as the best things in The Season. It is all very pointed and pungent, but, of necessity, only for the day. Mr. Austin was himself taken to task in yet another satire, written by Mr. Brook B. Stevens, and entitled "Seasoning for a Seasoner." In this composition Mr. Austin was certainly well peppered, but with no permanent effect. "Seasoning for a Seasoner," like "My Satire and Its Censors," is, I take it, rarely read. The Season, on the other hand, has some claim to be regarded as a minor classic. It may, indeed, outlive much of the verse on which perchance the Laureate more prides himself.

The Charwoman.

SHE is an elderly person and she cleans shoes till you can see your face in them. But her ideas are limited.

We told her that Mafeking had been relieved. She did not understand. We told her that it had been surrounded by the enemy, so that none should leave the village and none enter it. She said it was a shame, but she did not seem to understand.

We then told her that the besieged had been living on horseflesh. Her gaunt face lighted up. "I knew a girl once who ate cat's-meat," she said.

"Soft as Velvet."

SIR,—I observe that, in a review of The Chaucer Canon, in your last number of the ACADEMY, the following statement occurs: "Soft as velvet has, we take it, been a stock description of turf at all times since velvet was invented." My argument is, to some extent, founded on the fact that such a statement is quite unwarranted; and that, as a matter of fact, the expression "soft as velvet" does not occur (outside of the two passages which I compare) in any English poem whatever, anonymous or otherwise, before the year 1500. It may even be doubted whether it occurs elsewhere before 1600. Certainly, it does not occur in Shakespeare, nor in Milton; the former has only "velvet leaves" or "velvet buds," and the latter has "the cowslip's velvet head"; and that is all.

Before 1500, the occurrence of the word velvet is by no means common. It is found, of course, in wills and inventories as far back as 1319, and in glossaries; but in poetry it only occurs twice in Chaucer, a few times in Lydgate, once in Sir Launfal, thrice in "The Flower and the Leaf"; but where else? This is precisely the point at issue. Seeing that "soft as velvet" is "a stock description," may we be favoured with a few quotations, of early date, in support of this assumption?—I am, &c.,

The Supremacy of Fiction.

SIR,—I have read, in a docile spirit, Miss Frances Forbes-Robertson's remarks on my remarks about the predominance of Fiction and "Fictionalists." This pleasing word I borrow from contemporary criticism: perhaps we shall soon read about "jurisdictionalists." I am prepared for anything. My humble essay, "On the Supremacy of the Novel," was prompted by Lytton's preface to Pelham. Seventy years ago Lytton frankly stated that he wrote novels because nothing else paid. Am I wrong in thinking that nothing else is remunerative now? For, of course, books about the war, and reminiscences, and educational books, and legal books are not, usually, "literature." I said, "we produce novels only." Miss Forbes-Robertson then talks about great works of philosophy, history, and poesy, written in my "lifetime." But I myself spoke of these; when I say "we produce," and so on, I allude to the living present. Miss Forbes-Robertson then avers that "there is an immense population that in past generations never read anything." How could it read anything before it was born? unless this lady believes, like the Arunta, in reincarnation. My fair censor goes on thus: "This taste of the crowd neither augments nor diminishes the number of serious readers, unless, indeed, towards reading at all." The meaning of the text entirely escapes me. How can a taste augment or diminish a number, or not do so, "unless towards reading at all"? And how, next, can "the public that reads serious literature" be (as the lady avers) "equally greater in number." Equally greater than what? Miss Forbes-Robertson is certain that the works of Mr. Meredith and Mr. James "tower above the expositions of subjective philosophers, metaphysical meanderings, tirades of criticism, or catalogues of historical events Mr. Lang deploras [sic] as no longer read." I cannot admit that even Mr. Henry James, "in every kind of way," towers above Kant, Hume, Hazlitt, or Gibbon. In how many ways can even Mr. James tower? But these authors—Mr. James, and the philosophers and historians—do not work in the same matter. Even if Mr. James towers above them (which I don't think he does), we need not neglect criticism, history, and philosophy because, in fiction, Mr. James towers. I am supposed to condemn "great novels." This is a misapprehension. I would liefer have written Old Mortality or Esmond than all the works of Locke. I do not "contemn the literature which takes the form of a novel." I only wish that literature did take that form more frequently. I do say, and I keep on saying, that novels are almost, if not altogether, the only form of literature that is remunerative now. But I think, and I said, that a new Froude, Macaulay, or Tennyson would even now find readers. Still, I do not observe that poetry or history has, at present, any such authors as Tennyson, Macaulay, and Froude.

I am sorry to seem to accuse a lady controversialist of an ignoratio elenchi, but by these hard terms the logician is apt to style arguments like hers.—I am, &c.,

A. LANG.

Book Titles.

SIR,—Is there no available register of book titles which authors could consult before deciding how to name their books? Twice in the same day I have come across the duplication of titles. Two years ago Mr. John Lane published a novel of high quality by Mr. E. A. Bennett, called A Man from the North. And now I find "The Man from the North" at the head of a story by Mr. A. Gissing in a ladies' weekly. One of the most readable books on the war, Sidelights on South Africa, by Roy Devereux, came out in the earliest crop of South African works issued since the Boer ultimatum. This week's papers review a work by Lady Sykes called Sidelights on the War in South Africa. Surely something can be done to prevent this.—I am, &c.,

The Missing Word.

SIR,—May I quote from a letter I received from a Welsh correspondent? The following quotation is from Milton's Of Reformation in England: "O Thou that . . . didst build up this Brittanic Empire to a glorious height, with all her daughter islands about her," &c. If Brittanic Empire denotes the Empire, then (by analogy of Teuton and Teutonic Empire) a subject of the Brittanic Empire is a Briton. The Americans recognise this in a way by the term Britisher—a subject of the British Empire. Brittanic for Briton seems far more dignified and quite as accurately descriptive terms. Possibly it may be objected that Briton is open to the same racial interpretation as Englander, but we do not say the English Empire.—I am, &c.,

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

PAUSANIAS, AND OTHER GREEK SKETCHES.

By J. G. FRAZER.

This is the promised abridgment, or rather the quintessence, of Prof. Frazer's great Commentary on Pausanias' Description of Greece, published two years ago. "Slight and fragmentary as these sketches are," says the author, "I am not without hope that they will convey to readers who have never seen Greece something of the eternal charm of its scenery." The places described include Marathon, Mount Hymettus, Phyle, the Port of Athens, the Sacred Way, Megara, Nemea, Delphi, the Lernæan Marsh, and many other spots. (Macmillan. 5s.)

DRIFT.

By HORATIO F. BROWN.

Mr. Horatio Brown has spun many verses in the intervals of writing prose such as his Venetian Studies, John Addington Symonds: a Biography, and Life on the Lagoons. If we are not mistaken, many of these verses, modestly entitled Drift, were first printed in the Pall Mall Gazette. The following stanzas are from one of the lighter pieces, called "Bored: At a London Music":

Two rows of foolish faces bent
In two blurred lines; the compliment
Toe formal smile, the cultured air,
The sense of falseness everywhere,
Her ladyship superbly dressed—
I liked their footman, John, the best.

The tired musicians' ruffled mien,
Their whispered talk behind the screen,
The frigid plaudits, quite confined
By fear of being unrefined.
His lordship's grave and courtly jest—
I liked their footman, John, the best.

(Grant Richards. 5s. net.)

THE STORY OF BADEN-POWELL. By HAROLD BEGBIE.

Obviously a timely book. In "An Introductory Fragment on no Account to be Skipped," Mr. Begbie says:

Ask those who know him best what manner of man he is, and the immediate answer . . . is this: "He's the funniest beggar on earth." And then . . . your informant will suddenly grow serious and tell you what a straight fellow he is, what a loyal friend, what an enthusiastic soldier. But it is ever his fun first.

(Grant Richards.)

Lucretius on Life and Death. By W. H. MALLOCK.

This is the rendering of certain passages in Lucretius into English, and into the metre of The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyám, to which we drew attention when it appeared in the Anglo-Saxon. We then pointed out that Mr. Mallock's idea has been to reduce Lucretius and Omar to a common literary denominator, and so bring out that likeness between the philosophies of the Persian and Roman poets which has been remarked by more critics than one. We quoted the stanza:

Globed from the atoms falling slow or swift
I see the suns, I see the systems lift
Their forms, and even the systems and the suns
Shall go back slowly to the eternal drift.

The poem is very handsomely enshrined in white vellum covers. (Black. 10s. net.)

TCHAIKOVSKY.

By ROSA NEWMARCH.

Six years have elapsed since Tchaikovsky's death, and the authorised Life and Letters is not yet forthcoming. From widely scattered sources Miss Newmarch has gathered the materials for a book which, though inevitably patchy, is likely to meet the English demand for information about the composer of "The Pathetic" Symphony. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

ALL ABOUT DOGS.

By CHARLES HENRY LANE.

Mr. Lane is a well-known breeder and exhibitor of dogs, and into these pages he pours his knowledge of all sorts and conditions of dogs, the humours of the Show Ring, doggy anecdotes, and what not. The book contains four hundred large octavo pages, and is profusely illustrated. (John Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)

In addition to the foregoing, we have received:

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 35 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of one guinea for the best rendering of a portion of a poem by Emil Verhaeren, which we quoted from Iris. The task has, we think, been enjoyed, and we have had some difficulty in awarding this prize. The charm of Verhaeren's lines is associated with a metre which is intended to convey a calm acceptance of a scene utterly dead and dreary, and itself resigned to winds and desolation. A certain weary flow of cadences, making for monotone, is needed to give the effect—a circumstance fully appreciated by most of the competitors. We have decided to award the prize to Mr W. G. Fulford, "Eastman's," Southsea, for the following rendering.

This is the dune-land, ashen-grey,
Deep-scored and scarred by the rough hand
Of desolating Time—a land
Of dead things, mournful in decay.

Grey sea, grey sky, shut in a storm-threshed ring!
And they who endlessly go to and fro,
The winds—the bitter, roaring winds—that wing
The shafts of winter from their bow.

Long since died summer, long since autumn died;
Far hence October's fled, with all its purple pride.
Its gloom, its silence, and its pain;
And now on, on they press,
The hordes of winter, wild and pitiless,
Bringing the darkness once again.

Yonder the village lies and weeps—
Its roofs, that from the storm decline,
Squalid and sad, in crouching heaps
Like huddled kine;
The night droops down, the horizon melts and fades,
The thunder-clouds give tongue, and faint
In answer one far bell from out the creeping shades
Wails softly, like a little child's complaint.

And there, where in confusion lie
The tresses of the land,
With mourning measureless, go by
The long dim lines of ghostly sand;
The shore is desolate, the birds are flown,
On the salt flats a ship heels slowly, sinking down,
As ebbs the sea, so flows the night,
The vacant, black and infinite.

[W. G. F., Southsea.]

Among other answers is the following:

This is the white shore of the Dunes
That Time has wearied with decay,
Bowed peaks, and valleys worn away,
And hills that crumbled one by one,
Wan sky, waste sea, the storms that gird them round!
And those that hither sweep with icy wing,
The howling winds, the winds that whistling sound,
And hurl the winter from their sling.

Summer and autumn long have past away,
And past the misty dim October day,
The day of purple gloom and silence drear;
And now, with stormy stress
The winter, winter wild and merciless,
And its black months, again is here.
And there below the hamlets groan,
And houses tremble in the blast,
Poor, sad, in heaps together thrown
Like cattle on the waste;
The night sweeps down, the sea-line nears,
The cloudy legions black and fell
Howl to the blackness, and a distant bell
Only replies, mingled with childhood tears.

And on the beach that hears their cry,
These endless mourners of the land,
Like furrows dim beneath the sky
Stretch the long strips of sombre sand;
The shore is void, the birds fly past,
The ship has vanished in the dismal vast,
And dreary nothing follows here,
League after league, the dreary sea.

Competition No. 36 (New Series).

In a little book of Sonnets and Other Poems, by John K. Ingram, just issued by Messrs. Black, occurs this quatrain:

Master, amid the turmoil and the strife,
How shall my spirit calm and trustful be?
Thus only, if the fountains of my life
Are hidden in Humanity with thee.

The "Master" referred to is Auguste Comte. We ask our readers to send us similar quatrains in which a personal tribute is paid to a great writer. It is not necessary to hail the selected writer as "Master." His name should form the title, or it may be incorporated in the verse. A cheque for One Guinea will be sent to the competitor whose quatrain strikes us as being the most epigrammatic and impressive.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, May 22. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the third column of p. 456, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

BLACK HEART AND WHITE HEART,

And other Stories.

By H. RIDER HAGGARD.

Of the Three Stories that comprise this Volume, one, "THE WIZARD," a tale of victorious faith, first appeared some years ago as a Christmas Annual.

Another, "ELISSA," is an attempt to recreate the life of the ancient Phœnician Zimbabwe, whose ruins still stand in Rhodesia, and with the addition of the necessary love-story, to suggest circumstances such as might have brought about or accompanied its fall at the hands of the surrounding savage tribes.

The third, "BLACK HEART and WHITE HEART," is a story of the courtship, trials, and final union of a pair of Zulu lovers in the time of King Cetewayo.

The Literary Week.

THE June issue of the Fortnightly Review is memorable by reason of an article by M. Maeterlinck on "The Evolution of Mystery." Over twenty pages in length, this, the latest expression of M. Maeterlinck's philosophy, is divided into thirty-two short chapters. We have not space here to indicate the trend of M. Maeterlinck's thought, but we find room for a passage from the last chapter. The translation has been made by Mr. Alfred Sutro:

Our impulse is ever to depict life as more sorrowful than truly it is; and this is a serious error, to be excused only by the doubts that at present hang over us. No satisfying explanation has so far been found. The destiny of man is as subject to unknown forces to-day as it was in the days of old; and though it be true that some of these forces have vanished, others have arisen in their stead. The number of those that are really all-powerful has in no way diminished. Many attempts have been made, and in countless fashions, to explain the action of these forces and account for their intervention; and one might almost believe that the poets, aware that these explanations were all of them futile in face of a reality that for ever, and all things notwithstanding, reveals more and more of itself, have fallen back on fatality so as in some measure to sum up the inexplicable, or at least the sadness of the inexplicable. This is all that we find in Ibsen, the Russian novels, the highest class of modern fiction, Flaubert, &c. (see War and Peace, for instance, L'Education Sentimentale, and many others).

MR. RUDYARD KIPLING has written for the Daily Express a series of stories based upon his experiences during his recent visit to South Africa. These stories will present, under the guise of fiction, phases of both the administration and the actual conduct of the war which Mr. Kipling felt he could not embody in letters which he sent home.

MESSRS. CECIL and Hildebrand Harmsworth are about to start a weekly paper, which will be called the New Liberal Review. The price, it is stated, will be threepence.

MR. WILLIAM TINSLEY, who was for many years a prominent publisher, and who is about to publish a volume called Random Recollections, sends us the following letter: "May I say that the quotations you printed in your last issue from Mr. Sutherland Edwards's new book about my young brother Edward and the founding of the publishing business known as Tinsley Brothers are very incorrect? My brother and I were equal partners in that business, which had been established four years before we published Lady Audley's Secret, not Aurora Floyd, as Mr. Edwards intimates; and the price agreed for Lady Audley was £250—two-fifty pounds—not one thousand, as Mr. Edwards also intimates, and there was no need to, nor did we, borrow a shilling or any sum of money to pay Miss Braddon for any one of the four books we published for her. I must say I am sorry Mr. Edwards has thought it prudent to publish foolish matter about my brother which could hardly be of interest to anyone and is certainly not good history."

WE take the following from the Pall Mall Gazette:

AFTER HEINE.

The stars look down from heaven above
When human hearts are breaking,
And mock the foolishness of love
That sets poor mortals aching.

This love, they say, this fatal bane,
To us it cometh never,
And thus do we alone maintain
Our deathless course for ever.

MR. GEORGE HAW, the author of the remarkable letters, "No Room to Live," in the Daily News, is the assistant editor of the Municipal Journal, a paper for which he has done varied and interesting work. He has now collected his Daily News letters into a volume, to which Sir Walter Besant has contributed an introduction.

THE issue by Messrs. Kegan Paul of A Zulu Manual or Vade-Mecum, by the Rev. Charles Roberts, reminds us that this is the third manual on the subject prepared by this writer. It may be assumed, therefore, that the Zulu language is being studied in this country—a veritable sign of the times. A Zulu sentence on the second page of this book reads like advice to Lord Roberts on his arrival in Pretoria: "Tyanelisisa indhlu izingosini zonke," which means: "Sweep thoroughly the house in all the corners."

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "Mr. Andrew Lang, in the last Academy, demolishes Miss Forbes-Robertson's English and arguments with a gusto which precludes all notions of unmannerly heat. Should argument and answer rankle, however, as controversy is apt to do, may one of Miss Forbes-Robertson's sex recommend the reperusal of Chapter V. of Northanger Abbey? I will quote one sentence only: 'Let us leave it to the reviewers to abuse such effusions of fancy at their leisure, and over every new novel to talk in threadbare strains of the trash with which the "press now groans."' There is nothing new under the sun, even for Mr. Lang's searching."

Exit Party is the (we fear) rather premature title Sir Frederick Young is giving to an essay in political history. Theoretically, we are all opposed to the principle of "party"; and yet—! There can be no question that, however bad for the State the principle may be, it has been provocative of good matter from the literary point of view. We remember a couple of goodly tomes, entitled English Parties and Party Leaders, and they made very lively reading.

IN the June Cornhill, under the title "A Literary Nihilist," Mr. Thomas Seccombe draws the literary character of M. Anatole France with fulness and skill. He finds M. France's literary counterpart in Lucien: "There is no imitation . . . but there is a remarkable affinity and a common attainment of that most difficult literary aim—the gift of making us think without being a bore." More interesting is this:

Among English writers it is difficult to name any whom he resembles with any degree of distinctness. Generically speaking, as a master of irony and a humorist of Cervantic descent, he has not a little in common with Fielding and with Disraeli; but in subtlety he suggests a much closer resemblance to Mr. Meredith, while in sentiment he is a good deal nearer than either to Dickens. As a practitioner of fiction he takes, perhaps, a greater licence than any of the masters named, for he is less a novelist than a thinker in novelistic form. As regards style it is still more difficult for us to match him; but by combining some of the features of Chesterfield, of Sterne, and of Matthew Arnold, we may get some idea of the pellucid clearness, the happy glint of fancy, and the felicity in phrase that go to make up a style absolutely free from any straining after effect. With all great artists it is the same, their talent seems to ignore labour.

MESSRS. CASSELL have just issued the first part of a new serial publication entitled The Life and Times of Queen Victoria, which will be completed in twenty-nine sixpenny parts. The bulk of the work consists of the narrative of the Queen's reign written some years ago by Mr. Robert Wilson, but this is preceded by the memoir of the personal life of the Queen on which Mrs. Oliphant was engaged at the time of her death. Both narratives have been brought up to date. The work is well and profusely illustrated.

WE are glad to see that the fine work of Mr. James Lane Allen in fiction is likely to be better known in this country than hitherto. Messrs. Macmillan have just issued Mr. Allen's book of short stories, entitled Flute and Violin, and other Kentucky Tales and Romances, and his longer stories, A Kentucky Cardinal and Aftermath. In a new introductory sketch to the Kentucky Tales, Mr. Allen has this suggestive note on the story called "The Two Gentlemen":

The author attempted to exhibit, in a way, a type of Kentucky gentleman farmer, who at the close of the Civil War abandoned the country for the towns, and led rather idle, useless lives. In England objection was made to this character on the ground that the trail of Colonel Newcome is over the colonels of American fiction. It is a point curiously mismade, curiously misconceived. The truth is, about the same time that Thackeray found the lineaments and elements of his good and mighty Anglo-Saxon gentleman in that branch of the race, had he been living in certain parts of the United States he would have found essentially the same lineaments and elements diffused through this. Among the Kentucky gentlemen of the old school there were characters that forced you to think of Colonel Newcome. Not because they were imitations of Colonel Newcome, for they may never have heard of him, but because they themselves were made of the same stuff. And if to write of this local type, however inadequately, is to suggest some poor resemblance, as a pool might resemble an ocean, the point to be enforced is not the influence of Thackeray's work upon literature, but the influence of life upon Thackeray's work. So that he gathered together out of the depths of the race, and put together in the image of his own genius, a type of man that was the widely diffused creation of the race itself.

MR. J. C. TARVER, the author of a Life of Gustave Flaubert, writes pleasantly in the June Macmillan on "Cowper's Ouse." There is a great deal more of Cowper than of the river, but no one will complain of that. Mr. Turner thinks that an "adventurous holiday-maker . . . might find a less agreeable pastime than a voyage in a canoe from Newport Pagnell down to Turvey. Thus he might bathe himself in the atmosphere which was breathed by no mean English poet, gliding beneath hills clothed with trees, or between wide meadows; but he would do well not to surrender himself unguardedly to the calm pleasures of plain-sailing, lest he should rue his error lost in the mazes of a reed-bed. Failing this adventure, his events will be the scream and flash of a kingfisher, or the sulky croak of a heron disturbed in his meal of fresh-water mussels." We thought, as we read, that Mr. Turner was going to forget Edward FitzGerald's love of Cowper's Ouse, but he mentions it just at the end. FitzGerald fished on the Ouse with his friend, W. Browne. When that friend married a wife and could come no more, FitzGerald wrote: "I have laid by my rod and line by the willows of Ouse for ever."

THE dedication of Mr. H. Rider Haggard's new volume, containing three stories, is as follows:

To the Memory of the Child

NADA BURNHAM,

who "bound all to her" and, while her father sat his way through the hordes of the Iogobo Regiment, perished of the hardships of war at Bulawayo on 19th May, 1896, I dedicate these tales—and more particularly the last, that of a Faith which triumphed over savagery and death.

THE author of "Musings without Method" is less atrabilious than usual this month. He jibes at Mr. Pinero's sensitiveness to criticism, and at the Academy Exhibition because it is a Babel of Art; but he smiles back on the Mafeking orgies, and has nothing but praise for old gentlemen who were detected in the act of blowing trumpets from the roofs of hansom cabs. Lastly, he writes with personal enthusiasm of the splendid qualities of the late Mr. R. A. M. Stevenson. Of the writer:

He painted and he wrote, but neither in his pictures nor in his books did he reveal the genius that was his. His eager brain was so busy with theories, that he could never abandon himself completely to the excitement of colour and form. As for writing, he deemed it always an ungrateful trade, which he had learned late, and pursued of necessity. Yet, had he realised it, words were always his true medium, thought was his true material. There was, half-untrained within him, a splendid gift of expression.

Of the man:

He was a true fantastic, for whom all things, even himself, were appearances rather than realities, and appearances which changed and shifted as he willed. He was, in fact, always dressing-up, as children say, and more than this, he was always dressing-up others. There was no one of his friends that had not for him a special character, which may or may not have resembled life, but which certainly influenced Stevenson's appreciation. One friend, for instance, personified for him the life of a rather squalid Bohemia. A, he would say, devotes his days to the comfort of the miserable and unfortunate. Another friend, with equal fantasy, he convicted of a too fine sensibility, asserting that in his pleasures he was something of a snob. As for himself, his character changed with his hat or his coat.

Of the talker:

It was to talk that he gave the best of his life, and those who knew him have suffered a supreme loss. Never did he spare himself or his fancy. He spoke of all things with incomparable courage and invention. Now he would dazzle you with the fireworks of paradox, now he would speak with the daring of Rabelais and a mercurial gaiety which was all his own. Or he would sketch odds in the manner of Wordsworth, or he would build up a romance about a phrase, an aspect, or a casual visitor.

Can no one—will no one—give us a more extended portrait of this delightful man?

In an entertaining article on Spring by Sir Edwin Arnold, in the Daily Telegraph, he quotes his friend Mr. Bates, the famous traveller and naturalist, as saying to him: "Future generations will find out that climate is almost the only thing worth living for, and these chilly storm-fields of our North, where the race fights only to exist, will be contemptuously depopulated for the heavenly comfort and splendour of the Amazon and such vast sunlit valleys." Now contrast this with the following passage from The Return of the Native: "Indeed, it is a question if the exclusive reign of this orthodox beauty is not approaching its last quarter. The new Vale of Tempe may be a gaunt waste in Thule; human souls may find themselves in closer and closer harmony with external things, wearing a sombreness distasteful to our race when it was young. The time seems near, if it has not actually arrived, when the chastened sublimity of a moor, a sea, or a mountain will be all of nature that is absolutely in keeping with the moods of the more thinking among mankind. And ultimately, to the commonest tourist, spots like Iceland may become what the vineyards and myrtle-gardens of South Europe are to him now; and Heidelberg and Baden be passed unheeded as he hastens from the Alps to the sand-dunes of Scheveningen." A curious contrast!

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "Some months ago a little Spanish poem appeared in the ACADEMY with a challenge to any of your readers to translate it into English verse. The following attempt has been sent to me, which can hardly fail to be of interest, coming as it does from one of the loneliest regions of South America. 'Tis a far cry to Bolivia,' writes my correspondent, 'but I have beguiled a lonely hour in the attempt to render in English the sense and rhythm of the Spanish petenera you quote. Most likely the verses were sung by a forgotten improviser.'" The version forwarded by our correspondent is excellent:

A bonnie birdie that was my pleasure
Flew away from me,
A lovely maid was my heart's sole treasure,
Her loss I dree:
And so is all in this world of sorrow,
And so go all as the twain have gone;
Some lost by flying, and some by dying,
While men say sighing: God's will be done!

VISITORS to the Paris Exhibition cannot do better than provide themselves with Exhibition Paris (Heinemann). Its information is of the fullest, and contemplates all Paris as well as the Exhibition. To name one or two features out of many, there is a chapter on "How to See Paris in One Day for Forty-Five Francs." You begin your rounds in a cab at 5.30 a.m., and you emerge, at an unstated hour, from one of the theatres. The vocabularies include a useful list of slang words, as:

Bécoter, to kiss.	Rigolo, jolly.
Beurre, money.	Sapin, a cab.
Chiper, to steal.	Tube, a tall hat.
Douloureuse, the reckoning.	Urfe, lovely.
Gondoler, to shake with laughter.	Vadrouiller, to be out on the loose.
Pépin, an umbrella.	Youtre, a Jew.

The book is profusely illustrated, and, altogether, seems excellent.

In an article on "The Star System in Publishing" the Chicago Dial warns American publishers against the dangers of the present "boom" in American novels. Enormous circulations, it is pointed out, may prove a delusion and a snare:

Publishers themselves know well enough that their success in the long run depends, not upon the fortunate acquisition of an occasional book that enjoys a sky-rocket career, but upon the possession of a substantial list of works of permanent value—works that occupy a standard place in literature, and may be depended upon to provide a steady income for many years. The publisher who has a list of this sort is, of course, glad enough to get hold of an exceptionally successful novel from time to time; such a book represents to him so much clear gain, and he would not be human did he fail to keep an intelligent watch for productions of this sort. But if he allows his head to be turned by visions of this kind of luck; if he despises the more modest, but safer, ventures; if he bends his energies toward achieving an abnormal sale for a few books, instead of a normal sale for many, he is likely to come to grief. His real interests lie in the possession of many claims to public esteem, rather than in the making of a few successful appeals to popular caprice.

That is good sense.

A CORRESPONDENT reminds us that when Tennyson's first version of the "Dream of Fair Women" was published, the lines

One drew a sharp knife thro' my tender throat
Slowly,—and nothing more, were met by one critic with the question—"What more did she want?" Our correspondent regrets that this blunt, effective sort of criticism is out of vogue, and he would like to see a revival. His desire is shared by others. A correspondent of the Chicago Dial writes to that paper under the heading, "Honey or Vinegar in Book Reviews":

An old-fashioned acquaintance of mine complains that reading a modern Review leaves him with an unpleasant sensation as of having dined wholly off honey. The book-reviewer of to-day is altogether too lenient, too considerate, too apologetic, too blandly deferential a creature to suit this reader's robust taste. He laments the decay of that fine old spirit of ferocity which animated criticism in the palmy days when Jeffrey and his merry men used to fling themselves on an aspiring "Laker" or "Cockney" with the joy of an Iroquois scalping his victim, and the fluency in insult of the late Mr. Brann. The most readable thing in the world, he thinks, is a merciless "roast" of a new book—something in the way of Macaulay's flagellations of Croker and Robert Montgomery. Holding these opinions, this charitable soul was naturally much gratified the other day when a well-known critic proclaimed in print the present crying need of a Review conducted on the old savage Edinburgh lines. The article in which this opinion is aired smells, it is fair to say, suspiciously of paradox. But, at all events, what the writer of it appears to think is wanted in these degenerate days of critical urbanity and super-abundant human kindness is a Review whose amiable speciality it shall be to damn and disparage, to thwart the "booms" of publishers, to clip the wings of aspiring young authors, to knock new-born reputations promptly on the head, and, in fine, to play in the world of current letters a part not unlike that played in politics by Marat's L'Ami du Peuple. . . . It can hardly be denied, I think, that the criticism of the modern reviewer is mostly of a sort that does more credit to his heart than his head. His eagerness to praise constantly impels him to over-praise—to lavish upon mediocrity terms that should be reserved for genius. I have often thought that the sanguine American lady who was gently taken to task by Matthew Arnold for asserting that excellence is "common and abundant" must have been a great reader of Reviews. The habit would easily account for her cheerful delusion.

Perhaps, after all, a slight infusion into the honeyed sweetness of the new Review of the spice and vinegar of the old might not be unsalutary.

Other times other manners. Still, we think that the happy medium was struck by Hepworth Dixon when he edited the Athenaeum. His counsel to his reviewers was this: "Be just, be generous, but when you do meet with a deadly ass sling him up."

WE confess (possibly to our shame) that we do not know who the "Brothers of the Book" may be. But the Brothers of the Book send us an announcement which we read with awe and appetite. There is a kind of processional, soft-footed, wand-shaking unction in the terms in which art booklets are announced in America. Take the following advertisement:

The Brothers of the Book announce as their next publication a monograph, entitled Some Children's Book-plates: an Essay in Little, by Wilbur Macey Stone.

The book will be printed on Van Gelder hand-made paper, bound in French charcoal paper boards with designed paper labels, and illustrated with eight reproductions of children's book-plates (one in three colours) on Japanese vellum. The plate forming the frontispiece will be autographed by the designer, Jay Chambers.

The edition (which will be numbered) is offered to subscribers only, and will be limited to the number of subscriptions received before June twentieth, at which time the book will be put to press.

Few pages in Ruskin's writings are more familiar to young people than that one in the appendix to The Elements of Drawing in which he gave his advice about the choice of books. The advice was eccentric, and with it came certain judgments which only Mr. Ruskin could have enunciated. In her monograph on Ruskin, reviewed by us elsewhere, Mrs. Meynell criticises the passage:

The young artist is directed to read the poets—Scott, Wordsworth, Keats, Crabbe, Tennyson, the two Brownings, Lowell, Longfellow, and Coventry Patmore alone among the moderns. "Cast Coleridge at once aside as sickly and useless, and Shelley as shallow and verbose." Byron is but withheld for a time, with praise of his "magnificence." And we have Patmore—the poet of spiritual passion and lofty distinction—praised for "quiet modern domestic feeling" and a "finished piece of writing." And Shelley "verbose"—"Adonais" verbose, and not "Endymion"! All the living poets whom Ruskin praised—Browning, Rossetti, and Patmore among them—had to endure to be praised side by side with Longfellow, and they did not love the association. But in all this strange sentence nothing is less intelligible than the word which commends to the young student—urged in the same breath to restrict himself to what is generous and reverend and peaceful—all the writings of Robert Browning. The student is warned to refrain from even noble, even pure satire, from coldness, and from a sneer; and is yet sent to a poet who gave his imagination to the invention of infernal hate in the "Spanish Cloister," and of the explanations of Mr. Sludge and Bishop Blougram, busily and indefatigably squalid and ignoble, and delighting in derision.

How quietly a huge book may pass from the press to its own public! We have before us

Bibliographical.

A good deal of attention has been drawn by advertisement to the production of a novel by Mr. Ronald MacDonald—"a son of George MacDonald," as the announcements tell us. This is not, I think, Mr. MacDonald's first performance as a "writing man"; I fancy he has, before this, dabbled in dramatic work. In 1896 appeared two plays, "All the Difference" and "The Eleventh Hour," of the first of which Mr. "Ronald MacDonald" was the sole author, while of the second he was part-author. Was he not, also, part-author, with a brother, of a play produced some years ago at the Royalty Theatre? My memory may, of course, be deceiving me. The children of George MacDonald have been rather encouraged to take an interest in things dramatic, for their father, it will be recollected, made a sort of drama out of the Pilgrim's Progress, and conducted representations of the work in different parts of the country. Among the juvenile actors, no doubt, was Mr. Ronald MacDonald.

Talking of plays and players, it has flashed across me that, in the recent quota of Royal birthday honours, there figured the name of a worthy Conservative, one of the leaders of the party in Derby, in whose person the Crown has, no doubt unwittingly, conferred distinction on literature. Mr. (now Sir) C. C. Bowring, is, I believe, the author of a play called "Pedigree," produced one afternoon some years ago at Toole's Theatre. It might never have been written but for the existence of "Caste"; but it was by no means ineffective, and showed a not unjustifiable ambition.

Yet another brief note on the literary side of the theatre. A writer in Literature, I see, includes, among the living English novelists who have written plays, Miss Marie Corelli, Mr. Hardy, and Sir Walter Besant. There have been adaptations, of course, of "The Sorrows of Satan"; but what drama has Miss Corelli herself written? The dramatised "Far from the Madding Crowd" was described officially as "by Thomas Hardy and J. Comyns Carr"; but was not the dramatisation actually done by Mr. Carr alone—though, to be sure, with Mr. Hardy's concurrence? Sir Walter Besant, also, has come before the play-going world only as collaborator with Mr. W. H. Pollock. I am not aware of his having accomplished, unassisted, the production of a drama.

Mr. Hector Macpherson "greatly dares" indeed. He is going to write a monograph on David Hume, and I dare say it will be very readable and useful. Can we, however, rank it among "felt wants"? One remembers a certain monograph on Hume in the "English Men of Letters" series (Macmillan, 1879), and another such monograph in the series of "Philosophical Classics" (Blackwood, 1886). The former was written by Prof. Huxley, and the latter by Prof. William Knight—very good authorities both, as Mr. Hector Macpherson, I am sure, would be the first to admit.

I read that a lady novelist, finding that the title she had first chosen for a tale had been used already, has substituted for it that of The Touch of a Vanished Hand. Alack and alas! in this case also she is not without a predecessor. A story called The Touch of a Vanished Hand was published in 1889, and, moreover, it is in Mudie's Catalogue at the present moment. Mudie's Catalogue, I think, is a book which novel writers would find it worth their while to acquire, or at any rate to consult, before they christen any more stories.

The poets, as well as the novelists, would welcome an official list of titles (published, shall we say, at the public's expense?). Here, for instance, is Mr. Horatio Brown with his book of verse called Drift. Now, this is such an obvious name for a volume of miscellaneous lyrics that it seems a moral certainty that it has been used before. Nevertheless, to go no further back than two decades, I know of nothing (in the same line of literature) nearer to it than the Drift Weed of Miss H. M. Burnside, whose muse, I need not say, is of the humblest sort. The idea of "drift," in general, is, of course, familiar enough to the literary mind. During the last ten years we have had volumes entitled The Drift of Fate (a novel), Drifted Home, Drifted Northward, Drifting (tout court), Drifting Apart (by Mrs. Macquoid), Drifting Through Dreamland, Drifting Towards the Breakers, Drifting Under the Southern Cross, Driftwood Sketches, Drift from Longshore, and so forth.

A Mind and a Mind.

MODERN ENGLISH WRITERS. — John Ruskin. By Mrs. Meynell. (Blackwood. 2s. 6d.)

IN her first chapter Mrs. Meynell speaks of this book as a "handbook of Ruskin," and, similarly, in her last chapter, as an attempt toward a "little popular guide." These descriptions may stand if we are allowed to suggest that the handbook is for those who are returning from Ruskin, rather than for those who are going to him; that the guidance is more suited to readers who are perplexedly filled with the Master, than to those who are about to fill themselves in a girlish hope of "lilies." Again, some readers may feel generously indignant with Mrs. Meynell for putting the name of handbook to a work of exhaustive thought and beautiful literary fibre. We feel no such concern. In an age when trash comes with trumpet, a piece of literature may as well swim into our ken as Number Three in a series of handbooks.

In its preparation and building this monograph is a work of unusual solicitude—solicitude of the heart as well as of the head: for when we have reckoned up the books that have been mastered; and the long dissectings, relatings, and comparings which alone could unify that reading; and the writer's pains to spare us the processes which she would not spare herself—there remain a crowd of instances where, not the faculties, but the loyalties, of her mind have had to bear their strain; where the burden of dealing justly by a dead man's work has been heavy; and where reverence, though it never failed, has had to make itself felt in the tone of "I do not agree," or in the tone of "I do not understand." It may be said that these are simply the pains of critical biography. Yes, but the quantity of such pains depends on the quantity of the biographer's mind; and the resolve to walk with a Master, yet not be dragged by him, to record his conclusions, but always to understand them, to set free his messages, but to give them the accent and effectiveness of the hour, becomes notable when it is made by a mind competent for the task in hand, and sensible of all the risks. Such a book, we think, is Mrs. Meynell's. It expounds a known mind by its effect on a known mind, and we watch the impact. It is impossible to read her acute exposition and not be thinking almost as much about the author of The Rhythm of Life as about the author of Modern Painters. This is not to diminish the expository value of the book, but to describe it.

In approaching her task Mrs. Meynell might, it is obvious, have quickly pronounced for the notion that Ruskin was a true seer of nature but a muddle-headed instructor in Art, and so have been free to interpret and emulate his fine words about Sun, Cloud, Shadow, Reed, Blade of Grass, and the Winds of the World. For on these things she also has thought intently, and on all could say unusual things again. But it has not been her way thus to use Ruskin's best. She has undertaken nothing less than a study of the whole body of his work, and its painful exposition. Painful is the word; we have rarely seen a mind in such lengthy travail, imposing such exactness on every decision. The essay on "Rejection" had prophetic sentences: "We are constrained to such vigilance as will not let even a master's work pass unfanned and unpurged. . . . Our reflection must be alert and expert. . . . It makes us shrewder than we wish to be." It is this helplessness to be the bland disciple that makes this book so vital. The warmest praise of the Master is there, and yet courteous alarm-bells are rung on every page.

This doctrine of rejection compels Mrs. Meynell to be a vigilant critic of Ruskin's style. Yet there is an eager, almost laughing, recognition of the fine things. Thus, from some pages "beautiful beyond praise" in Unto this Last, Mrs. Meynell gives:

All England may, if it chooses, become one manufacturing town; and Englishmen, sacrificing themselves to the good of humanity, may live diminished lives in the midst of noise, of darkness, and of deadly exhalation. But the world cannot become a factory or a mine. . . . Neither the avarice nor the rage of men will ever feed them. . . . So long as men live by bread, the far away valleys must laugh as they are covered with the gold of God, and the shouts of the happy multitudes ring round the winepress and the well.

In the chapter on the fifth volume of Modern Painters we have: "How exquisitely is this written of the Venetian citizen, with its allusions to certain Greeks—to Anacreon, to Aristophanes, and to Hippias Major":

No swallow chattered at his window, nor, nestled under his golden roofs, claimed the sacredness of his mercy; no Pythagorean fowl brought him the blessings of the poor, nor did the grave spirit of poverty rise at his side to set forth the delicate grace and honour of lowly life. No humble thoughts of grasshopper sire had he, like the Athenian; no gratitude for gifts of olive; no childish care for figs, any more than thistles.

From Præterita "this magnificent image of the great balance of Johnson's style":

I valued his sentences not primarily because they were symmetrical, but because they were just, and clear. . . . it is a method of judgment rarely used by the average public, who . . . are as ready with their applause for a sentence of Macaulay's, which may have no more sense in it than a blot pinched between double paper, as to reject one of Johnson's, . . . though its symmetry be as of thunder answering from two horizons.

Of censure there is some, too, and it is in this direction that we encounter, with distinct regret, what we may call Mrs. Meynell's ukase method of criticism. Page after page passes, and the criticism is gracious, experimental, or proven; then comes a ukase, an emanation of opinion, decisive in inverse proportion to its needlessness. These ukases are in your hands before you recover speech. You would exclaim, you would summon assistance, but Mrs. Meynell passes on in the gentle, deaf autocracy of her mood. The ceremony of delivering a ukase cannot be better illustrated than by her remarks on one of the most famous passages in the Seven Lamps of Architecture. She says:

Ruskin's description of that landscape . . . is a finished work, exquisite with study of leaf and language, but yet not effective in proportion to its own beauty and truth. Ruskin wrote it in youth, in the impulse of his own discovery of language, and of all that English in its rich modern freshness could do under his mastery—and it is too much, too charged, too anxious. Some sixty lines of "word-painting" are here, and they are less than this line of a poet—

"Sunny eve in some forgotten place."

This refraining phrase is of more avail to the imagination than the splendid subalpine landscape of The Seven Lamps.

That is a ukase. How civilly you would have accepted the whole judgment up to the words "too anxious"! But this line of poetry—torn from some antipodean context, flicked into the witness box unnamed, unsworn, unremembered, and crucially irrelevant to the case—this pet lamb in court, or this rabbit from counsel's hat, how shall we accept it? how be happy if we do not accept it?

And yet this is a mild example. On another page, after quoting a few sentences of Ruskin's, Mrs. Meynell writes, in parenthesis:

(Ruskin, at this time and ever after, used "which" where "that" would be both more correct and less inelegant. He probably had the habit from him who did more than any other to disorganise the English language—that is, Gibbon.)

That is the perfect ukase. Note the intensification of authority by the withholding of Gibbon's name until the air has been darkened with his sin. But is it fair, or quite in the scheme of things, thus to ban Gibbon in a casual breath; to flout, en passant, the reader's probable cherished opinion of Gibbon, as if it were nothing? We picture Gibbon's own astonishment, when this judgment is whispered along "the line of the Elysian shades." He may have expected it, may have humbled himself for its coming; but the manner of its coming he could not have foreseen. "In parenthesis!" we hear him gasp, as he sinks back on his couch of asphodel.

Well, but it is not enough that an interpreter should have prayed three times a day "in his chamber toward Jerusalem," or that he should pronounce the handwriting on the wall elegant or not—the question is, Can he translate its meaning? In this case the question may be hard to answer. Our own difficult, incompact impression of Mrs. Meynell's interpretation of Ruskin—itsself necessarily difficult and incompact—flies to a phrase, or rather to two words, which Mrs. Meynell brings into vital relation with Ruskin—Mystery and Lesson. She shows that, when dealing with the Mystery, Ruskin is great; but, "if ever he has explained in vain, registered an inconsequence, committed himself to failure, it has been in the generous cause of possible rescue—it has been in the Lesson." The nobility of her exposition of Ruskin dwells centrally in the fact that, while she is sometimes doubtful about the Lesson, or is obliged to show (by its arduous compilation) that it was not too clearly or consistently delivered, or is constrained to deny it as a working precept, she makes us feel how glorious were those dealings with the hidden Mystery which issued in the peccant Teaching. And the vision of Ruskin which she leaves in the mind, in the mind of the present writer, is that of a man who spent his life in turning over with his great clean hand—first in hope, and at last in weariness—the whole assembled result of human art, and the registers of its origins. Anon he rose, like one drunken with beauty, afflicted with more purpose than he could contain or control, to teach from a full, but too particular, inspiration. And because in its divine frenzy the Lesson was not aimed, shaped, timed, proved, peptonised—it was laughed into the street by men whose hands stayed in their coat-tails. It would be easy for us to show again and again how Mrs. Meynell, having wrestled with and reluctantly confuted Ruskin's Lesson, has convinced us of his hold on the Mystery. And one comes to be very grateful for these long compensating swings of the pendulum, and for the smaller reparations. One notes how, after some pages of particularly destructive criticism on The Two Paths, a dainty justice hastens to offer this:

If I have treated this book with controversy, it was impossible to do otherwise. But out of its treasures of wisdom take the page in praise of Titian, which ends with the passage: "Nobody cares much at heart about Titian; only there is a strange undercurrent of everlasting murmur about his name, which means the deep consent of all great men that he is greater than they."

And surely with this quotation went a tact in its choice, for Ruskin's fate and Titian's are not unlike. Ruskin's bitter disappointment when he found that the Turner water-colours in the National Gallery, which he had arranged with incredible labour, had been absolutely forgotten by the public and allowed to fade by Providence, produces a fine comment. Ruskin had said: "That was the first mystery of life to me," and Mrs. Meynell says:

The reader will remember that Turner's pictures were not only neglected by men, but also irreparably injured and altered by time; to witness this was to endure the chastisement of a hope whereof few men are capable. Surely it is no obscure sign of greatness in a soul—that it should have hoped so much. Ninety-and-nine are they who need no repentance, having not committed the sin of going thus in front of the judgments of heaven—heralds—and have not been called back to rebuke as was this one. In what has so often been called the dogmatism of Ruskin's work appears this all noble fault.

Upon the discovery of this mystery crowd all the mysteries. Who that has suffered one but has also soon suffered all? In this great lecture ["The Mystery of Life and its Arts"] Ruskin confesses them one by one, in extremities of soul. And he is aghast at the indifference not of the vulgar only, but of poets. The seers themselves have paltered with the faculty of sight. Milton's history of the fall of the angels is unbelievable to himself, told with artifice and invention, not a living truth presented to living faith, nor told as he must answer it in the last judgment of the intellectual conscience. "Dante's . . . .," The indifference of the world as to the infinite question of religion, the indifference of all mankind as to the purpose of its little life, of every man as to the effect of his little life—in an evil hour these puzzles through the way to the recesses of thought.

We have shown the temper and tendency of Mrs. Meynell's book. If we are now asked whether she has evolved from Ruskin's teaching a clear resultant that one may copy into one's pocket-book, and say, "At last, this is Ruskin's teaching," we answer that she has failed to do this—because it was not possible. All the more is one impressed by the patience which footed every inch of the way to a foreseen vagueness. But Mrs. Meynell has set many things in order, and has put some things in a bright light; she has greatly distinguished Ruskin's failure from his success; and she has written an intrinsically fine book, of which the labour and truthful speaking adumbrate the labour and truthful speaking of the Master.

"And yet—he is a Master."

The Dead City. By Gabriele d'Annunzio. Translated by Arthur Symonds. (Heinemann.)

D'ANNUNZIO is a master of unquestionable genius in a very questionable school. It is the school which makes parade of the fact that it is the offspring of decay, which seeks its charm in decay, and has veritably "made a covenant with death." Exceedingly perfect in technique, vividly imaginative, his masterly novels are impregnated with corruption in a much deeper sense than that of mere sensuality—though this at times is present. To him and the writers of his school we are often tempted to cry with Macbeth: "Out on ye, owls! nothing but songs of death?" And yet—he is a master!

This latest play of d'Annunzio's is most typical of its author and of a moribund age and art. As a play it is over-soft, over-luxuriant. The copious stage directions of Maeterlinck are carried to an excess in which one sees the novelist. They become veritable descriptive passages. Withal, it is most powerful in its kind, its strictly limited kind, though that is not the power of strength nor yet of spiritual insight. Infinitely delicate razor-edge of sensation pervades the play: its people see with their finger-tips, feel at every pore; but it is yet a purely material sensibility, it is subtilised, one might almost say volatilised, materiality. Symbolic it is throughout; but the symbolism is of the tomb. Incidents are artfully introduced, Maeterlinck-wise, and emphasised, for their figurative and bodiful significance. The scene is laid in Argos, looking out on the ashes of Mycenæ—a sultry and thirsting soil, an expired and dismembered city. The atmosphere is laden with death, the characters are marked with death like decaying or over-ripe plants; and, unlike Shakespeare, there is no character to suggest, however tacitly, the sanity from which the others deflect. A luxuriant and most sensitive beauty overspreads this dramatic cemetery, peopled by the mad. The whole play palpitates with a deadly beauty, a mortal and ruinous loveliness, which shines as putrescence shines. Our phrase is not overstrained; delirium seems not far from all d'Annunzio's characters; we feel as if we were in an asylum for diseased minds, where the ideas of everyone are monstrous and distorted, like shadows cast by firelight. The blind girl, Anna, at the very outset recounts a dream of sudden age—a dream undreamed by the sane, just possible in its hideousness to dawning madness: "I felt furrowing wrinkles breaking out all over my body; I felt the hairs falling from my head in great locks on my lap, and my fingers tangled in them as in unwound skeins; my gums were emptied, and my lips stuck to them." She complains of the hurry of life in its morbid perception by her senses: "In the silence and darkness, sometimes, I hear life hurrying with such a terrible noise, Bianca Maria, that I would gladly die, only not to hear it any longer."

Much of the vividly imaginative speech in this drama, like the words we have italicised, oversteps the verge of sanity. The very skylarks are fin-de-siècle. "One," says Alessandro, "fell, all of a sudden, at the feet of my horse, heavy as a stone, and lay there, dead, struck by its own frenzy, by having sung with too much joy." It is only a decadent skylark that would do that.

This blind Anna is one of the principal personages. Beautiful, though blind, she is of a preternatural perceptiveness, not inconceivable in one so afflicted, and described with touches of exquisite passion and poetry. Her husband is Alessandro, a poet, and they are dwelling with his bosom friend Leonardo, who is wrapped in the search among the ruins of Mycenæ for the buried remains of the Atridæ and Cassandra—victims of the terrible tragedy renowned in Greek drama. With him is his lovely sister, Bianca Maria, glowing with the flame of youthful life, and magnetic to those about her. Leonardo's discovery of the buried Atridæ (magnificently described) takes place at the close of the first act, nor has his pursuit any obvious connexion with the plot; but it is continuously suggested that from the soil impregnated with ancient crime the buried spirit of dark Greek passions rises as an infection upon the living searchers, fevering them with the obsession of like sin. The working out of these morbid passions among the four constitutes the theme of the tragedy. Bianca Maria and Alessandro are violently drawn to each other; and the poet's blind wife, Anna, from the beginning divines their love. Leonardo is infected with a more sinister disease, obscure to the others, until he himself, half-way through the play, reveals it to the horrified Alessandro. For this latter reason we cannot here deal fully with the play. We can but indicate it as the theme of John Ford's well-known play, and (from a very different standpoint) the basis of The Revolt of Islam, as Shelley originally wrote it. Lovers of contrast may compare Ford with d'Annunzio. The former is far the more healthy (so far as is possible with so morbid a theme) and dramatic; the latter more finished and levelly poetic—more an artist in all but dramatic power. When Leonardo realises that Bianca Maria is the source both of his own and Alessandro's obsession, and that Anna is preparing to drown herself in order to free her husband for the woman she loves as a sister, he comes to the delirious resolve to liberate them all by the death of Bianca Maria. The play closes as Anna stumbles upon the drowned body of Bianca Maria, tended by the poet that loved her and the brother that has murdered her.

This sombre plot, lavishly and resolvedly designed to play upon all the nerves of horror, is worked out with marvellous intimacy of execution. Dramatic character neither exists nor is attempted, save in the most generic way. Anna is other-worldly, outside life; Bianca Maria is intended for the embodiment of plenitudinous youth. Yet she is no less a creature of naked nerve than her avowedly neurotic friend. But if you can reconcile yourself to this universal super-exaltation of sensibility, there is tragic keenness and the bare edge of suffering beauty in the play. The Italian genius is visible, acute rather than wide, as a great writer has described it. "Pain is the exceedingly keen edge of bliss" in the most voluptuous passages. Written, for the most part, in a strain of eloquence shot with gleaming threads of poetry, it rises frequently into poetry absolute and unmingled. D'Annunzio is féy of flowers. Their scent, their colour, their profusion fill his imagination and overflow continually into his imagery. They lend an exquisite metaphor to the lovely passage in which the blind Anna fingers the loosened tresses of Bianca Maria: "What hair! what hair! It is as soft to the fingers as tepid water flowing! . . . It is a torrent. It covers you all over. It covers me too. What floods! what floods! It has a perfume; it has a thousand perfumes. A torrent full of flowers!" Note that adjective "tepid," in its connexion with the living warmth of hair. The blind girl's exaltation of perception is most subtly described: "It is as if your fingers saw. . . . Each of your fingers is like an eyelid that presses upon one. Ah! it is as if your soul came down into the tips of your fingers, and the flesh lost its human nature." With the same beauty Bianca Maria is delineated: "The desire of life radiates from your body like the heat of a lighted hearth."

The first scene of the second act, in which Alessandro declares his love to Bianca Maria, is a marvellous piece of eloquent passion, with flashes of lyricism intensified by daring imagery. Too long, perhaps, for stage effect, and almost certainly too subtle for a popular audience, the speeches carry one away in the reading by their impassioned enchantment. Here are a few snatches:

ALESSANDRO.

I have met you in dreams as now I meet you in life. You belong to me as if you were my creation, formed by my hands, inspired by my breath. Your face is beautiful in me as a thought in me is beautiful. When your eyelids quiver it seems to me that they quiver like my blood, and that the shadow of your eyelashes touches the root of my heart.

BIANCA MARIA.

Be silent! Be silent! I cannot breathe. Ah, I cannot live any longer, I cannot live any longer!

ALESSANDRO.

You cannot live if you do not live in me, for me, now that you are in my life as your voice is in your mouth. . . .

BIANCA MARIA.

You exalt with your breath the humblest of creatures. I have been only a good sister. . . .

ALESSANDRO.

But was there not also another creature living beside the good sister? . . . Wherever there was a trace of the great myths or a fragment of the imaginings of beauty with which the chosen race transfigures the force of the world, she passed with her reviving grace, passing lightly over the distance of centuries as if she followed the song of the nightingale across a country strewn with ruins.

This is splendid writing. With Leonardo's communication to Alessandro of his dreadful secret, in the ensuing scene, begin the most darkly oppressive portions of the play, preluding to the final tragedy. It is not possible, nor perhaps desirable, to suggest by extracts the power of these repellent, yet subtle, scenes. But even this part is relieved—or perhaps intensified—by passages of contrasting beauty. Such is the wonderfully lovely imagery with which Anna describes the statues in fountains:

They enjoy, at the same time, rest and fluidity. In lonely gardens they sometimes seem in exile, but they are not; for their aliquid soul never ceases to communicate with the far-off mountains, whence they come while yet asleep, and shut up in the mass of lifeless mineral. They listen astonished to the words that come into their mouth from the depths of the earth, but they are not deaf to the colloquies of poets and sages who love to repose there, as in a retreat, in the musical shade where marble perpetuates a calm gesture.

Of the final scene, powerful and intensely morbid, we can give no conception. The play, as a closet-drama, is, perhaps, near perfection in its decadent kind. Nor need we attempt more formal criticism. In this case, to describe is to criticise, to criticise is to describe. But we should add, in conclusion, that Mr. Arthur Symonds's translation is admirable—nay, beautiful.

Birds of the North.

Among the Birds in Northern Shires. By Charles Dixon. Illustrated by Charles Whymper. (Blackie & Co.)

MR. DIXON has produced a large, pleasant, gossiping book of ornithology, that might prove difficult to read straight through, but seems meant for dipping into. You can scarcely open it without fishing up something interesting and agreeable. But the exact student, the hunter of mere facts, should be warned away. "Northern Shires" is in itself a vague expression, and means to Mr. Dixon all the counties between Yorkshire and Shetland. He has rambled in most of them, but pretends to make no exhaustive study of local ornithology. To show what we mean let us instance the raven. He tells us generally that this bird is disappearing everywhere except in the Highlands, and in a word picture as charming as Mr. Whymper's excellent drawing tells us of his meeting with it in Skye, St. Kilda, and on the misty heaths between Sligachan and Talisker, but is somewhat indefinite in his references to its occurrence in the North of England. This to us proved somewhat disappointing. Last year Mr. Christopher Leyland, whose zoological collection at Haggerstone might have rewarded a visit from Mr. Dixon, informed the present writer that a pair of ravens have annually reared and brought off a brood of young near Kidlands, his Cheviot shooting-place. We searched through Mr. Dixon's references in order to find out, if possible, other proofs that the raven, common enough in old days in the wild country round Harrow Bog and the Henhole, is recovering ground, but all he says is that it frequents Dartmoor, but is only a casual visitant to other English moors. From the same authority we learned with regret that the merlin, smallest and prettiest of our falcons, and so characteristic of the Cheviots, is disappearing. Mr. Dixon's information confirms this account, but lays the blame on the gamekeeper, whom he also denounces for exterminating kites, buzzards, and hobbies. Not quite fairly we think. The growth of one species and the disappearance of another baffles every attempt to find a satisfactory reason. If we may trust to the references in Shakespeare, old Acts of Parliament, parish records, and other documents, literary and antiquarian, coughts and crows used to follow the spring plough in equal numbers. We use crows in the way of the careless playwright, who signifies thereby all the black tribe that ranges from jackdaw to raven. The cought has become avis rarissima, and the rook and daw have multiplied exceedingly. Why? No gamekeeper interferes here. In a water close by where these lines are penned the moorhen and coot were once equally abundant. They have been neither shot at nor disturbed, yet while one has flourished the other has dwindled away, and there is not a nest where a score used to be. Why? At one time the kite was the commonest of London birds, sitting on the houses and haunting the markets. It has become a stranger not only in Fleet-street but in the Northern Shires, and no adequate reason can be found. The magpie was as familiar to hamlet and cottage a few generations back as the starling and sparrow are to-day. It is seldom seen now and the jay has become abundant. To account for the magpie's increasing scarcity is as difficult as it is to say why a species of butterfly appears in myriads and then dwindles till it is a cherished prize of the "boy-collector."

But this is taking us away from our Northern Shires. Frequently in skimming the attractive pages of Mr. Dixon we have caught ourselves wondering where and how a contrast could be established between the birds of the Northern and those of the Southern Shires. The fauna is very nearly the same. On May nights it is true you shall not in the bleaker North list the nightingale's "most musical, most melancholy lay"—that is to say, you may do so on rare occasions only. Mr. Dixon, who seems to accept the current belief that Philomel does not breed north of the Trent, may like to know that he has indubitably appeared, to take one place, in the Vale of Whittingham. Veracious newspapers told the strange tale, and a naturalist of renown went, saw, heard, and ultimately attested to the fact—these things being duly chronicled in another Mr. Dixon's charming books, Whittingham Vale. Yet the "voluptuous nightingale" is not characteristic of the Northern night. But there are far more owls. To hear them hooting in Chillingham Park, or about Ford Castle, or in the dark Flooden woods is to wonder where they find holes enough to live in during daytime. And if you follow the ploughman on a spring day the crowd behind will not be quite the same in the North as in the South. Black is the prevailing, almost the uniform hue behind the Wilts or Glo'ster plough-boy; all the way from Lincolnshire to the Highlands, gulls—the black-headed one Larus ridibundus—turns the black into piebald. Indeed, this inland breeding gull lends a character to the North, nesting sometimes in the pond of a beautiful park, sometimes in bog or mountain tarn, always carrying with it something of the freshness, the colour, and even the sound of the sea. Yet its tastes are fickle and wayward. A gull pond—we like not the expression gullery—is a beautiful ornament to a manor, but is difficult to establish, and the creatures forsake it at slight provocation. We do not think they have ever been enticed back to Paston Lake—dear to boyish memory for many a long summer day's perch-fishing—and very few go to Pallinsburn now. Superstition says they were attached to the family of Askew and that they have not been so friendly since the present head of it assumed the name of Robertson, and in accordance with the will of his father-in-law made Ladykirk his chief residence.

The streams of the North, tumbling as they do from the hills and abounding in shallows, runs, and cascades, suit that merry bird, the dipper, better than the smooth Tennysonian brooks of the South, and he is, accordingly, a familiar of the angler. But the kingfisher—that "refulgent avine gem," as Mr. Dixon calls him with some "profusion of epitaphs"—shows himself rarely on the Tweed. You are more likely to meet with him in St. James's Park than the Braes of Yarrow. The heron, however, stands on one leg and admires his reflection in the pool, not by any means so wild and shy as he is in the home counties, where he carries about with him memories of the punting sea-coast gunner. Mingled with the brawl of the water is the sand-piper's eternal scream, especially in May and June, when the anxieties of nesting-time are at their worst. To the fisherman, too, comes the wail of the curlew, here a bird of the mountain more than of the sea-coast; and all the summer day the white gulls flash to the sunlight as they wing up and down the water-courses seeking for fish.

It is doubtful how far Mr. Dixon is justified in lamenting the extinction of birds of prey, since very great changes have occurred in the last two decades. As far as bird life is affected, the chief of these are the desertion of the country by the peasant and the greater strictness with which land and stream are preserved. Probably Mr. Dixon would say the latter circumstance operates against all bird life, except that of pheasants, partridges, and grouse. That is not so, really. Take the Grey family as an example. They own some of the best, and much of the wildest, land in the North. But ornithology is a tradition and a passion with them. Sir Edward Grey, for instance, knows birds as well as he does the South African Blue Books. Earl Grey is fascinated by the same study, and the relative who manages his estates, together with a dozen others, is peculiarly interested in wild life. Now, with angling stopped, and tourists shut off from the mountains—you cannot go to drink out of Marmion's Well, or climb Cheviot, without permission—is it not probable that the fauna is undergoing change? We have the best authority for saying that it is, and what has taken place in one district is occurring elsewhere. If Sir Edward Grey would only give us that book on birds which he has so frequently been asked to write, it is probable that this view would be confirmed.

Of course, this is not written in a spirit of fault-finding with Mr. Dixon. He knows his birds well, and it would be asking an impossibility to expect that one man should deal intimately with the vast tract of land he covers. His writing is generally good, and sometimes very good indeed, but it would be improved by the elimination of such eccentricities as the habitual use of passere as the singular of passeres. Mr. Whympers's illustrations are beyond praise.

The American and the Provencal Amorists.

The Troubadours at Home. By Justin H. Smith. 2 vols. (Putnam's.)

ONE needs a particular variety of mind to be greatly interested in the troubadours of tradition. The practical man, for example, can see nothing in them whatever but midsummer madness. To write long odes to a lady's eye-brows, and, more, to sing them under the walls of an insanitary castle at midnight, to the accompaniment of a guitar—this is nothing in a practical man's way. Had the ordinary troubadour the desire to make the lady his wife it might be different; but for the most part the lady was already married (although "Provence," said Daudet, "is polygamous"), and two or three other troubadours were engaged in compiling similar aggregations of amorous tropes for the same lady; each poet's aim being less to induce her to smile upon him than to win the approval of the judge to whom the rival effusions would be submitted. All this discourages the practical man from extending his sympathies to the Provencal brotherhood of amorists. The romantic minded reader has more tenderness for them, but it is probable that he, too, would like something less poetical and more practical. The schoolboy is interested in Blondel, the friend of Richard Cœur de Leon, but to carry a guitar when one might carry a battle-axe does not strike him as a brilliant choice of weapon. Without enumerating other types of readers, it may be said that among us Northerners the troubadour of tradition is somewhat lacking in fascination. He belongs to the region of comic opera. We tolerate him as a gay, witty, insouciant fellow, good company enough in his frothy way, and there we leave him.

But the facts of his character are otherwise. In these two large entertaining and patient volumes the troubadour stands out as a more complete, a more all-round man than tradition has permitted him to be: a fighter as well as a singer, a lover as well as a love-maker, a man of affairs as well as a jester. Mr., or Professor, Smith (for the author is Professor of Modern History at Dartmouth College in America) writes the history of the troubadours with extraordinary minuteness; and the ordinary reader will lay down his two large volumes with a very different idea of their worth from that with which he took them up.

Perhaps Mr. Smith is too fond of conjecturing as to the habits of his heroes, but for the most part the account is sober and, we feel assured, accurate. As a specimen of his imaginative faculty as well as of the variousness of the troubadour character, take this passage—a picture of the state of Provence on one bright morning in 1182:

Marcabru, Raimbaut d'Aurenga, and the Countess of Dia have passed off the stage, and Sordel is not yet alive; but most of the great singers are somewhere to be found. Bernart de Ventadorn, too old for violent pleasures, is just sitting down to a quiet game of chess in the palace of Toulouse; while Peire Rogier is pacing slowly back and forth in the cloister of Grammont, and his old love—Ermengarda of Narbonne—discusses with King Amfos the wisdom of leaguening themselves with Henry II. of England against the Count of Toulouse. Faidit might be seen climbing the zigzags of Ventadorn with a new song for Maria. Stormy Born is raving about Autafort, preparing to oust his brother; while his bookish neighbour, Borneil, thankful to be out of the battle at his native place, is far on the way to Spain, wishing he could forget the inconstant Escaronha. Daniel could be found in Beauville "swimming up-stream" with all his might, while Vidal, looking often at his ring, sighs for the beautiful Viscountess of Marseille. Peire d'Alvernhe, not in a sentimental mood this morning, is recovering from last night's concert in the castle hall of Puivert by hunting the deer, and the Monk of Montaudon has just rolled out of bed at Aurillac after making a night of it.

That passage gives the temper of the book. It is a leisurely pageant of hot Southerners, singing, fighting, loving, pretending to love, blustering, laughing, philosophising; and the background is Provence, with its wonderful old walls, its sunny, lazy life, its roses, its bright eyes, its flashes of colour. Truly a fascinating book, the fruit of true zeal, the reflection of a very agreeable temperament.

The fault of Mr. Smith's book is its length. His subject so pleases him that he cannot restrain his enthusiasm: he babbles on and on, translating here, paraphrasing there, fondling the towns with the love of an Old Mortality, eulogising his heroes, telling of pretty little personal adventures on his road. He writes very well (and very differently from professors of modern history in English colleges) and his mind is gay and sympathetic and his eyes and ears ever alert for pleasant impressions. This being so, we are the more sorry that his book is so unwieldy. It contains something like 350,000 words when 100,000 would have been ample. Perhaps some day he will treat the whole work as a quarry from which to dig out a block of pure marble. Or he might cut the book into two; for not only are the historical portions, the biographies and criticisms of the troubadours, good, but Mr. Smith's own narrative is good too—something in the manner of the Travels with a Donkey in the Cévennes, yet by no means imitative or derivative. One adventure, indeed, Mr. Smith had in common with R. L. S. (and in common also with another lover of old France, Mr. Hamerton): he was arrested as a spy. We quote part of the account of the judicial proceedings:

"Who are you?"

"An American."

"Grossly improbable, monsieur. What are you here for?"

"To find the picturesque and the historic."

"What do you find of that sort here?"

"Exceedingly little."

"Ah, you are looking for the picturesque and the historic and you come to a place where there is neither! You refute yourself. It is very grave, monsieur."

He shook his head and nodded solemnly to himself a long time, and I began to feel rather guilty.

"Very singular, monsieur, very singular. Have you no papers, nothing?"

"Oh, yes!" I handed him a letter from our embassy in Paris, recommending me to the authorities of southern France.

"It is a forgery," he exclaimed after reading it. "Anybody could get up such a letter. How do I know whose signature that is? It is not authentic. It is a forgery. If it were genuine, why didn't you produce it sooner?"

I was clearly convicted, not only by his logic, but by my own papers.

The incident is presented with humour. Mr. Smith can write also like this of the Provençal people of to-day. The town referred to is Aix :

The only live people seem to be the small tradesmen, and they live only once a week. Every one has a bustide, a garden in the suburbs, and he may always be found there on Sunday. In the shade of his arbour he drains a flagon of good wine, expands his chest, banties mocking pleasantries, sings out the old songs of Provence, and with a turn of the eye repeats its old proverbs: "A man's shadow is worth a hundred women"; "To lie well is a talent, to lie ill a vice"; "One half of the world laughs at the other half"; "Praise the sea, but stay on dry land"; "Water spoils wine, carts spoil roads, women spoil men."

There is enough there to show that he entered the country in the right spirit. And here is another proof of Mr. Smith's non-professorial fitness to be the historian of the Midi and its happy folk. Henri, it should be explained, was convoying Mr. Smith to Courthézon. Henri, who was expecting to be met, suddenly exclaimed: "Oh, there they are! there they are; they are coming!" Mr. Smith continues:

Three specks are crawling along the edge of the shrubbery, a quarter of a mile away.

"It is my sister and her cousine from the farm; and oh! la petite fillette. Venez donc, venez donc." Then realising that they cannot hear a word, and will be long in arriving, he dashes down the hill like a chamois.

After a while they all come tugging up together. La cousine is a buxom country girl of sixteen almond harvests, and La Petite a demoiselle of six, with short hair tied in a humorous queue. The bise whisks off a hat—never mind, it is recovered. The cousine's skirt blows into her face; the purple ribbon comes off the fillette's queue and the hair flies blustering over her face—never mind, so much the more fun. La Petite trips on a big stone, and is righted up with a pull and a shout. So up they come, laughing and chattering, putting themselves to rights and getting put wrong again by the pranky wind, holding each other fast, and Henri holding most of all the rosy cousine.

OUR STOLEN SUMMER.

BY MARY STUART BOYD.

A tour of the world is no new thing, and critical guns are ready loaded with the terrible word "hackneyed" to fire at the adventurer whose pen is dedicated to any region less novel than a "virgin peak." Yet every record in which the adventurer has described what lives and changes, rather than what vegetates imperturbably in museums and galleries, is a fresh record and worth the reading. Of such is Mrs. Boyd's volume, which her husband has illustrated profusely with spirited line drawings. The travellers were part-spectators of the mild explosion known as the Samoan war, but it would be absurd to call the bombardment of Apia the centre-piece of the book. The description of a Tongan wedding is more to our mind. In it we learn that "a pillow is the one article of actual furniture indispensable in the starting of a South Sea Island home." As it appears that "stools of dark polished wood" are "distinctive Tongan pillows," we may suppose that the saying "uneasy lies the head that wears the crown" has in Tonga lost its peculiar pathos. Writing on the Tongan coaling station Mrs. Boyd says:

Owing to the still lingering influence of the singularly comprehensive code of crimes framed by the notorious missionary-politician, Shirley Baker, almost everybody in Nukualofa is serving a term of punishment for some half-imaginary offence. One of these laws forbids any man to wear the shoulders uncovered—a rule which, apart from the discomfort entailed thereby in a tropical climate, has proved conducive to pulmonary disease; as during the frequent heavy rains the thin outer vests get drenched, and moisture that would roll harmlessly off a well-oiled skin is apt to bequeath a chill when left to dry on the body.

Mrs. Boyd is under the impression that in Maoriland her party witnessed the haka, but the scandalous nature of the haka (vide Mr. Kerry-Nicholls's King Country, p. 87) renders it probable that they were entertained by a comparatively decorous substitute. The tourists finished their land-travels in the United States. How times have changed there, to be sure! What would a certain Mr. Legree say to this: "In Central Park, on Sunday afternoon, we saw a benevolent-appearing, gold-spectacled negro, attired in superfine broadcloth, taking an airing in his handsome carriage with a white coachman and footman on the box." Chinatown, in 'Frisco, seems to have revealed to Mrs. Boyd the secret of the Celestial's toilet. "The length and thickness of the pigtails surprised us," she writes, "until we discovered that all were closely intertwined with strands of black silk." Master Boyd's fleeting eligibility for half-price tickets determined the epoch of the expedition, and his foot-gear (renewed from time to time) supplies his mother with a humorous topic. Beer is beer, even small beer; and who would grudge a kindly, serious, intelligent Englishwoman her little joke? (Blackwood. 18s.)

GREATER CANADA.

BY E. B. OSBORN, B.A.

What do we owe to the Hudson's Bay Company? The "peaceful acquisition," says Mr. Osborn, "of a territory as large as the whole of Europe." Prince Rupert was the Company's first governor; "our dear and entirely beloved cousin" Charles II. quaintly calls him in the Royal Charter for Incorporating the Hudson's Bay Company, granted in 1670. In this useful book, which contains a map, the text of the charter, a chronological table of North-western history and other supplements, Mr. Osborn attempts a combination of historical events and emigrant's practical guide. The historical part is rather tantalising. It is conceivable that a large section of the public have forgotten the career of Louis Riel, with which Mr. Osborn evidently supposes them to be familiar, although this "descendant of St. Louis" made such stir in 1870 and 1885, indulged in the picturesque diet of blood cooked in milk, and lived to be hanged. Many will turn to these pages for information about gold. They will be warned off the Klondike if they trust Mr. Osborn, for it would seem that the royalty on the production claimed by the Government prohibits a claim owner from making any profit to speak of even on a winter's work resulting in 75,000 dollars' worth of dust.

It is not generally known [says Mr. Osborn] that the first discovery of gold in British Columbia occurred in 1852—six years before the Great Rush to the Fraser River—at Mitchell Harbour, on the west coast of the Queen Charlotte Islands.

Mr. Osborn suggests that young men "capable of acquiring and applying a modicum of scientific knowledge" might go to the old placer mining camps resolved to trace "the gold of alluvial diggings to its source in the living rock." But Mr. Osborn does not allow his reader to forget the fur industry, which, after all, is the oldest source of wealth in Greater Canada. In conclusion, the philosopher, with his eye on future rack rents, may reasonably regret the system which admits of the acquisition of extensive and valuable freeholds in new colonies by private individuals. ## Fiction.

"My First Book."

The Gentleman from Indiana. By Booth Tarkington.
(Grant Richards. 6s.)

A Lady of the Regency. By Mrs. Stepney Rawson.
(Hutchinson. 6s.)

A Kent Squire. By F. W. Hayes. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

COMPLAINT is often made that, in the "rush" of modern literary production, the first books of new authors are bruised against the wall and trodden under foot, and that much promising merit is thereby stifled and lost. Further, it is stated that, established authors being perfectly capable of succouring themselves, literary criticism should direct its Samaritan attentions first and chiefly to the unestablished, not only out of kindness to the unestablished, but for the good of literature and mankind. We have here three first novels by three new novelists, carefully selected and upraised from the seething mass of the latest fiction, and the curious thing is that all three authors, in their respective ways, are likely to do well and achieve prosperity of sorts. Now it is a mistake to imagine, as many do, that a first novel usually bears the outward signs of being a first novel—marks of immaturity, ignorance, misdirected strength, or splendid error. The history of the great novelists supports this contention. Consider Waverley, Wuthering Heights, Treasure Island, and de Maupassant's Boule de Suif. Quite probably the average excellence of first novels is higher than the average excellence of second, third, tenth, or nth novels. Most authors spend themselves more lavishly upon the first book than upon any other. Time is nothing, trouble is nothing, expense of spirit is nothing—in the writing of that adored and marvellous volume. As regards the three novels named at the head of this article, no one could assert from internal evidence that they were the first-fruits of talent. It is by no means a case of the young idea timorously putting forth its pale green shoot. Therefore, the attitude of the critic towards them must be even as his attitude towards other novels, and not that of the old gentleman patting clever youngsters on the head.

He is indeed a bold reviewer who would pat Mr. Booth Tarkington on the head. For The Gentleman from Indiana has sold fifty thousand copies in America, and in unenthusiastic England has reached a second edition. It is of course an American novel. Mr. Tarkington takes the tiny township of Plattville, Carlow County, State of Indiana, and presents it to you with a decidedly attractive admixture of wit and sentiment. The reasons of his popularity are plain on the face of the book. The description of Plattville, with which the story opens, has an admirable verve, and shows also much fine observation. It is not the observation, however, but the rather pert and irresponsible wit that tells. "People did not come to Plattville to live, except through the inadvertency of being born there." Lo! a phrase which the reader can seize, laugh at, and remember. Having prepared his environment, Mr. Tarkington plants into it a hero at once heroic and lovable. John Harkless—"the great John Harkless" he was called at College—is really a charming character, not conceived at all on original lines, but nevertheless genuinely and forcefully conceived. It is the function of Harkless, journalist, to wake up Plattville, and he does so in a manner effectively dramatic. Plattville begins to move, and one of its first actions is to raise Harkless to the height of demi-god. The hero falls into love and into danger. Caught at last by the "White-Caps," those marauders whom he had tried to extinguish and whom the inhabitants of Plattville could not teach him to fear, he is witched away, and given up for dead. Naturally he arrives again, shaken but sound, and when he discovers that the heroine has been conducting his newspaper for him with extraordinary acumen and success, there is no alternative but a finale of orange-blossoms. Helen, this lady journalist, has the true heroine's strength and fascination. "When you saw her, or heard her, or managed to be around, anywhere she was, why, if you couldn't get up no hope of marryin' her, you wanted to marry somebody." (Another phrase!) The principal fault of Mr. Tarkington's novel is an occasional uncertainty in the handling of the narrative—a tendency to diffuseness, to go nowhere in particular. The merit of it lies in its sincerity, the richness of its imaginative inspiration, and its continual surprising wittiness. There is stuff in the book, and plenty of it. We may express the hope that Mr. Tarkington will perpend upon the question of style. His writing is loose and undistinguished, and he has scarcely even begun to put a valuation on words as words.

Mrs. Stepney Rawson, the author of A Lady of the Regency, is clearly a stylist by instinct. She has the literary temperament, which fondles words, and treats them like human beings (as they ought to be treated). In various respects, her novel is the most promising of the three before us. Decidedly, it is the most finished literary achievement, and the most ambitious in conception. Mrs. Rawson has occupied herself with an historical period unaccountably overlooked by novelists in search of fresh woods and pastures new—1800 to 1820. The central, but not the chief, personage of the story is the Regent's wife, Caroline of Brunswick, that figure which, to the haughty eyes of history, would be ridiculous were it not almost intolerably pathetic. June Cherie, the heroine, and the "lady" of the title, becomes a Court damsel after the ruin of the gigantic North Country squire her father, and the plot moves amid all the complicated mazes of Court intrigue. Mrs. Rawson has dealt royally with her royalties. She gives dignity even to Caroline, and her portrait of the Prince Regent is brilliant. Queen Charlotte and the Princess Charlotte are equally good. The scenes between the Prince Regent and June Cherie, between Caroline and that flawless gentleman Mr. Stephen Heseltine, and between Queen Charlotte and Mr. Frewin, are all executed in the true elevated romantic manner. In particular, the closing chapters of Caroline's futile career, and her exclusion from Westminster Abbey on Coronation Day, have a mournful dramatic impressiveness which sticks in the memory. A Lady of the Regency seems to us to be, in a special sense, the direct and honest expression of a literary individuality—an individuality sensitive, intense, and courageous. The characters are out of one mould; every one, good and bad, noble and despicable, has distinction; spectrum analysis would reveal the same prismatic colours in each. In short, all the acquired cautiousness of the reviewer cannot hinder us from asserting that A Lady of the Regency is a remarkable novel. It handles a large theme largely, it offers a complete picture of an epoch, and it does not once fail at a critical point. Perhaps it might with advantage have been a little shorter. We have not, for instance, discovered the exact raison d'être of Chapters X., XI., and XII., and we scarcely think that the early marriage of the heroine enters with sufficient usefulness into the scheme of motivation.

Mr. F. W. Hayes is much more hackneyed in subject and methods; but he appears to have in him the root of a popular success. He does again, but somewhat differently, what has been done a thousand times before. His subtitle—"Being a Record of Certain Adventures of Ambrose Gwynett, Esquire, of Thornhaugh"—must inevitably give pause to the reader satiated with conventional fantasies upon the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Mr. Hayes has immense fertility in the invention of incident, though none of his incident is precisely new, and his use of coincidence (see, for example, that on p. 162) is too free. The characters are for the most part stock figures, doing the usual feats, and uttering the usual sentiments. Take the soliloquy of that smooth villain, the Abbé Gaultier, on p. 20: "'So,' he said to himself venomously, 'it is M. Ambrose Gwynett of Thornhaugh—what devils of names!—who is in the way. All the worse for M. Ambrose Gwynett of Thornhaugh. Muriel Dorrington is for me, M. Gwynett—for me, Arnaud Gaultier, if a hundred of you stood in my way.'" From such a speech the whole novel might be deduced. Mr. Hayes's originality lies in his fixed determination not to be tedious, but to "cut the cackle and come to the 'osses." He has apparently tried to make his novel as much like a play as possible. No descriptions, no divagations, no neat little essays, but all action and rapid dialogue. If it is necessary to clear the ground, the ground is cleared by the characters themselves in dramatic converse. Playgoers will remember Sardou's old trick of beginning a scene with a couple of explanatory gossiping servants. This device is very well, used in moderation; but we think Mr. Hayes has carried it to excess. For the rest, his novel is distinctly readable, despite its length—444 close pages, and a sequel threatened!

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

VOICES IN THE NIGHT.

BY FLORA ANNIE STEEL.

Mrs. Steel's new story is a veritable warehouse of Indian goods. The story centres in the family of Sir George Arbuthnot, Lieut.-Governor of Nushapore. Plague and famine and superstition and treason play their parts, and the depths of Indian life, European and native, are plumbed. The spirit of the book is hinted at in these words of the Prologue: "The threatening voice paused as a dull reverberation shivered through the chill air. It was the first gun of the Imperial salute which every New Year's morning proclaims that Victoria, Kaiser-i-hind, reigns over the fog, and the voices in it . . . Between the beats of the guns the voices had their way unchecked. About what? 'That is a difficult question to answer when the voices are in the night.'" (Heinemann. 6s.)

LOVE AND MR. LEWISHAM.

BY H. G. WELLS.

Here Mr. Wells reverts to the quiet matter and manner of his Wheels of Chance. Mr. Lewisham is a young school-master who hangs a schema of work, and sundry splendid mottoes, on his bedroom walls, where he "could see them afresh every morning as his head came through his shirt." He is but eighteen when we meet him, and is thinking "little of Love, but much of Greatness." But Mr. Wells makes him think of love; makes him marry hastily; makes the schema turn yellow and crumpled; and makes us enjoy the humours and poignancies of a hasty marriage with its sweetness, squalor, and exclusion of Greatness from Mr. Lewisham's life. (Harper & Brothers. 6s.)

URSULA.

BY K. DOUGLAS KING.

Ursula's governess wrote of her when she was eight and a half: "She wishes to dominate me, and generally tries to take the lead in the household. . . . At present she walks like a young savage, and is absolutely ignorant. . . . When I asked her, sarcastically, if she could do anything, she replied with impertinent coolness: 'Well, I bet I can saddle my pony faster than Jim (the stable boy) can; and I cured our collie when he had fits, when even the vet. had given him up.'" Ursula has Russian relatives, goes to them, and has adventures in travel and love. A bright story. (Lane. 6s.)

THE FOOTFALL OF FATE.

BY MRS. J. H. RIDDELL.

A typical story of English life, by the author of The Senior Partner, and many other novels. Country-house people, London people, up-river people walk and talk at Abbotsmead. "Each day some fresh fact enlivened Abbotsmead. First it was bruited about that Foster had been commissioned to erect a temporary ballroom, and people asked: 'What! isn't Rosebank large enough?' . . . She engaged the Riverford String Band." (White & Co. 6s.)

LIFE'S TRIVIAL ROUND.

BY ROSA N. CAREY.

Miss Carey's new novel is in the minor domestic key which she has made her own. "I Take Possession of the Brown Parlour," "A Controversy about the West Room," "Hope Helps to Shell the Peas," and "I Take Possession of the Porch Room" are chapter headings which prepare us for the last, "The Chiming of Wedding Bells." (Hutchinson. 6s.)

GEORGE LINWOOD.

BY W. NAISMITH.

A kailyard story, full of ministers, and goodness, and etiquette. The author's fine writing makes for laughter. Two lovers on a sofa: "They sat thus—they took no note of time—their faces, sunbeams; their souls, suns—in silent ecstasy—perhaps the period in most human lives of the purest, sweetest ecstasy; they sat thus for the space of fifteen minutes, shining, and were so shining when Mrs. St. Clare, who had left the room when they had sat down together with the album, entered again." (Gardner. 6s.)

UNLEAVENED BREAD.

BY ROBERT GRANT.

A big study of American life, with the heroine's divorce proceedings early in the story. The local politics of Benham are the background to Selma White's principles and loves. "On the following day Lyons vetoed the Gas Bill" is not an inspiring sentence in itself, but it occurs in the rounding-off of an interesting story. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE CHICAMON STONE.

BY CLIVE PHILLIPS-WOOLLEY.

A gallant story of fortune-hunting in Alaska, with much of Indians and volcanoes thrown in, by the author of Gold, Gold in Cariboo. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

COLONIAL BORN.

BY G. FIRTH SCOTT.

A tale of the Queensland bush. The heroine, Aileen, is a typical colonial girl, a horsewoman and a fluent talker. Of gold-seeking life there is plenty in the chapters called "The Rout of Boulder Creek" and "The Sway of Gold." (Sampson Low. 6s.)

DANIEL HERRICK.

BY SIDNEY ROBERT BURCHELL.

The hero, who tells the story, is a news-writer of the reign of Charles II., and he becomes mixed up with a secret revolutionary party, and is sentenced to death. But Margery's happiness is not sacrificed. The King, Lady Castlemaine, and other ladies of the Court are introduced, and the historical basis of the story has been carefully laid. (Gay & Bird. 6s.)

ROBIN HOOD.

BY A. ALEXANDER.

"A romance of the English Forest." "S'death. . . . List! . . . 'Have at them!' . . . 'Good, my lord' . . . 'Thou sittest thy Saladin like a leech, but I jolt me up an' down like a popinjay.'" (Burleigh. 6s.)

THE THORN BIT.

BY DOROTHEA CONYERS.

"She puzzled for a moment, and then found the correct horsey terms for the bay's faults. 'Too leggy, and no bone,' she said discontentedly." These are typical sentences from this novel of fox-hunting, dancing, Queen's Hussars, and the Murphy girls. For motto, Mr. Kipling's:

Pleasant the snaffle of Courtship, improving the manners and carriage,

But the colt who is wise will abstain from the terrible thorn bit of Marriage.

(Hutchinson. 6s.)

The A.B.C. of Maeterlinck.

It were an easy matter to make fun of Maeterlinck. One has but to dwell upon peculiarities in the form of his expression, regardless of the spirit and meaning out of which they arise. This was done recently with some success in a review article.

Those who wish to approach Maeterlinck seriously, to know what he is and what he has to say, will not be deterred by superficial eccentricities. Take, for instance, the propensity of his dramatic characters to the repetition of words and phrases and exclamations. Who that has studied human nature has not observed its tendency in times of great soul stress to use over and over again the same simple words or exclamations until they become fraught with the awful significance of intense pain, of great passion, of supreme gladness? To quote instances of this in Shakespeare, where they are so many and so well known, were superfluous. But let anyone call up the closing scenes of "Othello," for example, and note the "iterance," as Othello himself calls it, when Emilia's amazement can find no other expression for a time than the repeated utterance of "My husband." Mark how Othello harps on a word and repeats an exclamation.

Of course, this sort of thing must be born of insight and feeling. When a writer, once having observed this tendency of an overwrought mind to repetition, resorts to it as a mechanical device for the conjuring up of an emotion which he does not feel, the effect is fatal. His work then ceases to be art: it degenerates into artifice. It has been charged against Maeterlinck that he does this. Perhaps it does sometimes seem that the situation is not sufficiently intense to make these repeated exclamations and observations quite natural.

It is not unfrequently the case that an artist feels a situation more strongly than he can vividly set it forth, and his expressions are then apt to be born rather of his own feeling of the situation than of the situation as presented to the spectator. In such a case he is to be charged with imperfect command over his material and of the vehicle of expression which he has chosen, but by no means with device and insincerity.

And there are in Maeterlinck many examples of this repetition being inevitable. That is to say, the dramatist has so entered into the heart of his characters that what he makes them say is what they could not but say; is, indeed, the natural and inevitable expression of themselves under given circumstances. Take, e.g., Selysette's repeated statement: "I was leaning over and I fell." She has sacrificed herself for the happiness of the other two. But, to secure the fruit of her sacrifice—the happiness of the others—they must not know that she has thrown herself down. Their joy in each other would be dashed by their remembrance of the price paid for it—the life of Selysette. But in great pain and with fast fading strength she cannot elaborate her explanation. By a sublime instinct she reserves her strength for the maintaining of her purpose. Her mind is fixed. No amount of pleading and persuasion can shake her resolution. In answer to all expostulations and appeals she quietly repeats: "I was leaning over and I fell. I was leaning over and I fell." This steadily-maintained prevarication reveals and illumines as nothing else could do the greatness and beauty of the simple and inarticulate soul of Selysette, beside whom Aglavaine, with all her fine speeches, becomes dwarfed, and Melleander is contemptible. And so in other instances that might be given, this repetition has such intense and revealing force, is so instinct with soul, that it can only be the offspring of that which it reveals.

It is not as an artist that Maeterlinck appeals to the majority of his readers. They do not greatly concern themselves with art. They are people who have their lives to live, their burdens to bear, their problems to solve, their appointed tasks to perform, their loves, their sorrows, their disappointments, and their temptations to go through with, and who withal have their desire for the grace and culture of life. What they feel after in a writer is not perfection of artistic form, but wisdom and guidance in daily life. It is to such people that Maeterlinck brings great help. How then does he help them? What has he to say to them? What, in a word, is Maeterlinck's gospel?

It is, after all, a very simple one and ancient. He preaches it with a new emphasis, sheds new light upon it, draws new and sometimes startling deductions from it; but it is in reality the everlasting gospel which one finds in all great religions, in all great poetry, and in all true philosophy, for Maeterlinck in drama and essay never ceases to preach the supremacy, the sufficiency, and the imperishable beauty of Soul. But so peculiarly has Maeterlinck made this region of the soul his home, and so remarkably has he set forth subtle and elusive phases and fleeting aspects of the soul, moods of the soul well-nigh inexpressible and tenses transitory as a dream, that what he says comes to us at times with almost the force of a new revelation. Because of this dealing with the soul, and with the more obscure movements of the soul, he has been called a mystic, more a mystic than an artist, with the assumption that mysticism is destructive of art. Great art has again and again been mystical, has again and again dwelt in the spell-bound twilight land which lies between the Known and the Unknown. Whether we call Maeterlinck a mystic or not depends on our definition of mysticism. In the present writer's understanding of the term he is a mystic, and is not, therefore, a worse artist nor a less reliable teacher.

But if any were to insist on his own definition of mysticism, and to say that a mystic is one who has lost his hold upon reality, who has shut his ears and closed his eyes to the actual, who has got drunk upon his own nerve fluid, deeming it the wine of God, who has become enamoured of the vagaries of his own brain, and watches it spin upon nothing, regarding its intoxicated gyrations as more momentous than the motion of the spheres, we should simply content ourselves with protesting that Maeterlinck is not a mystic, for he keeps his eyes steadily on facts: only they are not the facts which lie open to observation, but rather the shy facts of life which lurk in dim corners, which elude us in dark ancestral forests, which appear for a moment and then vanish down some long corridor of the mind, or drown themselves in some deep moat, or get locked within a gloomy fastness where the light of day never penetrates. Maeterlinck has made it his business to set on the servants of the soul to open the doors of these ancient castles and let in the day, to remove the barriers and investigate those dimly lighted corridors, to drag the moats and hunt in the forests. These doors are hard to open, they have been closed so long; and one is apt to get lost in these forests. But there is a reward: we find some new and beautiful ideal. For illustration let the reader consult again the first and second scenes of "Pelléas and Mélisande," where the Doorkeeper objects to open the door, and bids the servants: "Out by the little doors; out by the little doors; there are enough of them"; and where Goland, hunting a Beast through the forest to slay it, finds a Beauty that has lost its crown through excessive grief, as soul-beauty so often does; a Beauty that has come from far, far away, and that by so many has been hurt.

In The Treasure of the Humble and in Wisdom and Destiny we find the same earnest search after the hidden beauty and wisdom of the soul. It is this finding of the subtle ideas which vaguely haunt our souls day by day, expressed in clear and beautiful language in the essays or hinted at in strangely beautiful symbolism in the plays, which makes the reading of Maeterlinck for the first time so new and delightful an experience to those whose delight is in the inner world, and who are desirous to learn both how far this inner life influences the outer, and how to make its influence yet greater. Imagine a man dreaming frequently of certain places and people, vaguely recalling his dreams, yet dismissing them as vain and idle fancies, though they are shaping his daily life, then coming one day all unexpectedly upon the people and places of his dreams—how he would recognise them, how delight in them; how, beholding them clothed with dignity and beauty and all the marks of reality, while the things of his waking moments seem but the shadows and images of these, his faith in his dreams is strengthened—and you will form some idea of what Maeterlinck means to those who can understand him. Thoughts that have dwelt in unappreciated loveliness in the dark recesses of the mind; hopes and aspirations which have flitted like fairies in the pale moonlight of the soul have been gently seized and firmly held by Maeterlinck, and are allowed to reveal themselves, their eternal reality, and their high office.

The soul, he tells us, knows no distinctions of great and small in events or circumstances. To it the kiss of two lovers is as great an occasion as the wreck of an empire or the creation of a people. Out of one or the other it can draw inspiration. The joys and sorrows of the household, the smile of a child, the tears of an old man, quite as much as the affairs of a nation, are the doors and windows through which the soul can reveal to us the Infinite. Why wait for a bolt to shoot out of the blue ere we are awakened? Why wait for great sorrows, great events, great joys, great occasions? The force that makes the bolt dwells in all things, is moving around us and within us constantly. We have but to learn how to approach it, how to manipulate it, and every day, every hour may become great.

Things Seen.

The Beggar.

I PEERED through the rain-covered windows, and saw the early-lit street lamps shine tremulously in the raw damp atmosphere.

An old man was slowly walking up the hill, and at each house he knocked, waiting patiently till the door was opened, and then, as if he were briefly dismissed, turning as patiently away to recommence his task.

He was decently clad, and in no way resembled the ordinary beggar. His hair was white and dishevelled, and his aspect was one of pathetic, hopeless poverty.

A sudden pity stirred my heart.

I drew the coppers from my purse and waited, for surely he would not miss my door. He had as yet missed no house in the road.

How tired and downcast he looked as he paused for a moment at the gate, evidently debating his chance.

Why did I not tap the window-pane?

He passed my house, and a dull surprise, a paralysing torpor, stole over me, as with fascinated gaze I watched him pass by, his shadowy bent figure gradually fading from my sight.

From the Well Deck.

SHEER joy of life illuminated her rugged, labour-weary face; the hard lines of her brow smoothed wonderfully; her mouth was twisted in strenuous effort not to smile; yet the causes of her pleasure were so small! To us, the first class passengers on board s.s. C — Castle, "Southwards-bound," it seemed sufficiently pathetic that to win the third prize in the egg-and-spoon race of ship's sports should cause a triumph so abundant, a jubilation so supreme, in this one third class competitor.

Prize-giving day came laggingly, she with it at an early hour. Long before the time announced upon the programme, we saw her skip up the "companion" from the well-deck, a plain, squat, elderly, unattractive woman, dressed in her every-day skirt of much patched cotton—I think it was her only one—and a maroon flannel blouse. Her battered straw hat, limp from tropical use, was worn on one side with a certain jauntiness; her face was aflame with heated expectation; red nervous fingers gripped and twisted a grimy handkerchief as she leant up against the rail, cheek by jowl with the daughter of a marquis, and facing a duke—on this, perhaps, the one proud moment of her life.

One by one the winners' names were called, the rewards apportioned. The egg-and-spoon race was low down on the list. As the cheers rang out the old woman's joy rose in ascending scale; she shook with excitement; her breath came gustily; her eyes were eager, anxious, alive with expectation.

At last!

"The winners of the egg-and-spoon race are: 1st, Lady —; secondly, Mrs. A —."

No third prize?

At first we could not believe our ears. Nor could she. She looked at us, the assembled crowd, with the scared expression of a scolded child; she caught at the rail to steady herself; her jaw dropped; a shutter fell on the joy of her face. Someone said "Hush!" beneath his breath as the cheers re-echoed when Lady — stepped forward to receive her fourth first prize.

The first shock over, the old woman nerved herself to turn away. Very old she seemed as she looked timidly upon the steep "companion" she had scaled so cheerily an hour before. . . . There had been witnesses of the incident. There were hurried whisperings, exchanges, consultations. As the woman turned drearily, the voice of the hon. secretary rang out with special clearness: "We regret that the announcement of the winner of the third prize in the egg-and-spoon race was unfortunately omitted. Mrs. Garlick, please come and take your prize."

How we cheered!

Wind and City.

WHEN I revisit, on a night of stars,
The encampment old and foul of London's horde
And pierce the smoke of sluggish lusts and wars
Still from that blotch of lath and plaster poured,
How do I rage that in a blast more keen
I from Fate's mountain trumpet am not blown
And all this dingy frailty bestrown
With "Strike tents, millions, let your lair be clean!"
With what a glee would I divide the swarm!
A third should soar and whistle to the veldt
To feel the ancestral sun—a third should melt
Into honeyed forest far—and a third storm
Settle on Andes: but the morrow here
Should find the brow of Ludgate green and clear.

HERBERT TRENCH.

Mathilde Blind's Poetry.*

MISS BLIND was a copious and apparently fluent—too fluent—writer. Her collected poems are equal, or nearly equal, in bulk to the collected poems of Shelley; and they have all Shelley's fatal facility, and Shelley's love for diffuseness. It does not need the evidence of Dr. Garnett's memoir to tell us that the poet of "Prometheus Unbound" was a chief influence with her. But there the resemblance ceases. In texture the poems are very different; there is nothing of Shelley's opulent imagination or fecund imagery. We cannot find any evidence that Miss Blind's "fundamental brain-power" (as Rossetti called it) in poetry exceeded that of numerous female writers less voluminous and less noticed. The impression made upon us is one of ambitious mediocrity—could we find a less harsh term we would use it. Yet it is precisely upon this fundamental substance that Dr. Garnett insists. We do not deny that there is brain-power, of a kind, in "The Ascent of Man" and other poems which could be named. But it belongs rather to the prose-thinker than the poet, to the rationalising faculty than to the imaginative intuition. That (as Dr. Garnett relates) it should captivate a man of science we can well understand; but no overlaying with poetic forms and description can make that poetic which was not conceived through the imagination, or hide the secret of its birth. The true poet does not think first and imagine afterwards, but the processes are indissolubly blended ab initio. In regard to form, Dr. Garnett admits that Miss Blind was deficient, and laments the preoccupation, with truth, which left her indifferent to artistic externalities. But, apart from the fact that a poet indifferent to art is scarce thinkable (however impetuosity may betray him into negligences of art, or defective taste blind him to lapses in art), there seems to us in Miss Blind something more than carelessness of or indifference to form. There seems something like an incapacity to sing, a lack of the instinct which "voluntary moves harmonious numbers." Otherwise the shaping spirit would sometimes take the matter into its own hands, compelling the reluctant verse to momentary loveliness of perfect form—as happens frequently with poets the most admittedly negligent of art. But this, we are bound to say, we do not find in Miss Blind; and the absence of it confirms us in the impression derived from the manner and movement of her verse.

"The Ascent of Man" is Miss Blind's longest and most ambitious poem; an apotheosis of evolution, which Dr. Garnett allows to be a failure, but a fine failure. For ourselves, we cannot see the touches of redeeming sublimity which he discerns in this chaotic and tense rather than intense poem. At its most effortful it is strained and excited—a painfully obvious striving beyond the poet's power. Its more level passages simply leave us cold. Here are some stanzas in which the author has put forth all her power:

Constellated suns, fresh lit, declining,
Were ignited now, now quenched in space,
Rolling round each other, or inclining
Orb to orb in multicoloured rays.
Ever showering from their flaming fountains
Light, more light, on each far-circling earth,
Till life stirred crepuscular seas, and mountains
Heaved convulsive with the throes of birth.
And the noble brotherhood of planets,
Knitted each to each by links of light,
Circled round their suns, nor knew a minute's
Lapse or languor in their ceaseless flight.
And pale moons and suns and burning splinters
Of wrecked worlds swept round their parent spheres,
Clothed with spring or sunk in polar winters
As their sun draws nigh or disappears.

* The Poetical Works of Mathilde Blind. With a Memoir by Richard Garnett. (Unwin.)

In this crowd of words and colours and sound there is no one great and original phrase or idea which imposes itself on the mind at once. A few choric lines of Shelley would pale it all. In her less ambitious narrative poems Miss Blind can write pleasant descriptive passages, but without magic. Thus in "The Teamster":

Sam came a-courting while the year was blithe,
When wet-browed mowers, stepping out in tune,
With level stroke and rhythmic swing of scythe,
Smote down the proud grass in the pomp of June,
And wagons, half-tipped over, seemed to sway
With loads of hay.

But taken as wholes, they leave little impression, for she has no power over the emotions. For like reason, and from her lack of form, she is not successful in the brief lyric, though she has written much in this, as in all kinds. The sonnet Dr. Garnett judges one of her most successful fields, and two especially he singles out for excellence: the sonnet to "The Dead," and the almost equally impressive "Cleave Thou the Waves." In "The Dead" we have a sonnet really fine in substance, original in imagery, not undeserving of Dr. Garnett's phrase, "majestic."

The dead abide with us! Though stark and cold Earth seems to grip them, they are with us still:
They have forged our chains of being for good or ill,
And their invisible hands these hands yet hold.
Our perishable bodies are the mould
In which their strong imperishable will—Mortality's deep yearning to fulfil—
Hath grown incorporate through dim time untold.
Vibrations infinite of life in death,
As a star's travelling light survives its star!
So may we hold our lives that when we are
The fate of those who then will draw their breath,
They shall not drag us to their judgment bar,
And curse the heritage which we bequeath.

Note especially the strong image in the second line of the sestet. Yet even this sonnet seems rather forced into metre than to have moulded the metre to itself: it moves like a hay-wain under the load of thought; and we have sought vainly for another as fine. We may agree with Dr. Garnett that these poems show "energy, enthusiasm, aspiration towards the higher things." But, without high imagination, emotional power, or grace of form, those qualities are insufficient for vital poetry; and we cannot think that Miss Blind's place in poetry will be high.

Correspondence.

Mr. Andrew Lang and Myself on the Supremacy of Fiction.

SIR,—Mr. Lang accuses me of ignoratio elenchi. I dare counter-charge him with petitio principii. My elliptical sentences have fallen a prey to his humour and criticism. He has crushed me, though not my argument. The meaning of the following line "entirely escapes" Mr. Lang: "This taste of the crowd neither augments nor diminishes the number of serious readers—unless, indeed, towards reading at all." In other words, taste for light literature may augment the potential number of serious readers by imparting an inclination to read. My sense was clear if my sentence was elliptical. Mr. Lang asks, next, "equally greater than what?" Equally greater than nothing, but greater equally with the number of those who read novels of a paltry value. But criticism of my phraseology is not an answer to my argument. When Mr. Lang turns to that, he after all sides with me against himself. "I would liefer have written Old Mortality or Edmond than all the works of Locke." If my stumbling English has drawn that from Mr. Lang after his article in the Westminster, I can but say that I have won my case, and that I will bear with being called "a lady controversialist." By the by, is a man who differs from another on some point, and expresses that difference, "a gentleman controversialist"? I suppose so, and yet . . .—I am, &c.,

FRANCES FORBES-ROBERTSON.

P.S.—I think that a great work of fiction will outlive any historical or philosophical effort, no matter by whom, and is of more value, for the reason that with time history loses vital interest, even significance, and philosophy grows obsolete at last, or becomes a summary of truisms we hardly care to peruse. However fine, historic or philosophical works remain, after all, but glorified school books, to be edited away to nothingness when a later age must fail to grasp their meaning. Let Mr. Lang look through his immense storehouse of knowledge and note how the fiction of antiquity remains the dominant key. Prince Prigio will doubtless be read when many "more serious" writings will be wholly forgotten.

Balzac.

MONSIEUR LE DIRECTEUR,—Ignorant malheureusement la langue anglaise, je viens seulement d'apprendre la publication dans le ACADEMY du 5 courant de l'article relatif aux lettres de Balzac, et je m'empresse de vous remercier pour la façon dont, en ce qui me concerne, vous avez apprécié les faits.

Je n'ai pas actuellement le loisir d'approfondir et de discuter toutes ces histoires de falsifications de textes, qui d'ailleurs ne me regardent en rien, étant très antérieures à mes travaux personnels, les seuls dont j'aie à répondre. Je me contenterai donc de vous affirmer que je possède, parmi beaucoup d'autres lettres autographes de Balzac :

1. Tout ce qui a été retrouvé de sa correspondance autographe avec Mme. Hanska, c'est à dire les Lettres à l'Etrangère.

2. L'autographe de la lettre à Mme. Surville du samedi 12 (Octobre 1833), dont le texte cité par moi page 79 d'Un Roman d'Amour, est absolument conforme à celui de l'original. En conséquence, rien ne m'est plus facile que de produire la preuve indiscutable de l'exactitude de cette citation.

Il en est de même pour le fragment de la Quotidienne reproduit dans mon livre, car il suffit de consulter la collection de ce journal pour constater que les lignes en question sont extraites, comme je l'ai dit, du numéro du 9 Décembre, 1832. Cette date aussi est donc incontestable, et la première lettre de Balzac à Mme. Hanska est bien de Janvier 1833.

Quant au renseignement relatif à un prétendu incendie ayant éclaté à Moscou, dans lequel la plus grande partie des lettres de Balzac à Mme. Hanska aurait péri, ce renseignement n'a été fourni que par la veuve de Balzac elle-même, et ce n'est que d'après ses instructions qu'il a été livré jadis au public. La preuve qu'il est de tous points contraire à la vérité, c'est que la plupart de ces lettres soi-disant brûlées sont à cette heure entre mes mains.

Enfin, ainsi que je le fais savoir en toute occasion—M. Jules Huret l'imprimait encore dans le Figaro du 2 Mars dernier—je ne suis absolument pour rien dans la mise au jour des Lettres à l'Etrangère. Mon rôle s'est exclusivement donné à remettre à l'éditeur une copie de ces lettres, exécutée et collationnée par moi-même. Par conséquent, s'il existe des différences entre les autographes et le texte publié, ceci m'est absolument étranger.

Du reste, je m'étonne on ne peut plus qu'avant de mettre au jour tous ces racontars et d'y mêler mon nom, l'auteur de la traduction anglaise de ces Lettres, n'ait pas songé d'abord à s'adresser à moi directement. C'est été, ce me semble, le meilleur moyen de se faire renseigner exactement, et d'obtenir la preuve ou l'authenticité absolue des textes cités dans mes ouvrages.

Je vous autorise, Monsieur le Directeur, à publier cette lettre, si cela peut vous être agréable, et je vous prie de trouver ici l'expression de mes sentiments distingués.

VICOMTE DE SPOELBERCH DE LOVENJOL.

Paris : 25 Mai, 1900.

[The "fragment" from the Quotidienne newspaper, to which M. de Lovenjoul refers, is Balzac's private advertisement, inserted by him in response to the request contained in Mme. de Hanska's first letter.—ED.]

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

A TREASURY OF CANADIAN VERSE.

ED. BY THEODORE H. RAND.

This book is welcome at sight. It appears to be an exhaustively representative selection of Canadian verse, "selected from the entire field of our history." Here are reflected the aspects of nature in Canada in all the seasons, the aspirations of a young country, and "Anglo-centric conceptions and aspirations, divining with poetic insight the coming good." (Dent. 4s. 6d. net.)

NATURE IN DOWNLAND.

BY W. H. HUDSON.

Mr. Hudson is one of our most popular ornithological writers, and the author of Birds in London. Here he is engaged with Sussex, a county for which writers of charm have done little. Leaving geology severely alone, Mr. Hudson takes us over the smooth surface of the Downs, chatting of their "animal and vegetable forms, from the point of view of the lover of nature, and, in a moderate degree, of the field naturalist." (Longmans. 10s. 6d. net.)

HYMNS OF THE GREEK CHURCH.

TRANSLATED BY
REV. JOHN BROWNLIE.

When, thirty-eight years ago, Dr. John Mason Neal published his Hymns of the Eastern Church, he wrote: "And while fully sensible of their imperfections, I may yet, by way of excuse rather than of boast, say, almost in Bishop Hall's words:

I first adventure: follow me who list,
And be the second Eastern Melodist."

Mr. Brownlie has accepted the challenge, and here gives us translations of some of the beautiful hymns in the Greek Church service books. A scholarly introduction is prefixed to the hymns, which number about fifty. (Oliphant. 2s.)

BYRON'S WORKS.

VOL. III.

ED. BY ERNEST HARTLEY COLERIDGE.

This volume of the definitive edition of Byron contains "The Giaour," "The Bride of Abydos," "The Corsair," "Lara," "The Siege of Corinth," "Parisina," the "Hebrew Melodies," and a number of short poems. A portrait of Byron in an Albanian costume, from a picture in the possession of Mr. Murray, forms the frontispiece. (Murray. 6s.)

In addition to the foregoing, we have received :

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 36 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best quatrain on a writer, in the nature of a personal tribute. The response has been good. We have decided that the prize is due to Miss L. C. Jack, 5, Quadrant, North Berwick, for the following tribute to

JOHN RUSKIN.

Greener is the green, and bluer is the blue,
Truer seems the Good, and the Beautiful more true,
Lovelier far is love, and life a second birth,
Since thou, O little child of God, wast master of my worth.

The two next best quatrains are these by Miss Gertrude Newstead, Clifton, and Miss Elizabeth F. Stevenson, Newcastle-on-Tyne :

BROWNING.

Greatheart among us pilgrims, thou dost move
"The baffled to fight better," urge the strong
To worthier effort; brave faith, boundless love
For man, in God, the burden of thy song.

[G. N.]

HORACE.

Moulder of metres and of words made fit
For mellow thoughts whose fame the ages keep,
Beneath thy Roman calm, thy balanced wit,
Our modern spirit stirs, and cannot sleep.

[E. F. S.]

Other answers are :

WORDSWORTH.

Master, the world is too much with us still,
The din, the tumult, and the jostling rude!
We need with thee to climb the morning hill,
And breathe thy spirit's vaster amplitude.

[T. B. D., Bridgwater.]

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

Of art and life the master, deep within
My heart, I keep thy axiom, sweet and clear;
Not vainly to strive in leading men from sin,
But doing all for happiness while here

[H. P. B., Glasgow.]

MILTON.

Milton, the task was yours to "justify
The ways of God to men": you deftly trod
The journey whose accomplishment were nigh
To justify the ways of men to God.

[C. E. H., Richmond.]

S. AUGUSTINE.

Goethe's clear brain, plus Gordon's scorn of self,
O, son of Monica, were thy double dower:
In heavenward life, and daily death to self,
Aid me to share the secret of thy power!

[R. F. McC., Whitby.]

SHAKESPEARE.

What gladsome flutterings from baser earth
My soul hath lifted, after thine to look;
What tears of pity and what draughts of mirth
My heart hath drawn, O Shakespeare, from thy book!

[S. W., Cathcart.]

JOHN DAVIDSON.

Spirit, that builds Love's walls and architrave,
Of colours, music, self the corner stone:
Honour to hearts as manly brave,
As woman-sweet as is thine own!

[H. R. S., Newcastle-on-Tyne.]

SHAKESPEARE.

In Homer's, Dante's, Milton's verse the measured roll
Keeps equal state monotonous: the poet's soul
Is, Wordsworth, thine; the sound we yield, oh, Keats, to thee:
Thou, Shakespeare, bear'st all palms, and each immortally.

[T. C., Buxted.]

CHRISTINA ROSSETTI.

I will build a monument unto her glory,
A monument of gentle deeds and love;
I will raise it up from story unto story,
In gratitude to her who taught us love.

[S. M., Addiscombe.]

TENNYSON.

When life's long burden hangeth heavily,
I muse that thou hast lived, beloved guide;
And when I meet my death, so let me be Content to die, Master, for thou hast died.

[E. M., West Smithfield.]

EMERSON.

"The soul can be trusted to the end."
"Trust thy soul! pure, God-filled, true!"
The dulled word rang out minted new;
And two worlds saw a fading truth
Restored by thee to glowing youth.

[C. M. D., London.]

TO SHAKESPEARE, ENSPHERED.

Might but one ray of that "particular star"
Which is thy crown and high prerogative,
Pierce to the herd uncrowned who gaze afar,
My soul with thine should laugh, and love, and live.

[M. A. W., London.]

THE BURGESS OF STRATFORD.

One of the people; at the people's call
To act, to vamp, to travel, to procure;
Separate and vast; in some sort through it all
By being of the people to endure.

[C. S. O., London.]

WORDSWORTH.

To read the meaning 'neath the outward show,
Thy high illumined message well hath taught,
But, better far, through thee we come to know
The deep abiding happiness of thought.

[S. C.]

VIRGIL.

Master, what muse thy verse with magic dowers,
The rich, sad tone that to our memory clings?
Thy face was set to applaud the conquering hours,
But in thy voice were tears for human things.

[J. H. F., Clifton.]

JOHN RUSKIN.

The golden bowl is broken! mute Despair
Moans o'er the glittering dust in vain!
The silver cords are loosened! Shall frail Air
Retouch them into life again?

[W. M. R., Manchester.]

OMAR KHAYYAM.

O far above the clanging bells of strife
And throb of pulses beating out their day,
Some ceaseless echo vibrates thro' my life
Omar, since first I hearkened to thy lay!

[Z. McC., Whitby.]

Competition No. 37 (New Series).

In this week's competition the following witty stanza was sent in by Mrs. F. L. Anderson, of Ealing :

JANE AUSTEN.

Dear Maiden Aunt of Letters, faultless Jane,
Pattern precise, prim critic of our sex,
What would you say—could you come back again—
Of Zaza, Nana, and the Gay Lord Quex?

Obviously this had no chance of the prize, for it is an epigram, not an eulogy. But it may serve as a model for another competition. We offer a prize of One Guinea for the best epigrammatic verse of four lines connecting an old author with the present day.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, June 5. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the third column of p. 476, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

The Literary Week.

WE feel impelled to apologise to our readers from time to time for the evidences which we furnish from week to week in our "Notes on Novels" of the appalling quantities of poor novels which are poured forth. We wonder more and more why such novels are written, why they are published, whether they are read, and whither they go. And our wonder is always interrupted by the arrival of new fatuities. Into one of the newest we dip, and read:

He felt that he must do something towards ascertaining his fate with Florence; so, taking his fate in his hands, he moved his chair into closer proximity to hers, and, in a tone of voice which not a little betrayed his agitation, he asked, "Would I offend you, or be presuming too much, if I called you Florence instead of Miss Montgomery? It would make me happy just to be permitted that liberty. You will not deny me that—will you, Florence?"

"Why should it make you happier to call me Florence than to call me by my society cognomen? I'm sure it can't make any difference to you? Will I play something to you now, Mr. Haldane: aunt will not be pleased, you know, if I don't?" . . . Florence was silent and perfectly motionless, except that her head drooped more, and her hands, which lay on her lap, were clasped tighter than usual, and her bosom heaved more than ordinary respiration warranted.

To the pages of the New Review Mr. George Wyndham, the Under Secretary for War, contributed a critical essay on Mr. Stephen Crane. This appreciation was reprinted as the introductory chapter to a volume called Pictures of War, containing "The Red Badge of Courage," "The Little Regiment," and other shorter stories by Mr. Crane. Mr. Wyndham is enthusiastic about Mr. Crane: "He has painted a picture [in 'The Red Badge of Courage'] that challenges comparison with the most vivid scenes of Tolstoi's La Guerre et la Paix or of Zola's La Débâcle."

You may shut the book, but you still see the battle-flags "jerked about madly in the smoke," or sinking with "dying gestures of despair," the men "dropping here and there like bundles"; the captain shot dead with "an astonished and sorrowful look as if he thought some friend had done him an ill turn"; and the litter of corpses, "twisted in fantastic contortions," as if "they had fallen from some great height, dumped out upon the ground from the sky." The book is full of sensuous impressions that leap out from the picture: of gestures, attitudes, grimaces, that flash into portentous definition, like faces from the climbing clouds of nightmare. It leaves the imagination bounded with a "dense wall of smoke, furiously alit and slashed by the knife-like fire from the rifles." It leaves, in short, such indelible traces as are left by the actual experience of war.

HAD Mr. Crane lived, it was arranged that he should sail to St. Helena as the correspondent of the Morning Post. He has left a volume of short stories which may be called Wounds in the Rain, and a long novel of adventure. An article on Mr. Crane's work will be found on another page.

MISS KINGSLEY has gone, and we who are left have to mourn the loss of a good comrade, and one with an honest, kindly nature. When the time comes to appreciate her scientific work it will probably be seen that she lacked the time to co-ordinate the facts that she was quick to observe and resolute to collect. But on literature she has certainly left her mark. She possessed the rare gift of a perfectly original and distinctive style. Curiously enough, it had nothing about it that one is accustomed to associate with the word "feminine," and many must have been astonished to find that the "stinging and bitterly cheerful irony" on which M. Marillier complimented her was the production of the prim and staid maiden lady that Miss Kingsley really was. She possessed, indeed, much of Swift's sardonic power without either his misanthropy or his love of the unmentionable, and one has to go back to the great classics to find any writer who might have served her for a model. With more animal spirits than Lucian, she had less of his cynicism; and perhaps it is only in Rabelais that we find her parallel. Yet she could never have studied the master in the original, for, although a good German scholar, she assured the present writer that she could not read a line of French; and much of the Pantagruel would have been repulsive to her. One wonders whether Charles Kingsley, who was fond of Rabelais, can have initiated her into the mysteries of the Sage of Meudon.

MR. WILLIAM WATSON contributed the following to last week's Speaker:

Friend, call me what you will: no jot care I:
I that shall stand for England till I die.
England! The England that rejoiced to see
Hellas unbound, Italy one and free;
The England that had tears for Poland's doom,
And in her heart for all the world made room;
The England from whose side I have not swerved;
The immortal England whom I too have served,
Accounting her all living lands above,
In justice and in mercy and in love.

Half-a-dozen titles could be found to suit these fine lines. If there is anything left in the world that would make a "gentleman in khaki" start, it would be to learn that Mr. Watson's title is "On Being Styled a Pro-Boer."

WE take the following from the Daily Chronicle:

A curious literary and artistic quarrel is in the air, and may even reach the Law Courts. In a popular magazine there appears a story which bears in plot a resemblance to Mr. Ansley's The Giant's Robe. The hero—or villain—is a young poet who suggests a well-known writer. The artist who has illustrated the story has quite inadvertently drawn a speaking likeness, not only of the writer in question, but also of his publisher. Naturally, a certain amount of annoyance has been caused. Perhaps the most curious thing about the matter is that the author of the story, the artist, the poet, and the publisher are all well acquainted with each other.

The aggrieved author, we understand, is Mr. Le Gallienne. The astonished publisher, we understand, is Mr. Harmsworth.

MR. ALFRED SUTRO's literary services to M. Maeterlinck have been so great that it is not surprising to find them reciprocated in kind. Mr. Sutro has written a play of modern life in four acts called The Cave of Illusion (Grant Richards) and M. Maeterlinck, whose Aglaraine and Selysette is advertised on the page facing the title-page, writes a thirteen-page Preface. This Preface is in French. In its opening paragraphs M. Maeterlinck talks at large about English literature of the second half of the nineteenth century. He thinks that the only tragedy produced in that period that will not fall into oblivion is Mr. Swinburne's Atalanta in Calydon. In poetry:

Depuis la période romantique anglaise et française, si je mets à part les poèmes de Wagner qui n'appartiennent pas à la littérature proprement dite, mais à la musique—quelle est la pièce poétique qui ait réellement vécu, qui nous ait révélé dans les actions et les passions des hommes une beauté, une grandeur ou un charme lyrique inconnus? Quelle est celle qui ait marqué dans l'histoire littéraire, qui ait eu une influence durable et dont on se souvienne? Si l'on m'interrogeait sérieusement sur ce point je ne pourrais guère citer que Pippa Passes de Browning, et encore faudrait-il dire que ce poème ne demeure poème tout en étant neuf, réel et actuel, que parce qu'il n'est pas à proprement parler une pièce de théâtre, attendu qu'il est probablement impossible de le porter sur la scène.

WHILE M. Maeterlinck talks thus of tragedy in the past, Mr. W. L. Courtney is telling us, in his reprinted lectures on The Idea of Tragedy in Ancient and Modern Drama (Constable), that there is hope. Indeed, he thinks that in "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" we have a play which is "a true tragedy in form, manner, and style. We stand too close to it at present to see its true proportions, and the real issue disappears because it is classed, not only among other plays of his [Mr. Pinero's], but superficially described as a study after the model of Ibsen. In form it is much more like a play of the school of Dumas the younger. . . . The character of Paula Tanqueray is one of the most triumphant creations which has ever been composed for the stage." Mr. Pinero returns these compliments strenuously in a "Prefatory Note to the Author."

MR. EDWARD CLODD's memoir of Mr. Grant Allen is a book which will be read with peculiar interest and sympathy by those who write for a living. For to that hard occupation Mr. Allen had to bend his energies. His mental equipment was almost too fine and various; and the force of circumstances continually made him write, as it were, from only a part of his nature. Yet few men, in the end, have delivered their souls more completely. Mr. Clodd gives in facsimile Mr. Allen's answer to someone who had asked him for his favourite quotation. He wrote:

I don't know that any phrase or quotation has ever been of much use to me in life, but the two passages most frequently on my lips are probably these:

"What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul."

"To live by law,
Acting the law we live by without fear,
And, because right is right, to follow right
Were wisdom in the scorn of consequence."

On the title-page of the memoir, which, by the way, is of just the right length, we have this text from 1 Kings iv.:

He spake of trees, from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall: he spake also of beasts and of fowl and of creeping things and fishes.

He spake of much else besides.

Munsey's Magazine has started an English career, at the price of sixpence, and under the care of Messrs. Horace Marshall & Son, and a capital sixpence-worth of literature it is. Sir Walter Besant discourses on "My Favourite Novelist and his Best Book." The novelist is Mark Twain, the book Huckleberry Finn:

I lay it down as one of the distinctive characteristics of a good story that it pleases—or rather, seizes—every period of life; that the child, and his elder brother, and his father, and his grandfather, may read it with like enjoyment—not equal enjoyment, because as a man gets older and understands more and more what the world of men and women means, he reads between the lines and sees things which the child cannot see and cannot understand. . . . The first quality that I claim for this book, then, is that it does appeal to all ages and every age. The boy of twelve reads it with delight beyond his power of words to express; the young man reads it; the old man reads it. The book is a joy to all alike. For my own part, I have read it over and over again, yet always with delight and always finding something new in its pages.

Another article in Munsey's, which, no doubt, the Munsey readers will think tip-top," is called "Beezie, the Successful Maid: The Story of a Housemaid who was Born a Genius in her Line, as surely as Mozart and Millet were in Theirs, and how She brought Comfort and Delight into a Troubled Household."

MR. ARTHUR SYMONS's article on Ernest Dowson in the current Fortnightly Review may be read with interest for its revelation of a strange corner of the literary world. We would not imply, however, that it has not stronger claims to be read. Mr. Symons's tribute to his friend is genuine, and has moving passages of narrative and striking ones of criticism:

He did not realise that he was going to die, and was full of projects for the future, when the £600 which was to come to him from the sale of some property should have given him a fresh chance in the world; began to read Dickens, whom he had never read before, with singular zest; and, on the last day of his life, sat up talking eagerly till five in the morning. At the very moment of his death he did not know that he was dying. He tried to cough, could not cough, and the heart quietly stopped.

Of Dowson's life in London we have some curious and unexpected glimpses:

I think I may date my first impression of what one calls "the real man" . . . from an evening in which he first introduced me to those charming supper-houses, open all night through, the cabmen's shelters. . . . He invited us to supper, we did not quite realise where, and the cabman came in with us, as we were welcomed, cordially and without comment, at a little place near the Langham; and, I recollect, very hospitably entertained. . . . Dowson was known there, and I used to think he was always at his best in a cabmen's shelter. Without a certain sordidness in his surroundings, he was never quite comfortable, never quite himself; and at those places you are obliged to drink nothing stronger than coffee or tea. I liked to see him occasionally, for a change, drinking nothing stronger than coffee or tea. . . . But I have never known him when he could resist either the desire or the consequences of drink. . . . He drank the poisonous liquors of those pot-houses which swarm about the Docks; he drifted about in whatever company came in his way; he let heedlessness develop into a curious disregard of personal tidiness. In Paris, Les Halles took the place of the Docks. At Dieppe, where I saw so much of him one summer, he discovered strange, squalid haunts about the harbour, where he made friends with amazing innkeepers, and got into rows with the fishermen who came in to drink after midnight. At Brussels, where I was with him at the time of the Kermesse, he flung himself into all that riotous Flemish life, with a zest for what was most sordidly riotous in it. It was his own way of escape from life.

IN Mr. Symons's opinion Ernest Dowson epitomised himself in the following lyric: "a lyric which is certainly one of the greatest lyrical poems of our time." The Cynara of the poem is doubtless the young girl, the daughter of a French restaurant keeper, to whom Dowson wrote most of his verse.

Last night, ah, yesternight, betwixt her lips and mine,
There fell thy shadow, Cynara! thy breath was shed
Upon my soul between the kisses and the wine;
And I was desolate and sick of an old passion,

Yea, I was desolate and bowed my head:
I have been faithful to thee, Cynara! in my fashion.

All night upon mine heart I felt her warm heart beat,
Night-long within mine arms in love and sleep she lay;
Surely the kisses of her bought red mouth were sweet;
But I was desolate and sick of an old passion,

When I awoke and found the dawn was grey:
I have been faithful to thee, Cynara! in my fashion.

I have forgot much, Cynara! gone with the wind,
Flung roses, roses riotously with the throng,
Dancing, to put thy pale, lost lilies out of mind;
But I was desolate and sick of an old passion,

Yea, all the time, because the dance was long:
I have been faithful to thee, Cynara! in my fashion.

I cried for madder music and for stronger wine,
But when the feast is finished and the lamps expire,
Then falls thy shadow, Cynara! the night is thine;
And I am desolate and sick of an old passion,

Yea, hungry for the lips of my desire:
I have been faithful to thee, Cynara! in my fashion.

In the current Blackwood Mr. G. S. Streat has a light, clever article on "Sheridan and Mr. Shaw." But the title should have been "Congreve, Sheridan, and Mr. Shaw." Here is a remark:

Sheridan's weakness is his lack of ideas; Mr. Shaw's weakness is his superabundance of them. Congreve's ideas come naturally from the play of his characters, and out of the fulness of his experience; Mr. Shaw's ideas have come in at all cost, and character and experience may go hang. It seems that in whatever he writes he must introduce his whole philosophy.

Another is this:

The greatest writers of comedy could use normal characters and make them dramatic, entertaining, or what they willed. Sheridan was not one of them, and he was content to exploit eccentricity. Mr. Shaw is not one of them (at present), and his eye is for eccentricity exclusively. He thinks it is not, as one of his characters would say, but it is. Even the characters he designs to be normal and a contrast to his eccentrics he makes eccentrically normal. Consequently in this respect—and it is most important—one's amusement in seeing his plays is just the same as one's amusement would have been in seeing Sheridan's, if one had been Sheridan's contemporary.

In reviewing Mrs. Meynell's book on Ruskin, last week, we could not find space to quote from the striking page in which she contrasts the simplicity of Ruskin's life seen from within, with its bewildering spaciousness when seen from without. "His life was not only centred, but limited, by the places where he was born and taught, and by the things he loved. . . . There was a water-colour drawing by his father that interested him when he was a little boy in muslin and a sack (as Northcote painted him, with his own chosen 'blue hills' for a background), and this drawing hung over his bed when he died; the evenings of his last days were passed in the chair wherein he preached in play a sermon before he could well pronounce it." And yet, says Mrs. Meynell, the student of the work done in this quiet life of repetitions is somewhat shaken from the steadfastness of study by two things—multitude and movement. The multitude is in the thoughts of this great and original mind, and the movement is the world's. Ruskin's enormous work has never had steady auditors or spectators: it may be likened to a sidereal sky beheld from an earth upon the wing. Many, innumerable, are the points that seem to shift and journey, to the shifting eye. Partly it was he himself who altered his readers; and partly they changed with the long change of a nation; and partly they altered with successive and recurrent moods. John Ruskin wrote first for his contemporaries, young men; fifty years later he wrote for the same readers fifty years older, as well as for their sons. And hardly has a mob of Shakespeare's shown more sudden, unanimous, or clamorous versions and reversions of opinion than those that have acclaimed and rejected, derided and divided, his work, once to ban and bless, and a second time to bless and ban.

TOLSTOY'S Resurrection has not escaped some caustic criticism from his countryman Verestchagin, the painter of war. It seems that Verestchagin is in the habit of publishing, from time to time, under the title of Leaves from a Note Book, his views, private thoughts, and criticisms. His handling of Resurrection is in this wise:

In spite of finely written separate scenes, full of realistic grace, the plot as a whole will not stand analysis. It is impossible to enumerate all the incongruities caused by the desire to point a moral. For example, Katusha, betrayed by Nekhludoff, stands at his side for several hours, and yet either fails to see him or else fails to recognise him. Neither is even an admissible possibility, because, according to the story, the hero has not changed appreciably. Yet this was necessary to the author's purpose, and he sacrificed probability. Again, the unnatural, the impossible Prince Nekhludoff, who despises his circle, does not shrink from bothering official personages, enduring insults and ridicule for the sake of legalising his union with Katusha. But marriage is a spiritual, as well as a legal, material union, and can there be such a thing as a spiritual union between these two? Marriage would have been worse than physical torture to both, yet somehow it was necessary to Tolstoy to insist upon it for his hero!

In truth, Tolstoy himself perceived finally the unsoundness of his whole conception, and in Resurrection the very thing we miss is the resurrection. The whole story ends with the accidental lighting of Nekhludoff on a page of the Bible, which shows him that everything was wrong, and that the right is something different. What? This is left for the future, also because it was necessary that it should be so.

In a word, the artist in Tolstoy has lost at the expense of the preacher.

AFTER this Verestchagin becomes more personal, and brings against Tolstoy the preacher the following indictments:

Having wearied at the close of a long life of nutritious, palatable food, he assures us that it is injurious to man, even to young and strong men.

Having reached the age of seventy, he wonders what good there is in life that it should be so ardently desired, and yet allows a physician to treat him in illness so that he may ward off death.

Having bred a large family, he declares that the reproduction of the species is wrong and that celibacy is the right course for men.

He advocates non-resistance to evil. What would he do if his family were kidnapped and sold as slaves? I think he would shoulder a gun and join the regiment that went to free the captives.

It is amusing to read Tolstoy's affirmation that he has tried to discover a solution in science and has found the latter wanting. He talks of science as a blind man might of beauty. Well-read he is, but his scientific education is slender and he never learned anything systematically. He is regarded by many as a philosopher, but he is only a great novelist. It was Turgeneff who observed that true art is impossible without the largest freedom, the fullest independence of systems, notions, and preconceived schemes. In Tolstoy the splendid talent, the wonderfully written episodes, the separate pictures, are all rigidly subordinated to a philosophic-moral system.

MR. LE GALLIENNE has made a book of the topographical articles which he recently contributed to the Weekly Sun under the title of Travels in England. His "England" is a restricted one; but it includes such lovely and interesting spots as Selborne, Stratford-on-Avon, Winchester, Hazlitt's Winterslow, Stonehenge, Lechlade, the Cotswolds, &c. The dedication is as follows:

To

WILLIAM SHARP

THESE "TRAVELS" ARE AFFECTIONATELY DEDICATED.

Will, you have travelled far and wide
On many a foreign country-side.
Tell me if you have fairer found
Than honeysuckled English ground;
Or did you, all the journey through,
Find such a friend, dear Will—as you?

By the way, Mr. Le Gallienne's poetical Epilogue suggests that he expected his book to appear last autumn, for it begins: "Put by the wheel, the summer's done."

A REVIEWER points out to us the following coincidence, in which one quotation has been used almost at the same moment (apropos of Mr. Le Gallienne's book on Mr. Kipling) by two independent writers to point a moral. ACADEMY, May 26, 1900, from article, "A Poet with the Heartache":

"Who shall deliver us from too much love?" is his eternal cry. Well, he might for a change try as an antidote what George Borrow found so much to his taste: "Life is sweet, brother. . . . There's day and night, brother, both sweet things; sun, moon, and stars, all sweet things; there's likewise a wind on the heath."

Sunday Sun, May 27, 1900, from "Book of the Week"—The Zeit-Geist:

And this after all is the best method of fulfilling the splendid opportunities of life, and realising its intense joyousness. It is better than saying with Tennyson that our hopes are with the uncertain Future, to say with Kipling that our intention is to make the best of the certain present. Jasper summed up the whole matter when he said to Lavengro: "Life is sweet, brother." "Do you think so?" asked Lavengro. "Think so!" replied Jasper. "There's night and day, brother, both sweet things; sun, moon, and stars, brother, all sweet things; there's likewise a wind on the heath. Life is very sweet, brother."

Bibliographical.

"You greatly should oblige me," writes an esteemed citizen of Potsdam, "when kindly informing me about the critical essays, articles, and bibliography published on Ben Johnson during the last decades." "Kindly pardon," he adds, "my incorrect English." I do; but I must ask my correspondent to leave out the "h" in "Johnson" when he refers, as I presume he refers here, to the poet-dramatist. "The last decades" is a vague phrase; but taking the two last, I will, with pleasure, indicate the most notable of the publications concerning Jonson during that period. They begin in 1884, with Jonson's inclusion in the "Old Dramatists" of Messrs. Routledge, and with Henry Morley's collection of his Plays and Poems. Then, in 1886, came Jonson's Dramatic Works and Lyrics, with an essay thereon by J. A. Symonds, who, in the same year, introduced a memoir of Jonson to the "English Worthies" series. To 1889 belongs a reprint of the Discoveries; to 1893, the appearance of three volumes of plays by Jonson (edited by Brinsley Nicholson; and C. H. Herford) in the "Mermaid" series. In 1897 Jonson received a good deal of attention. Messrs. Chatto issued Gifford and Cunningham's edition of the Works, in three volumes, at a reduced price; Every Man in his Humour was included in the "Temple Dramatists"; in English Masques appeared the text of several by Jonson; and Mr. E. J. Castle brought out a book of essays, of one of which Jonson was the subject. In 1898 came a reprint of Volpone, handsomely got up, with drawings by Aubrey Beardsley; while, last year, Prof. Arber made Jonson the figure-head of one of his British Anthologies. Add to this the new and revised edition of Prof. Ward's English Dramatic Literature, in which much space is devoted to Jonson, and you have, I think, a tolerably complete bibliography of that worthy for the past twenty years.

It would seem that in Messrs. Greening's series of volumes on contemporary English writers the work on Mr. Swinburne is to be from the pen of Mr. Theodore Wratislaw, himself a devotee of the Muse, as he showed us in his Caprices and The Pity of Love. I suppose the work will be more critical than biographical, and indeed there is room for an exhaustive study of Mr. Swinburne's large and varied output in verse and prose. Lowell and Stedman both wrote essays on Mr. Swinburne's verse; but, so far, his work has not been made the sole topic of a volume. Now, Mr. Thomas Hardy, whom Mr. W. L. Courtney will deal with in Messrs. Greening's series, has already been the subject of two volumes—one by Mr. Lionel Johnson, which came out in October, 1894, and one by Miss Annie Macdonell, which appeared a few weeks later. Mr. T. E. Pemberton, who is to write about Mr. Bret Harte, has hitherto distinguished himself (apart from play-production) only as the biographer of dramatists or actors.

We may take for granted, I think, that Mr. Beerbohm Tree's pronouncement at Oxford on the proper stage presentation of Shakespeare will appear in one of the reviews. It is not so very long ago since he figured in the Fortnightly with a discourse on Hamlet from the point of view of an actor's prompt-book. Mr. Tree is among the literary actors. His dissertation on the imaginative faculty was published in a booklet some seven years ago. It is the correct thing for a leading player to discourse, some time or other, before an academic body. In 1885 Sir Henry Irving spoke at Harvard on "The Art of Acting," and in the following year at Oxford on "Four Great Actors." Vide his little book called The Drama (1893).

Talking of literary actors, let us not forget the literary actresses—such as Miss Janet Achurch, who has just translated a play by Hauptmann into English. This is the lady who first made Ibsen a force in England by producing "The Doll's House" at a London theatre. Lady Bancroft, Miss Ellen Terry, Miss Mary Anderson, Mrs. Kendal, have written their reminiscences; but actresses do not often make excursions into literature pure and simple. Miss Dickens is a busy novel writer, but she has given up the stage as a profession.

I mentioned last week the monographs on David Hume by Prof. Huxley and Prof. William Knight. I am now reminded that Prof. Henry Calderwood has penned a monograph on the same subject. It is quite true: the book appeared two years ago in the "Famous Scots" series of Messrs. Oliphant & Co., and was a very workmanlike performance. But it was sufficient for my purpose to refer to the Huxley and Knight volumes.

Messrs. Macmillan have just missed an opportunity of adding substantially to the art-culture of the population. They have issued a volume of Tennyson's Poems, illustrated by sixteen drawings made by celebrated artists for the volume of 1857. But in no case is the name of the artist indicated. Educated people need no such information; they know a Holman Hunt, a Rossetti, a Millais, a MacIise, when they see one. But for many the value of the volume we refer to would have been greatly enhanced had some concession been made to their ignorance of the origin of the illustrations.

The title of Mr. W. D. Howells's forthcoming work, My Acquaintance with Authors, reminds one pleasantly of that of Hazlitt's well-known essay, "My First Acquaintance with Poets." It also suggests, though more remotely, J. T. Fields's Yesterdays with Authors. Did not Mrs. Fields, too, write a book on Authors and Friends? Mr. Howells's volume will be, I suppose, autobiographical.

The Pageant of History.

The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire.

By Edward Gibbon. Edited by J. B. Bury, M.A.
7 vols. Each 6s. (Methuen.)

It was in 1764 that Gibbon started upon the twenty-three years of scholarly labour which gave to the world, volume after volume, the greatest of its histories. Why should we deny ourselves the pleasure of once more transcribing the passages, surcharged with eighteenth century sentiment, in which he describes the inception and the completion of his mighty task:

It was at Rome, on the 15th of October, 1764, as I sat musing amidst the ruins of the Capitol, while the barefooted fryars were singing vespers in the Temple of Jupiter, that the idea of writing the Decline and Fall of the City first started to my mind.

It was on the day, or rather night, of the 27th of June, 1787, between the hours of eleven and twelve, that I wrote the last lines of the last page, in a summer-house in my garden. After laying down my pen I took several turns in a berceau, or covered walk of acacias, which commands a prospect of the country, the lake and the mountains. The air was temperate, the sky was serene, the silver orb of the moon was reflected from the waters, and all nature was silent. I will not dissemble the first emotions of joy on recovery of my freedom and perhaps of the establishment of my fame. But my pride was soon humbled and a sober melancholy was spread over my mind by the idea that I had taken an everlasting leave of an old and agreeable companion, and that whatever might be the future fate of my history, the life of the historian must be short and precarious.

The life of Gibbon, up to 1764, as depicted in his autobiography, had not been without its elements of paradox. He was a self-made scholar; not in the sense that he sprang from a hedge-school, for he had been to Westminster and Magdalen, but because he had had to climb to erudition over all the impediments which those two famous seats of learning could throw in his way. During his university career he was suddenly converted to Catholicism. This brought it to a close. His father hastily packed him off to Lausanne, where the theological subtlety of the Protestant pastor in whose house he was domiciled presently argued him out of his new faith. Here, too, he fell in love with Mlle. Curchod, afterwards the famous Mme. Necker. But, alas! yet another generous impulse of youth was destined to be thwarted by an obdurate father. Gibbon himself describes the upshot with an artificiality thoroughly characteristic of his age: "I sighed as a lover, I obeyed as a son. My wound was insensibly healed by time, absence, and the habits of a new life." The lady, too, recovered, and in after years Gibbon and Mme. Necker were on terms of courtly friendship. Ah! Gibbon was of the eighteenth century. He would dilate on the "incomparable landscape" of Lausanne, but he lived there for fifteen years without climbing so much as a hillock. He was carried over the Alps to Italy in an osier basket, and "the spectacle of Venice afforded some hours of astonishment." One summer he spent some weeks at Lord Sheffield's country place—in the library. When he was about to go, his hat was missing. "On my arrival," he said, "I left it on the hall table. I have had no occasion for it since." He is not singular among students of history who have remained purblind to the political needs of the present. Throughout the long struggle which ended in the separation of the American States from the colonial empire of England Gibbon sat in Parliament, a silent supporter of Lord North. To Lord North, who learnt less from history than any man, and taught it one of its most bitter lessons, Gibbon dedicated the Decline and Fall.

Were I ambitious of any other Patron than the Public, I would inscribe this work to a Statesman, who, in a long, a stormy, and at length an unfortunate administration, had many political opponents, almost without a personal enemy; who has retained, in his fall from power, many faithful and disinterested friends; and who, under the pressure of severe infirmity, enjoys the lively vigour of his mind, and the felicity of his incomparable temper. Lord North will permit me to express the feelings of friendship in the language of truth; but even truth and friendship should be silent, if he still dispensed the favours of the crown.

Gibbon's life smells eighteenth century, but his work is of all time. Alone of modern histories, it will bear putting on the shelf with the masterpieces of antiquity, Herodotus, Thucydides, Livy. Gibbon's masters in historical writing were Robertson and Hume—admirable writers, but they are antiquated, while he is fresh and luminous as ever. "Whatever else is read," said Prof. Freeman, "Gibbon must be read too." Over a thousand years, the critical thousand years during which modernity was in the making, he is still the prime exponent of the broad lines upon which the world moved.

It will not, however, in future be wise to read Gibbon in any other edition than this of Prof. Bury's. Too high praise could not be lavished upon the way in which it has been conceived and executed. Prof. Bury is equally erudite and discreet. Here is the Decline and Fall as Gibbon left it, with precisely so much editing as is needful in order to enable the student to correct Gibbon's few and inevitable errors, and to pursue his researches, on Gibbon's lines, through the vast mass of primary and secondary material which has become available since Gibbon's day. Briefly, Prof. Bury's method is as follows: he tampers neither with Gibbon's text nor his notes. A few additional notes are inserted, always clearly defined by square brackets, with the object of making the references more precise, and of quickly qualifying the disputable statements. At the end of each volume come brief, but admirably full, dissertations on selected topics of great historical importance, together with a discussion and criticism of the original sources and other authorities for that volume—a necessary branch of a modern historian's task, which Gibbon neglected. Prof. Bury's wide knowledge of the literature of his subject in every tongue, Greek and Slavonic as well as West European, makes these appendices of first-class value. He has apparently read everything. Maps and plans are interspersed, and about a third of the last volume is devoted to a full index, for which we have to thank Mrs. Bury. The modest, but masterly, introduction should be carefully read by every student who desires to know exactly what he should and what he should not expect from his Gibbon. So far as the historical soundness of the book goes, it comes to this: "If we take into account the vast range of his work, Gibbon's accuracy is amazing." In spite of his imperfect education, he had the scholar's instinct. He exhausted the original texts, so far as he could get them, and the best research of his own time. He made large and wise use of the impeccable Tillemont, "whose inimitable accuracy almost assumes the character of genius." Nevertheless, "accuracy is relative to opportunities"; the century since the Decline and Fall appeared has become fertile in the accumulation of new historical material; and "if Gibbon were alive and writing now, his history would be very different." Prof. Bury elaborates this point through a dozen brilliant pages, leaving the clearest impression of the exact nature of the qualifications and prepossessions which the modern reader must be content to bring to the book. As has been hinted, Gibbon was deficient in "Quellenkunde," the systematic investigation of sources, which plays so large a part in modern scholarship, and the nature and importance of which has been worked out with such detail in the recent Introduction to the Study of History of MM. Langlois and Seignobos. He does not always succeed in distinguishing a primary from a secondary source of information, or attempt, for instance, to disentangle the succession and weigh the relative authorities of the various authors of the Historia Augusta. Consequently, he relies, from time to time, upon the statements of authorities whom an exacter criticism discredits. Much of his history of the beginnings of Mahometanism is based upon what is little more than a romance. And this imperfect discrimination of one authority from another leads straight into the easy historical pitfall, from which, according to Prof. Bury, even Mommsen has not always escaped, of blending together the evidence of different periods in order to paint a complete picture of an institution. Gibbon's account of Germany, for instance, is half Cæsar and half Tacitus, irrespective of the fact that, as Bishop Stubbs has since shown, more than one development took place in Germanic institutions during the interval between the two writers. Prof. Bury points out the chief directions in which historical knowledge has grown since Gibbon's time, and the chapters of his work which are most affected by the new lights. The principal grave, or structural, defect in the book he finds in Gibbon's treatment of the "Byzantine," or "Lower," Empire. This Gibbon treated somewhat cursorily; and in his impatience of certain pettinesses which it displayed, he certainly failed to realise the importance of Constantinople, century after century, as a bulwark of the West against the East. The devoted scholarship of recent years has reversed Gibbon's point of view; and Prof. Bury considers that the new tendencies reach their culminating point in Krumbacher's magnificent History of Byzantine Literature. This work he declares to be "likely to form as important an epoch as that of Ducange."

In most respects Prof. Bury's appreciation carries us along with him. We differ to the extent of regarding Gibbon as less of a philosophic historian than he does. "His position among men of letters depends both on the fact that he was an exponent of important ideas and on his style." A little further on this is expanded:

Gibbon has his place in literature not only as the stylist, who never lays aside his toga when he takes up his pen, but as the expounder of a large and striking idea in a sphere of intense interest to mankind, and as a powerful representative of certain tendencies of his age. The guiding idea or "moral" of his history is briefly stated in his epigram: "I have described the triumph of barbarism and religion." In other words, the historical development of human societies, since the second century after Christ, was a retrogression (according to ordinary views of "progress"), for which Christianity was mainly to blame. This conclusion of Gibbon tended in the same direction as the theories of Rousseau; only, while Rousseau dated the decline from the day when man left Arcadia, Gibbon's era was the death of Marcus Aurelius.

Well, Gibbon may have had this idea; but we rather doubt whether it much affects the evolution of his history. In fact, as Mr. Cotter Morison pointed out many years ago, Gibbon approaches his subject rather as an artist than as a philosopher. Perhaps this is why he endures. He is occupied rather with the pageant of history, with its show and splendour of delightful circumstance, than with the deep underlying causes that set it in motion. His judgment is of men rather than of forces. Splendid visions course over his beautiful deliberate pages; emperors and barbarians, saints and sinners. They decorate his imagination rather than stir his speculation. It is a procession of setting empires and "new-caught sullen peoples," of creeds and enthusiasms that rise to fall again. For Gibbon it is enough that these things passed so. He sets them forth with ironical detachment, and leaves to others the task of explaining them, if they will. It is a legitimate attitude towards history, and has, at any rate, the advantage of permanence.

South Africa and the War.—VII.

London to Ladysmith, via Pretoria. By Winston Spencer Churchill. (Longmans. 6s.)

Ladysmith: the Diary of a Siege. By H. W. Nevinston. (Methuen. 6s.)

Four Months Besieged: the Story of Ladysmith. By H. H. S. Pearse. (Macmillan. 6s.)

EXCEPTIONAL personal adventures, and a plain English style of a rather eighteenth-century cast, are the distinguishing features of Mr. Churchill's war book. The adventures are known to everyone; the style will bear a little illustration. Mr. Churchill is, we are sure, a student of Johnson, and Gibbon, and other writers of the rotund and balanced sentence. Again and again we seem to see a copy of Rasselas in his knapsack. Take this description of life at sea:

Monotony of view—for we live at the centre of a complete circle of sea and sky; monotony of food—for all things taste the same on board ship; monotony of existence—for each day is but a barren repetition of the last; all fall to the lot of the passengers on great waters. It were malevolent to try to bring the realisation home to others. Yet all earthly evils have their compensations, and even monotony is not without its secret joy. For a time we drop out of the larger world, with its interests and its obligations, and become the independent citizens of a tiny State—a Utopian State where few toil and none go hungry—bounded on all sides by the sea and vassal only to the winds and waves.

Is not this an older convention than we are accustomed to nowadays? Is not Mr. Churchill at the farthest end of that pole of which Steevens held the other? Here is a scene which actually recalls one described by Steevens in his From Cape Town to Ladysmith. But the style is anti-theistic. Mr. Churchill is describing the field of dead after the fight at Trichardt's Drift:

Here by the rock under which he had fought lay the Field-Cornet of Heilbronn, Mr. de Mentz—a grey-haired man of over sixty years, with firm aquiline features and a short beard. The stony face was grimly calm, but it bore the stamp of unalterable resolve; the look of a man who had thought it all out, and was quite certain that his cause was just, and such as a siber citizen might give his life for. Nor was I surprised when the Boer prisoners told me that Mentz had refused all suggestions of surrender, and that when his left leg was smashed by a bullet he had continued to load and fire until he bled to death; and they found him, pale and bloodless, holding his wife's letter in his hand. Beside him was a boy of about seventeen shot through the heart. Further on lay our own two poor riflemen with their heads smashed like egg-shells, and I suppose they had mothers or wives far away at the end of the deep-sea cables. Ah, horrible war, amazing medley of the glorious and the squalid, the pitiful and the sublime, if modern men of light and leading saw your face closer, simple folk would see it hardly ever.

Some of our new writers would do well to study Mr. Churchill's pages. They will see what can be accomplished with plain English and untortured phrases, and will be able to judge how far events and emotions which are intrinsically tragic benefit by that staccato style which confers vigour rather than dignity.

Mr. Churchill's account of his escape from Pretoria, whither he was taken as a prisoner after the memorable armoured-train fight, is the liveliest piece of writing in a book which never wants life. But note the quietness of a passage on which many writers would have wreaked phrases:

My sole companion was a gigantic vulture, who manifested an extravagant interest in my condition, and made hideous and ominous gurglings from time to time. From my lofty position I commanded a view of the whole valley. A little tin-roofed town lay three miles to the westward. Scattered farmsteads, each with a clump of trees, relieved the monotony of the undulating ground. At the foot of the hill stood a Kaffir kraal, and the figures of its inhabitants dotted the patches of cultivation or surrounded the droves of goats and cows which fed on the pasture. The railway ran through the middle of the valley, and I could watch the passage of the various trains. I counted four passing each way, and from this I drew the conclusion that the same number would run by night. I marked a steep gradient up which they climbed very slowly, and determined at nightfall to make another attempt to board one of these. During the day I ate one slab of chocolate, which, with the heat, produced a violent thirst. The pool was hardly half a mile away, but I dared not leave the shelter of the little wood, for I could see the figures of white men riding or walking occasionally across the valley, and once a Boer came and fired two shots at birds close to my hiding-place. But no one discovered me.

In many respects—but particularly in its reliance on ripe old English—Mr. Churchill's book is, we think, the most readable of all the War books.

One is a little sad to find that such capitally-told stories of the siege of Ladysmith as Mr. Nevinson's and Mr. Pearse's awake less feeling than they ought to do. This is because they play on chords on which many writers have lately exercised their skill. It is absurd that war literature should thus dilute itself, that reports of great deeds and perils and sufferings should weary by duplication and re-duplication. These two books are themselves concerned with the same events, observed from the same standpoint. There is, of course, the personal equation; but even this is reduced to a minimum by the fact that both writers wrote their books in the form of despatches to newspaper offices in Fleet-street, Mr. Nevinson serving the Daily Chronicle and Mr. Pearse the Daily News. Both writers emphasise the weary monotony of the siege, although their books are alive with incident. As early as November 14 of last year Mr. Nevinson wrote, in Ladysmith: "The siege is becoming tedious, and we are losing heart." A week later Sir George White said to his staff: "Gentlemen, we have two things to do—to kill time and to kill Boers; both equally difficult." Mr. Pearse tells us how time was killed in the long evenings.

Walking along the lampless streets, at an hour when camps are silent, one is often attracted by the notes of fresh, young voices, where soft lights glow through open casements, or the singers sit under the vine-traceried verandah of a "stoup," accompanying the melody with guitar or banjo. Occasionally stentorian lungs roar unmelodious music-hall choruses that jar by contrast with sweeter strains, but sentiment prevails, and who can wonder if there are sometimes tears in the voices that sing "Swanee River" and "Home, Sweet Home," or if a listener's heart is deeply moved as he hears the words, "Mother, come back from the Echoless Shore," sung amid such surroundings in the still nights of days that are hoarse with the booming of guns? Few of us, however, despise comic songs here when time and scene fit. We have them at frequent smoking-concerts that help to enliven a routine of duty that would be dull without these entertainments.

As for killing Boers, let Mr. Nevinson tell a grim story of the attack on Surprise Hill by the 2nd Rifle Brigade on the night of December 11. The voices of friend and foe became intermingled in the darkness:

Then came the horror of a war between two nations familiar with the same language. "Second R.B.!" "Second R.B.!" shouted our fellows as a watchword and rallying-cry. "Second R.B.!" shouted every Boer who was challenged or came into danger. "B Company here!" cried an officer. "B Company here!" came the echo from the Dutch. "Where's Captain Paley?" asked a private. "Where's Captain Paley?" the question passed from Boer to Boer. In the darkness it was impossible to distinguish friend from foe. The only way was to stoop down till you saw the edge of a broad-brimmed hat. Then you drove your bayonet through the man, if he did not shoot you first. Many a poor fellow was shot down by some invisible figure who was talking to him in English and was taken for a friend. One Boer fired upon a private at two or three yards—and missed him! The private sprang upon him. "I surrender! I surrender!" cried the Boer, throwing down his rifle. "So do I," cried the private, and plunged his bayonet through the man's stomach and out at his back.

If we must compare these narratives, Mr. Pearse's is the more solid and informing, Mr. Nevinson's the more varied and amusing. It is from Mr. Nevinson that we get the humours of the siege, and phrases like "ennui enlivened by sudden death." Under November 13 he tells us:

The schoolmaster's wife had a fine escape. She was asleep in her bedroom when a 45 lb. shell came through the fireplace, and burst towards the bed. The room was smashed to pieces, but she was only cut about the head, one splinter driving in the bone, but not making a very serious wound. Two days before she had given a soldier 10s. for a fragment. Now she had a whole shell for nothing.

Burton's Verse.

The Kasidah (Couplets) of Hajī Abdū Al-Yazdī. A Lay of the Higher Law. Translated and Annotated by his Friend and Pupil, F. B. By Captain Sir Richard F. Burton. (H. J. Cook.)

THIS poem—like Mrs. Browning's Sonnets from the Portuguese, and other things of the kind—is a literary hoax. But, unlike most of its confrères, it has a certain external plausibility, which was sufficient to prevent its being at once detected for the thing it was—an original poem masquerading as a translation. No one doubted the true nature of Mrs. Browning's very artless poetic fraud. But Burton's ostentatious Eastern knowledge caused his poem to be taken at its own valuation—superficially enough, to our mind. Composed seven years before FitzGerald's Omar Khayyām, it was printed in 1880. In 1893 Lady Burton included it in her husband's Life. In the following year it was issued separately, but in a limited edition of one hundred copies. Now for the first time it is independently issued to the public at large.

Lady Burton compares it to the Omar Khayyām of FitzGerald, which (as has been seen) it preceded. Nay, she does not believe it has an equal: it is unique. "It will," she said, "ride over the heads of most, it will displease many, but it will appeal to all large hearts and large brains for its depth, its height, its breadth, for its heart and nobility, its pathos, its melancholy, and its despair. It is the very perfection of romance; it seems as the cry of a soul, wandering through space, looking for what it does not find." She never read it without tears, and her husband used to take it away from her because it impressed her so. This is very conceivable, very pardonable, in such a woman and such a wife. Pardonable also, if not quite conceivable, is it that a male correspondent should assure her he considers it equal to the greatest poems of the Earth (with a large E), and in front of most. Another, a woman—with a severe aversion to "exceptless rashness," as Timon calls it—allows that Job seems a worthy companion to Sir Richard. There is about this lady a caution, a sense of critical balance, which we admire.

It is, perhaps, well for the reputation of the much-tried Patriarch that he was spared foreknowledge of this final trial. Had he heard the comparison, and heard the conventionally descriptive lines with which the poem opens, no one could blame him if he had flung his potsherd at the critic. They are not only conventional, but Western. And though (let us hasten to add) they are not otherwise representative, in this latter respect they are. The poem is so essentially Western that it is difficult to understand how its Eastern superficialities—learned though it be—should have deceived anyone with the poetic sense. It is to us disappointing. Dismissing Job, and even FitzGerald—unfairly perfect comparisons—it might have been thought that Burton's powerful personality would fairly commit a rape upon the Muse, and force itself into strong though rugged poetry. But the result does not belong to poetry—in the true sense—at all. It is verse of that didactic order which in our language has for masterpiece The Hind and Panther; and by side of it Dryden's poem "sticks fiery off" indeed. Vigorous it is, as whatever Burton wrote was bound to be vigorous; but poetry (with a single exception) it has not, while finish—an essential in such a poem—as might be expected, is absent. One really poetical passage there is, towards the beginning, which has a certain rough affinity with FitzGerald; but this was quoted in the ACADEMY of May 19, so that we need not repeat it here. Would that all were as fine! It shows that this singular man united something of the poet's gift to his other remarkable qualities, "would he observingly distil it out." In the remainder of the poem the best passage is the conclusion, which will give the reader a fair idea of Burton's verse:

Survey thy kind as One whose wants in the great Human Whole unite;
Tae Homo rising high from earth to seek the Heavens of Life-in-Light;

And hold Humanity one man, whose universal agony Still strains and strives to gain the goal, where agonies shall cease to be.

Believe in all things; none believe; judge not nor warp
by "Facts" the thought;
See clear, hear clear, tho' life may seem Mâyâ and mirage,
Dream and Naught.

Abjure the Why and seek the How: the God and gods enthroned on high
Are silent all, are silent still; nor hear thy voice, nor deign reply.

The Now, that indivisible point which studs the length of infinite line,
Whose ends are nowhere, is thine all, the puny all thou callest thine.

Perchance the law some Giver hath: Let be! let be! what canst thou know?
A myriad races came and went; this Sphinx hath seen them come and go.

Haply the Law that rules the world allows to man the widest range;
And haply Fate's a Theist-word, subject to human chance and change.

This "I" may find a future Life, a nobler copy of our own,
Where every riddle shall be read, where every knowledge shall be known;

Where 'twill be man's to see the whole of what on earth
he sees in part;
Where change shall ne'er surcharge the thought; nor hope deferred shall hurt the heart.

But!—faded flower and fallen leaf no more shall deck the parent tree;
And man once dropt by Tree of Life what hope of other life has he?

The shatter'd bowl shall know repair; the riven lute shall sound once more;
But who shall mend the clay of man, the stolen breath to man restore?

The shiver'd clock again shall strike; the broken reed shall pipe again:
But we, we die, and Death is one, the doom of brutes, the doom of men.

Then, if Nirwâna round our life with nothingness, 'tis haply best;
Thy toil and troubles, want and woe at length have won their guerdon—Rest.

It will be gathered from this specimen that the Kasidah is, in substance, a mixture of agnosticism and the worship of humanity—with little trace of the pantheism which Lady Burton ascribes to it. But whereas true poetry is synthetic, not analytic, the bulk of the Kasidah is purely critical and destructive—in which point it is a faithful echo of most modern thought. It reviews the chief creeds and religious systems of East and West, with trenchant comment on each. Two pages at the close suffice for the edifice which Burton would erect on these universal ruins. In those two pages of synthesis (whence we have quoted) the verse lifts, as if escaped from trammels—an evidence how naturally synthetic is poetry. One wonders, by the way, whether it be through a singular coincidence or a—perhaps unconscious—borrowing, that the finest image in the poem—a very fine one—is identical with that in Coventry Patmore's Two Deserts. Burton calls the moon:

A corpse upon the road of night.

And Patmore likewise calls it:

A corpse in night's high-way, naked, fire-scar'd, accurst.

Were there more such imagery in the Kasidah, it would lift it from a forceful and mordant poem, technically in expert, into a fine poem. Yet it remains an interesting proof that Burton might have written poetry of very considerable value, had he submitted to the necessary apprenticeship and toil.

The Preacher in Print.

The Life of Lives: Further Studies in the Life of Christ.
By F. W. Farrar, Dean of Canterbury. (Cassell. 15s.)

It is twenty-six years since, "by God's unseen Providence, which men nickname 'Chance,'" Dr. Farrar was led to write a Life of Christ. Since that day his busy pen has hardly rested; and now, in this vast volume, he has, as it were, given yet another turn to the kaleidoscope, and offers to the public the glittering pieces of his well-used knowledge composed into yet another pattern.

For a public that likes sermons it is as a preacher that the Dean of Canterbury writes. To read him is with the eye of the mind to behold him once more as, on a hot Sunday afternoon of the early 'eighties, he champed upon the bit of his indignation against the triviality of rabbinical exegesis, while a cherubic vice-chancellor nodded in his chair. The style that has served him so well in the past has lost none of its properties. Every noun goes esquired by its own epithet: "prudence" by "calculating," "stagnation" by "unprogressive," "crisis" by "crowning"; selfishness is "narrow," courtesy is "gentle," even hypocrisy is "disguised." Emphasis presses upon emphasis; superlative fortifies superlative: the Resurrection is the "most central" event in the history of the world; Christ, we are told, spoke of God as His Father "in a very unique sense," and enjoyed over sonorous catalogues of Greek and Roman worthies a "unique supremacy"; "none has ever been able in the most distant degree to equal Him"; and "by comparison with the founders of other religions He is absolutely incomparable." For a consecutive example of the Dean's eloquence take this passage, in which we enclose in brackets the words which seem to differentiate his style:

We believe, then, in the Miraculous Birth of our Saviour Christ; and our belief is confirmed when we examine [the records of all] history [through and through], and find that the Babe, at whose birth the heavens burst open [to disclose their radiant minstrelies], stood ALONE [UNIQUE], SUPREME among [all the million millions of every age of all] the sons of men.

"He sighed," writes St. Mark; but the Preacher: "A sigh was wrung from His inmost heart." The bald simplicity of the authentic record stands rebuked in the presence of the Dean's expansive manner as he follows the sacred figure through the recorded incidents of His life. The author of Eric bids us picture the "earnest joy" with which His first Passover would be anticipated by "the Holy Boy"; he follows Him step by step to Jerusalem and to the Court of the Gentiles, "marked off from the more sacred enclosures by the double barriers of the Soreg and the Chel."

Through one of the openings of the Soreg Jesus would climb the fourteen steps to the Chel. . . . Mounting the steps of a terrace, which towered sixty feet above the Court of the Gentiles, Jesus would pass, perhaps, through the "Beautiful Gate" and gaze at the Court of Women and the Court of the Israelites. In the latter stood the Lishath Hag-gazzith, or Hall of Square Stones, to the south-east of the inner forecourt, in which, perhaps, at that time the Sanhedrin held its meetings.

The curtain that veils the life at Nazareth is lifted thus:

How familiar must Christ have been with that village Beth Tephilla (House of Prayer) or Beth Hakkeneseth (House of Assembly), as he sat among the other boys of Nazareth, behind the chief worshippers! How deeply must he have taken in the divine meaning alike of the Parashoth, or 154 sections of the Law by which the Pentateuch was read through in three years; and also of the Haphtaroth, or sections of the Prophets, the reading of which had been introduced in the days of the fierce persecution by Antiochus Epiphanes, when the reading of the Law was punished with death. . . . How deep must have been the expectant interest with which the child Jesus saw the Rosh Hakkeneseth, or Ruler of the Synagogue, receive from the hands of his clerk (Chazzan) the roll of the Law, or of the Prophets, and appoint the reader, who took his stand beside the elevated Bema and read the lesson, and then sat down to deliver the explanation or sermon (Darashah). With what a thrill of heart must He have heard the trumpets (Shopharoth) blown at the beginning of the new year and on the solemn feast days.

Incidentally the simplicity of the synagogue service and the condemnation of Pharisaism are themes upon which is embroidered much acceptable denunciation of priestcraft and ritualism; and asceticism is once more swept impatiently aside, with all "the carping brag of the posing Pharisee."

As to the interpretation of Scripture in general, the Dean discerns in the teaching of our Lord the luminous principle "that Scripture does not cover any number of inferences which can be extorted out of isolated expressions, but that we are to abide by all that is permanent in the plain meaning of Holy Writ." On the other hand: "To quote a phrase, and attribute to its literal significance a meaning which it never had, and never could have had, is a mere trick of ignorant hypocrisy." So, indeed, we should suppose.

The pages are decorated with illustrative lines, sometimes introduced at some pains. For instance: "Jesus also felt most deeply the sting of thanklessness in those who had been recipients of inestimable gifts. He sometimes felt as if all his mercies were 'falling into a deep, silent grave'; and He might have said:

Blow, blow, thou winter wind,
Thou art not so unkind
As man's ingratitude."

But to whatever exceptions Dean Farrar's style and manner may lie open, it may be cordially confessed that, in making intelligible to the general public the main results of archaeological research, he has rendered a service to the cause of intelligent Christianity that is not wholly unworthy of his great ecclesiastical place.

The Actor's Life.

The Stage as a Career. By Philip G. Hubert, Jun. (Putnam's Sons).

THIS is described by its author as "a sketch of the actor's life; its requirements, hardships, and rewards." We have had more than enough of such sketches, which seem to leave the matter very much where it always was. Our only reason for dealing with the present production is that it comes from America, and is, therefore, from a point of view different from its predecessors in this country. The writer, to be sure, prides himself upon presenting a selection from the opinions on acting as a profession expressed by notable actors and actresses, such as Sir Henry Irving, Mr. Jefferson, and Mme. Modjeska. We may be quite certain, however, that such opinions, formulated by players at the top of the tree, are of no very great practical importance. An avocation in which a man or a woman has risen to eminence and a measure of opulence and fame must needs appear to him, or her, an avocation more or less desirable. More useful to the youthful aspirant would be the pronouncement of a player or players who had failed, or had succeeded only in just paying their way. The experience of an Irving, a Jefferson, or a Modjeska has little bearing upon the general question and as regards the average person. Sir Henry Irving is an honoured guest in the highest circles of society, but that fact does not imply that the actor, as actor, has a recognised social status. As a matter of fact, he has not a social status, as a clergyman, a lawyer, or a doctor has. The great players, from Betterton and Garrick down to Macready and Charles Kean, have had all the social recognition that they cared for. But that was because they had managed to raise themselves above the crowd, not because they were actors.

The mere fact that a man or a woman is a player does nothing for him or for her, so far as the world is concerned. Nay, unless they are prominent, it is positively against them both. And this is so, not so much because players may be poor, as because they belong to a class which society looks upon as Bohemian in the broadest sense. They are here to-day, and there to-morrow. The heads of the profession are well known and much esteemed. Their habitat is usually permanent and often brilliant in the social way. They entertain, and are entertained by, Royalty and aristocracy. They are looked upon as citizens of a substantial, not to say ornamental, type. But the average player, the second-rate performer, the mediocrity, the camp-follower—what of them? Society looks at them askance. They have no settled home and no settled income. And why? Because they have no settled employment. That is the first, and most effective, of Mr. Hubert's objections to "the stage as a career." Very few are the players, not actor-managers, who can depend on having work to do all the year round. Always there are a melancholy number of excellent performers "resting." Able and experienced as they may be, they are not wanted—for the moment. Their turn may come, but meanwhile they must wait. And that brings us to the second of Mr. Hubert's objections—"the helplessness of the actor as an independent factor in the world." Your player has to remain idle till he is sent for. Put pens, ink, paper, and postage stamps within reach of the literary man, and he can at least work at his trade whatever betide him; the actor, alas! can do nothing till he gets an engagement, even if it be only as a "super." He cannot dig; to beg he is (usually, though not invariably) ashamed.

Mr. Hubert, it would seem, is an American journalist, familiar (as a critic) with the insides of theatres, and possessing relatives and friends either on the "boards" or in some other way connected with the stage. And this is the conclusion at which he has arrived: "Were a boy or girl of my own to declare an intention of going upon the stage, I should consent with the greatest reluctance. If my boy or girl had aptitude for professional life, skill in writing, art, music, or teaching, I should consider such a course deplorable, and nothing less than a misfortune." In other words, any other legitimate profession is more to be desired than that of actor. The rewards of the latter are few, the drawbacks many. There are, of course, such persons as the "born actor" and the "born actress." These are sure to find their way to the theatre, sooner or later; and the labour we delight in physics pain. Your enthusiast will endure all things. For him, life is the life of the "boards" or nothing. Moreover, there are such things as hereditary actors—families of players—who take to the business as if by the decree of Providence. For them the life of the "boards" is all (and therefore the best) they know. But for "the stage as a career," deliberately chosen as such, there is next to nothing to be said. Multitudinous are the blanks, and rare the prizes.

Other New Books.

PINK AND SCARLET.

BY LIEUT.-COL. ALDERSON.

Since the days when the Great Duke was holding the armies of France at bay in the Peninsula there has always been an intimate connexion between hunting and cavalry work. This connexion Lieut.-Col. Alderson, who is now at the front in South Africa, brings home and emphasises in this capital book, and it is not too much to say that the cavalry man, whether he belongs to the regular army or to one of the numerous Imperial and Colonial Light Horse regiments, will find a mine of information and instruction in this work. It is now an accepted thing that the best cavalry officer is the hunting man, who not only can ride, but can judge at a glance of the country before him, of the shortest and quickest way of getting to a given point, and of the country over which it is safe to pass or to ease his horses. To some men this comes by instinct, others pick it up at once when a few hints are given them. To all alike Lieut.-Col. Alderson's book will be of the highest use, for there is not a point that he leaves unnoticed or a subject on which he has not some information to offer. (Heinemann.)

THE SPORT OF KINGS.

BY W. SCARTH DIXON.

Like Mr. Jorrocks, Mr. Dixon does not look beyond hunting; to him it is the beginning and the end. This volume consists of articles which have already seen the light in a sporting paper, and here they are so arranged and ordered as to make a record of the hunting man's year. To the old sportsman the work will afford much entertainment, while to the tyro it will be full of instruction, though even the oldest follower of hounds may learn something from it, for, as Mr. Dixon remarks, "hunting is ever fresh and ever new, and, though I have now entered on my forty-first hunting season, I have, I hope, learned something worth knowing since I saw hounds for the first time this season at Venniford Post." There are sixty-five chapters in the book, dealing with all matters from "Hunting a Hundred Years Ago" to "For Next Season" and "The Future of Fox-hunting." The truly enthusiastic follower of hounds is always at a loose end in summer time. Mr. Dixon has published his book at an opportune moment; its pleasant pages will beguile the sportsman wearying for next autumn through the long blank summer season. (Grant Richards. 10s. 6d.)

TRACTATUS DE INDULGENTIA S. MARIE

DE PORTIUNCULA.

EDITIT PAUL SABATIER.

This is a supplement to M. Sabatier's life of St. Francis of Assisi, itself one of the classics of hagiography. It concerns a disputed point in the history of the saint. According to tradition, St. Francis obtained from Pope

Honorius in 1216 a remarkable privilege for the little chapel of the Portiuncula at Assisi. Plenary indulgence of all sins was granted to contrite pilgrims visiting this chapel on August 2, the day on which a vision of Christ with the Virgin and a company of angels had appeared to the saint when engaged in prayer there. Such an indulgence, if really granted, would be a thing unique in the annals of the Church. When writing the Life, M. Sabatier came to the conclusion that the whole narrative was a legend, due to the desire of the Franciscans of the Strict Observance to glorify the Portiuncula, which they held, as against the Basilica of Assisi, which was in the hands of their rivals of the Large Observance. He has since, after detailed study of the many and difficult documents involved, seen reason to alter his view; and this book is his palinode. It consists of a minute study of the history of the tradition, together with a number of documents, up to, and including, the tractate on the subject compiled by Francis Bartholi in the middle of the fourteenth century, a tractate which "marks the definitive triumph of legend over history." It is an important contribution to a branch of ecclesiastical history which M. Sabatier has made peculiarly his own. We observe with interest that in the same series of studies will presently appear the text of The Acts of St. Francis and his Companions, which M. Sabatier declares to be the Latin original, hitherto unidentified, of the famous Fioretti. (Fischbacher.)

THE GARDENER'S ASSISTANT.
VOL. I.

BY ROBERT THOMPSON.
ED. BY WILLIAM WATSON.

This book is an accretion of nearly half a century, and it has the depth and maturity of old soil. In 1859 appeared The Gardener's Assistant, under the editorship of Mr. Robert Thompson, the then superintendent of the Royal Horticultural Society's Gardens, at Chiswick. In 1877, and again in 1884, the work was revised and enlarged. The same processes have again been applied, and now the alterations and additions have practically resulted in the production of a new book at the very time when the old gardens at Chiswick are likely to be given up on account of the spread of London. The largest shares in the present volume appear to have fallen to Dr. Maxwell T. Masters, who writes on a variety of subjects, and Mr. John Fraser, whose admirable and very long chapter on "Insect and Other Plant Enemies" is fascinating reading. Profusely illustrated, and furnished with statistical tables of real value, this new edition of a work which has been repeatedly adjusted to the advance of horticulture deserves unqualified praise. Although an encyclopædia of gardening, it seems to us to include, without obscuring, the needs of the amateur gardener. The potterer in a garden ought to find a subtle pleasure in measuring his ignorance of this noble art, as well as in deepening his knowledge; and he can have both pleasures in this work. (The Gresham Publishing Co.)

A HISTORY OF EASTERN ASIA.

BY J. C. HANNAH.

We are no doubt on the eve of great events in the Far East, in which the Great Powers of Europe will be at one another's throats over the break-up of China. A compendious history of the Far East is therefore a necessity to the student, and Mr. J. C. Hannah, who was formerly master of the English school at Tien-Tsin, has supplied a brief history of Eastern Asia which will be of much use as a work of reference. In the space at his command Mr. Hannah could not, of course, attempt a comprehensive history, but he has made a useful summary of the events which have taken place in the eastern half of the Asiatic continent from prehistoric times. He has omitted to deal with Persia, Mesopotamia, Arabia, Syria, and Asia Minor, because these countries, although Asiatic, fall more properly into the groupings of European nations or those of the Mediterranean basin. The remaining countries of Asia are those which are bound up in what is known as the Far Eastern Question, for the proper understanding of which a brief epitome of their history is necessary. Happily for the general reader the real crux of the question is of fairly modern growth, so that Mr. Hannah's book will supply all that he needs to know. (Fisher Unwin.)

AN ORLEANS DIARY.

By M. CUVILLIER-FLEURY.

The private diaries of those who hold positions about a Court are of perennial interest. M. Cuvillier-Fleury, the French Academician, was the son of one of Napoleon's officers, who became tutor to the Duc d'Aumale, and the admirer and apologist of Louis Philippe. He kept a private diary from 1828 onwards, and the volume before us deals with the life of the Orleans family at the Palais Royal from 1828 to 1831. The papers have been collected by his daughter, and edited, with an introduction, by M. Ernest Bertin, of the Débats. The work, which is prefaced by a sketch of the life of M. Cuvillier-Fleury by the Duc d'Aumale, naturally chronicles a good deal of small beer, but it throws some most valuable sidelights on a very interesting period of French history. The diary is written day by day, and records the impressions of the moment. To the future historian of the Orleans family in France it will be of the highest value. (Paris: Librairie Plon.)

Fiction.

The Cardinal's Snuff-Box. By Henry Harland.
(John Lane. 6s.)

THE scene of this elegant and charming fantasia upon life, love, and art is laid in a Latin country; the old Cardinal, and Marietta, that delightful and antique serving-maid, are pure Italian; the lovers, though English, are Latinised, and the whole spirit of the book, half gracious, half malign, entirely witty, is Latin. The possessor of a fine, fragile talent which has absorbed most cultures, Mr. Harland lavishly expends that talent for the diversion (nothing higher) of those who can appreciate his delicate entertainment. He would not be serious; he would not take life seriously—and yet somewhere, woven imperceptibly into the woof of the thing, there is a quality, an inclination to "hedge" against the ultimate risk of having been only frivolous. Mr. Harland has in him something of Anatole France and something of Renan. The moral attitude of the The Cardinal's Snuff-Box reminds us irresistibly of a passage in Renan's "philosophic drama" L'Eau de Jouvence: "On the hypothesis, which is becoming more and more probable, that the universe is only a tautology in which the sum of movement is found again exactly, in the final balance, without loss or gain, let us take care that the pleasantries have been agreeable. . . . Having regard to our incertitude as to human destiny, the wisest thing is to arrange so that, under any and every hypothesis, we may not discover that we have been too absurd. So that we shall not be saints, but neither shall we be dupes. In any event, we shall not have been too violently surprised." These words are the witty justification of books like Mr. Harland's.

Not that there are many novels in the least similar to The Cardinal's Snuff-Box in English. It belongs to an order of its own. Its chief characteristic is that all ugliness is carefully eliminated from the aspect. The action passes in a lovely Italian landscape, on either side of a diminutive rushing river. There are the Italian trees and swards, Italian snow-crowned hills, Italian chateaux, Italian villages, "improbable" in their notorious beauty. And there is money, and every refinement of luxury, every grace of manners. The lady is a duchess, youthfully widowed; the man is a novelist, at once brilliant and modest. He had caught sight of the duchess in various cosmopolitan centres of gaiety, and written a book round her profile. They meet at last, separated only by the little river; she has his book in her hand. They talk—mere badinage, but mousseux with an exquisite fantastic lightness. Pouf! It is like down wafted across the little river. He falls in love; she falls in love. Blind to her symptoms, he despairs of winning this noble dame. She—she throws herself at him, with what adroit skill of womanliness! The Cardinal supervenes, and antique Marietta, and these two have their share of the intrigue. Marietta is ill, and confesses her sins to the young Englishman her master—this is the prettiest imaginable bit; and, of course, the duchess must visit the sick. Then there are convenient sudden thunderstorms which necessitate the taking of shelter, and snuff-boxes which conveniently get themselves lost and must be returned to immemorial castles. And then, presto! she has accepted him. It is all over. The frailest trifle, only just about as perfect as a trifle can be.

Fate the Fiddler. By Herbert C. MacIlwaine.
(Constable & Co. 6s.)

THIS is a novel of the Australian Bush, and it proclaims its author to be a serious and promising literary artist who must be reckoned with, whose work must be watched book by book as it appears, whose achievement is already notable. There is no question here of a Colonial author producing agreeable stuff about a colony, and to be praised on that account. Mr. MacIlwaine has an imagination which ennobles, and which (feeding on the vast spaces of the Bush) has drawn therefrom an unfamiliar and impressive dignity. Out there, where life is life, and the austere solemnity of nature's pageant rebukes the soul into discarding every triviality of thought and feeling, a man may come to grips with the primal force of the world; a man may exist, in the deepest, ultimate sense; he may perceive the simplicity and grandeur of earthly things in a new, strange light. One is conscious in this book of a fine, sane freshness; of a quality which, with no ostentatious effort, gives value to the commonest manifestations of life. When the two squatters, Somers and Colyer, come to occupy their thousand-mile domain, the mere procession of cattle, the mere driving of a six-horse wain across a river-bed, the mere fall of evening upon the prone forms of men and beasts, have a beauty and significance in and by themselves, and not to be assessed by any scenic standard.

Above the rocky rise beyond the creek a golden fume of dust arose; the earth was shaking to the din and trampling of the herd, and yet there had been no sign of one of them. Then the crest of the rise was broken—a single heifer rose up and stood an instant silhouetted against the rolling dust behind her; she sniffed the air inquiringly, started down the slope at a trot, the trot broke into a canter, and the canter was varied by gambollings of the inimitable uncouthness of all cow-kind when at play. She bellowed at her caperings, and the bellowing was broken by the exercise into a series of ludicrous ejaculations. By the time the pioneer was well upon her way down the slope, a hundred more young cows had appeared above the ridge, had paused and begun to trot, bellow and caper precisely after the manner of their leader; and hundred after hundred followed these, till the rise and the creek-flat were one bellowing, bucking chaos of flourishing horns and tails, and heaving bright-skinned bodies. As the rabble flowed down the bank to the creek-crossing, it steadied and packed itself into a solid press towards the drinking place; the leading beasts as they drank were pushed out and out into deep water, till it seemed as if a huge catastrophe from drowning and mangling were imminent. Yet matters were settled by order of nature and brute strength; the cattle, having drunk their fill, found their way somehow, singly, then in pairs, dozens, hundreds, up the other bank, and spread out upon the downs.

The book is not wholly excellent; it lapses somewhat from the extraordinary promise of the opening. The title, Fate the Fiddler, is scarcely satisfactory, and the theme partakes of this unsatisfactoriness. The fact is, Mr. MacIlwaine's Fate fiddles too random a tune. The plot lacks unity, precision, and cumulative power. There is no inevitable march of event, but rather a zigzag progress of happenings towards a final justice which is slightly too "poetical." The character-drawing is uneven. Somers is good—a man seen and felt to the inmost; but Colyer is manipulated in such a way as to startle and confuse the reader. There is a good deal of Australian finance in the story, and these scenes with bankers and wirepullers have not the authenticity, the absolute rightness, of the Bush chapters. Lastly, Mr. MacIlwaine's style, though it shows many admirable qualities, and has indeed the essentials of a fine style, is frequently cumbrous and turgid. But make no mistake—this is a book.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE CHEVALIER OF THE SPLENDID CREST.

BY THE RT. HON.
SIR HERBERT MAXWELL.

This story, by the Chevalier of the Busy Pen, is adorned with a list of "works by the same author," classified as History and Biography, Science, Fiction, and Miscellaneous. This is the fifth excursion into fiction, and it is an attempt "to realise what were the conditions of living in this country before its people had become so busy, so well off, and, perhaps, so fond of ease, as they are now." The period chosen is that of the Crusades. (Blackwood. 6s.)

FOR THE QUEEN IN SOUTH AFRICA.

BY CARYL DAVIS HASKINS.

Six stories of British fighting, mostly in South Africa, and mostly in some relation to public schools and sport. When Brooks led his men up a kopje he shouted: "'Play up close to the ball! On the ball!' with his heart in football, with never a thought of battle, until he reached almost the top of the parapet, and strange faces looked down upon him—faces with deep-set lines, and blue-grey eyes looking along rifle barrels." (Putnams. 5s.)

THE SPENDTHRIFT.

BY FRANCIS DODSWORTH.

The title is the book: we follow the fortunes of a spendthrift from his front-view portrait on the front cover to his back-view portrait on the back cover. Some blame is thrown on the spendthrift's parents: "Following out that curiously short-sighted policy which has been the making of our Colonial police, Devan's father and mother had always kept him as short as possible. 'You do not understand the value of money,' they used to tell him, whenever he protested." (Grant Richards. 6s.)

PAUL THE OPTIMIST.

BY W. P. DOTHIE.

A novel, somewhat of the Dickensian type, laid in that part of the century when people "went on pottering over their tinder and flint in the dark mornings, and snuffing their tallow candles in the dark evenings. . . . To the north of Paternoster-row, very near the Newgate-street end of Bluebell-lane, was the establishment of Twist Brothers, Clothiers. . . . In Twist's house the lad might become errand-boy, knife and window cleaner (a sinecure), journeyman's helot, apprentice, clerk, no matter what. Let him take his chance, was Peter's only idea, and sink or swim." (John Long. 6s.)

THE SWORD OF THE KING.

BY RONALD MACDONALD.

A pleasant story of the reign of James II. and the coming of the Prince of Orange, written in the first person round a broken sword, which "hangs yet (and long may it so hang!) in our great hall at Drayton . . . beneath it, also against the wall above the hearth, is the scabbard." (John Murray. 6s.)

REVENGEFUL FANGS.

BY F. W. BAMFORD.

The fangs are the fangs of snakes. The Ryfields—an Anglo-Indian family—are continually being menaced by snakes, and Ryfield père has "a terrible suspicion . . . with regard to an ancestor having been the original cause of our many dangerous experiences with snakes. . . . 'I will certainly look over whatever papers I have that are at all likely to contain anything calculated to throw light upon the subject.'" The story is full of snakes, cobras, fakirs, and coolies, serpent-worshippers, and antidotes; and the mystery is cleared up. (Stock. 6s.)

MACGILLEROY'S MILLIONS.

BY IZA DUFFUS HARDY.

"No, it would be buying his millions dear to get them at the price of handing himself back into the grip of the law, to undergo the rest of his sentence!" . . . "All . . . if it turns out that Anthony Fleming is dead, goes to Miss Perceval. . . ." (Simpkin, Marshall. 6s.)

THE ROBBER TRAMPS OF CIRCUMSTANCE.

BY LILLIE C. HOSIE.

The advantages of an Explosive factory as a background for a novel are obvious. There need never be a lack of incident. Here the manufacture of Globulite is attended with accident after accident; the story is shaped by Globulite, and the course of true love is adjusted by concussion and soothed with compresses. (Drane. 3s. 6d.)

THE WHITE FLOWER.

BY CLIVE R. FENN.

An adventurer, a true lover, and a woman are found in smart society. We have the inevitable French phrases, "Mille compliments!" régimes, esclandre, distraite, en fête, and matinée. "My dear Farleigh," says the Duke of Elvaston, who stood in front of the fireplace with his hands behind the tails of his evening dress coat, "My dear Farleigh, if I had any wish to make another few hundred thousand pounds, and, mind you, I haven't, I should finance the rubber trade." (Digby, Long. 6s.)

ADA VERNHAM, ACTRESS.

BY RICHARD MARSH.

This story, by the author of A Second Coming, is a story of the stage, of novelette merit. The heroine breaks down in an important part at the Soho Theatre, and we are treated to wild scenes in front of the curtain and behind it, until there suddenly enters to Ada her own true love, who has been mentioned only once before in the story. He wore a felt hat and cloak, and "his eyes were flaming fires." His only office was to stop the play—and the novel. Of course he "went out with the woman into the night"—she being still "attired in the stage costume of a Rhineland maiden of the olden time." (Long. 6s.)

ONE OF MANY.

BY VERA MACHA.

The heroine describes her "many" love affairs, in which she was invariably unfortunate. Twice she marries under our eyes, her second engagement being entered into just six hours before Frank Corbin declares his passion: "Too late by just six hours! Is love ever thus to curse and mock my heart?" (Digby, Long. 6s.)

Stephen Crane.

As special correspondent he had seen two wars; he had been wrecked; he had written eleven books, two still in MS., and when he died last Wednesday his years did not number thirty. He was the type of the nervous, nimble-minded American, slight in figure, shy and kind in manner, speaking little, with a great power of work, a fine memory, and an imagination of astonishing psychological insight. Latterly his health had been bad, partly constitutional, and partly through malarial fever contracted in the Cuban campaign. The last two years of his life were spent in the old, huge, fascinating house in Sussex, Brede Place, which he made his home. There he lived, many miles from the nearest railway station, a quiet, domesticated life, welcoming his friends, and writing—always writing. He battled bravely against ill-health; but the disease gained ground, and a few weeks ago he was ordered to the Black Forest. It was a forlorn hope, and, although many days were given to the journey, he succumbed at the end to exhaustion.

The Red Badge of Courage was published when he was twenty-five. This study of the psychological side of war, of its effect on a private soldier, justly won for him immediate recognition. Critics of all schools united in praise of that remarkable book, and the more wonderful did the performance appear when it became known that he had never seen a battle, that the whole was evolved from his imagination, fed by a long and minute study of military history. It is said that when he returned from the Græco-Turkish war he remarked to a friend: "The Red Badge is all right." It was all right.

The same swift and unerring characterisation, the same keen vision into the springs of motives, the same vivid phrasing, marked George's Mother. Here, as in most of his other stories, and in all his episodes, the environment grows round the characters. He takes them at some period of emotional or physical stress, and, working from within outwards, with quick, firm touches, vivifies them into life. Nowhere is this more evident than in the short sketches and studies that were, probably, after The Red Badge of Courage, the real expression of his genius. His longer novels, though not wanting in passages that show him at his best, suggest that in time he would have returned to the earlier instinct that prompted him to work upon a small canvas.

As a writer he was very modern. He troubled himself little about style or literary art. But—rare gift—he saw for himself, and, like Mr. Stevens, he knew in a flash just what was essential to bring the picture vividly to the reader. His books are full of images and similes that not only fulfil their purpose of the moment, but live in the memory afterwards. A super-refined literary taste might object to some of his phrases—to such a sentence as this, for example: "By the very last star of truth, it is easier to steal eggs from under a hen than it was to change seats in the dingey," to his colloquialisms, to the slang with which he peppers the talk of his men—but that was the man, who looked at things with his own eyes, and was unafraid of his prepossessions.

His gift of presenting the critical or dramatic moments in the lives of men and women was supreme. We could give a hundred examples, and though the sketch we take the liberty of quoting is not by any means the best of its kind, it is complete in itself, and shows how neat, how to the point, how sympathetic without being sentimental, his work was. It is called "A Detail," and is included in the volume of stories and sketches called The Open Boat (Heinemann), the title of that remarkable account of the escape of himself and three companions from the wreck of the steamer Commodore:

The tiny old lady in the black dress and curious little black bonnet had at first seemed alarmed at the sound made by her feet upon the stone pavements. But later she forgot about it, for she suddenly came into the tempest of the Sixth Avenue shopping district, where from the streams of people and vehicles went up a roar like that from headlong mountain torrents.

She seemed then like a chip that catches, recoils, turns and wheels, a reluctant thing in the clutch of the impetuous river. She hesitated, faltered, debated with herself. Frequently she seemed about to address people; then of a sudden she would evidently lose her courage. Meanwhile the torrent jostled her, swung her this and that way.

At last, however, she saw two young women gazing in at a shop-window. They were well-dressed girls; they wore gowns with enormous sleeves that made them look like full-rigged ships with all sails set. They seemed to have plenty of time; they leisurely scanned the goods in the window. Other people had made the tiny old woman much afraid because obviously they were speeding to keep such tremendously important engagements. She went close to the girls and peered in at the same window. She watched them furtively for a time. Then finally she said:

"Excuse me!"

The girls looked down at this old face with its two large eyes turned towards them.

"Excuse me, can you tell me where I can get any work?"

For an instant the two girls stared. Then they seemed about to exchange a smile, but, at the last moment, they checked it. The tiny old lady's eyes were upon them. She was quaintly serious, silently expectant. She made one marvel that in that face the wrinkles showed no trace of experience, knowledge; they were simply little, soft, innocent creases. As for her glance, it had the trustfulness of ignorance and the candour of babyhood.

"I want to get something to do, because I need the money," she continued since, in their astonishment, they had not replied to her first question. "Of course I'm not strong and I couldn't do very much, but I can sew well; and in a house where there was a good many men folks I could do all the mending. Do you know any place where they would like me to come?"

The young women did then exchange a smile, but it was a subtle, tender smile, the edge of personal grief.

"Well, no, madame," hesitatingly said one of them at last; "I don't think I know anyone."

A shade passed over the tiny old lady's face, a shadow of the wing of disappointment.

"Don't you?" she said, with a little struggle to be brave in her voice.

Then the girl hastily continued: "But if you will give me your address, I may find someone, and if I do, I will surely let you know of it."

The tiny old lady dictated her address, bending over to watch the girl write on a visiting card with a little silver pencil. Then she said:

"I thank you very much." She bowed to them, smiling, and went on down the avenue.

As for the two girls, they walked to the curb and watched this aged figure, small and frail, in its black gown and curious black bonnet. At last the crowd, the innumerable wagons, intermingling and changing with uproar and riot, suddenly engulfed it.

This youth wandered much over the world in his brief, brilliant life. As we write, his last journey is beginning. He is being taken to his home in America.

Things Seen.

In a Toy-Shop.

I WAS in a toy-shop in Oxford-street, searching for a clock-work toy. Between the attractions of washerwomen, performing minstrels, and rickshaw men, I was getting rather perplexed and not a little bored when a small boy, with attendant nurse and sisters, came in. The boy knew what he wanted, and so I felt that I at least was his servant. He had half-a-guinea to spend, and he intended to buy one of the large figures dressed in khaki. The choice had been almost made, when he edged up to me and whispered: "Do you know what regiment Baden-Powell belongs to?"

"He was in the 13th Hussars, I believe," I answered.

"I won't have that Yeomanry man," my small friend said at once to his companions.

"But, Master Lionel, we have chosen it," the nurse remonstrated.

"I want a Hussar."

"We haven't got any Hussars left, would you rather have a Highlander?" the shop-lady asked, persuasively.

"No, I want a Hussar, Hussars don't wear kilts. You are sure he was in the Hussars?" he added to me.

"Yes, I think so, and he was at school at Charterhouse," I said by way of general information.

"And I am going to Eton. I sha'n't. I shall go to Charterhouse."

The situation was becoming strained; and as I was in some respects responsible for having made my small friend so perplexed, I said to him: "Don't you think it would be nice to have a Highlander now and then go to Charterhouse afterwards?"

"You are sure he was at Charterhouse."

"Yes, quite sure."

"Nurse, I'll have the Highlander, but I shall go to Charterhouse," he decided promptly.

The nurse beamed an instructive smile upon me.

"Don't wrap him up. I'll carry him as he is," the boy said.

He went out of the shop smiling; but after that smile of nurse's I cannot believe that he will go to Charterhouse.

At the Door.

HEDDEROW and field were on one side of the road only. The opposite footpath was flanked by a brick wall, and its long perspective was broken by a somewhat architectural doorway, with a pair of iron studded doors, and a mediæval bell-pull. It was the door of the county workhouse. Two men and two women approached from opposite directions. The men were ragged, unshaved, and frowsy, wearing boots that might have been found on an ash-heap. Each had buttoned up his coat collar to hide his lack of a shirt. The women showed as much tidiness as is possible when drink and the pawn-shop have done their worst. The shawls and gowns were of the dark neutral tint of poverty. Their tattered bonnets had evidently passed through a long succession of reverses of fortune. As these persons came along, it was evident that they had made up their minds to "go into the house." Their faces were gloomy, but this chance meeting brightened the gloom with something like a smile, although there was no sign of previous acquaintance between the couples. The women gave a feminine pat to their hair. One of the men pulled off his slouched hat, brushed it with his arm, and tried to give it a more becoming shape. The other man stepped forward and pulled the bell, which gave out a loud jangling, and when the porter opened the door he would have gone in at once, but his comrade held him back, saying, "Ladies first!" And so the women passed in before the men, acknowledging the courtesy graciously, coquettishly picking up their dingy skirts, and walking with an air.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

M. MARCEL PRÉVOST has stepped into serious literature at last; he has condescended to place his remarkable talent at the service of good womanhood, and in his Strong Virgins has made noble amends for a book many of us have found it difficult to forgive him. But the author of Demi-Vierges is forgotten in the large-minded and generous apostle of Feminism who has just given us Frédérique. This powerful and original novel will greatly interest English readers because of the vigour, the surprising accuracy and sympathy with which English life and scenery are depicted. If nothing is more amusing than the inaccurate and atrabilious descriptions of our ways and cities by the pens of unsympathetic foreigners, who seemingly leave their own country to hold a "review of their Maker's mistakes" elsewhere, on the other hand nothing can be more instructive and interesting than the impressions and observations the intelligent and liberal-minded foreigner carries away from our midst. M. Prévost detects the good and bad in England with a just and sensible discernment. If he can admire the pure and independent English girl, he is as quick to recognise her repugnant antithesis, the Anglo-Saxon flirt. With a fine impartiality he sees where the English stand above French civilisation and where they fall below it. He retorts to the cry of the admiring Englishman "they manage those things better in France" with a no less ready admission that many things are far better managed in England. Before his conversion M. Paul Bourget had a kind of sneaking preference for England, but this admiration was hardly of a quality to flatter the best of the nation; it was the sentiment of the foreign snob in love with English tailoring, the flavour of exterior correction well-bred English people carry into all their relations, the vast pretentiousness of English society, the luxurious town mansions and country houses, the prestige of the British aristocracy. These were the things that dazzled M. Bourget. But M. Prévost, who is nothing of a snob, has brought away from England far higher impressions, and in Frédérique and its sequel, Lea, which has already appeared in the Revue de Paris, he has given us two books which will surely open for him the doors of the Academy.

I have said that M. Prévost has constituted himself, in a way, the apostle of Feminism. Let it at once be understood that this implies no affinity with the late outburst of feminist literature in England. There is nothing here of the hill-top novel, nothing of the African Farm, and far less still of the unclean divagations of Keynotes and its successors. This is a feminism of a claustral austerity. M. Prévost's strong virgins ask of men and society nothing but the right to work for themselves and live chaste and noble lives. Unclaustrated nuns is really what they aspire and strive to be. Lea and Frédérique, the two enthusiastic Parisians, who leave their lovely Paris to come to London to live by their work in the delightfully free atmosphere of Free College, are beautiful young girls. Their voluntary renunciation of marriage and the love of man is the result of their mother's lamentable frailty. Seeing what a miserable thing the love of man, without pride or dignity, made of her weak and sensual mother's existence, Frédérique, resentful of her birth, haughtily resolved to keep herself clean of such influences. Her contempt of man is intense and passionate, and, considering her proud nature and her sad experience of men, quite justifiable. Her brother, a brilliant young lawyer, had seduced the light and shallow Christiane, a pretty creature with the instincts of a grisette; on paternal orders had gone abroad, leaving Christiane enclaustrée. A subordinate of the house was found who, for an indemnity, consented to marry the seduced girl and give his name to her child. The stepfather of Frédérique is a consumptive brute, and in very childhood the family skeleton is paraded before the unhappy little girl. And so through girlhood she cherishes an affectionate and indulgent contempt of her mother, and a dark hate of her father and stepfather. Being exceptionally intelligent, as well as beautiful, she obtains a good situation in a factory, where Lea soon joins her as a designer. Lea is a soft and charming creature, in every way the contrast of her strong and haughty sister, whom she adores and looks up to. The relations of these sisters are drawn for us with a captivating sincerity and charm. It is not for nothing M. Prévost has made womanhood his study. It would be difficult to name a book in which the fraternity of two girls, so fond and so widely different, is portrayed with a nobler precision and a more touching grace. Its singular force lies in the fact that this distinguished picture of sisterhood, with its reserved tenderness, its invincible purity of form and colouring, has not a trace of sentimentality.

In London the fortunes of these girls are enviable in every way. There is the gallant briskness of the Free College, where young girls are brought up with the freedom of boys on a new Feminist plan, with delightful results. There is the charming intimacy in Apple Tree-yard with an ideal brother and sister, natives of Finland, and the delicate love idyll of Georg Ortsen and Lea, which grows slowly out of this intimacy—an idyll which, if it lacks the poetry, lacks none of the grace and fragrance of Loti's exquisite idyll in Ramunchto. The flaw in the book, and indeed the flaw in Frédérique's inexorable feminism, is the compulsory sacrifice of this love. Lea and Georg, guided by the stronger and more spiritual natures of their sisters, whom both idolise, share the opinion of these that love should be ideal, should lead us to the ether of Platonism instead of into the muddy regions of matrimony. And so both, with breaking hearts, after a single kiss of avowal, part. True, Georg afterwards revolts and comes to Paris to claim his bride. This scene, which is powerful by its extraordinary cruelty and brevity, ends Frédérique. Georg in Italy, whither he went in search of forgetfulness, has learnt that love has a deeper and more ineffaceable significance than the sentimental dalliance of Platonism, and Frédérique ungenerously uses this knowledge in the duel between him and her for the possession of Lea. Pirnitz, the teacher and guide of the girls, is called upon to decide between them, and is quite as remorseless as Frédérique in the presence of two young breaking hearts. I own I like neither the admirable Pirnitz nor the implacable Frédérique in this scene. Some pity is due to erring love, and the error of Georg was of so slight a nature, considering the circumstances, as to claim silence and not chastisement. These pure women uncandidly exaggerate it to work upon Lea's pride, and when the penitent and tortured lover advances and cries to her: "I swear to you, Lea, that you have been my one and only love"—an oath in this case simple truth—the poor girl flings out her arms and cries: "Don't touch me." In vain he adjures her not to break two lives for a trifle, not to be guided by women who would imprison her heart. She sends him away with all the reader's sympathy, and Frédérique salutes her triumph over love as a moral grandeur. The novel is a pure and lofty work of imagination; but herein lies the initial error of its doctrine: Frédérique is revoltingly harsh and proud.

Correspondence.

The Title to a Title.

SIR,—You have proved yourself a friend so constant and generous to those who have not yet abandoned the pen for the sword that I am tempted to ask you to lend me the ear of your readers for a moment's space. Quite lately a letter appeared in your columns drawing attention to several recent cases of plagiarism in the matter of book titles, wherein my name was cited as being one of the sufferers. My case, briefly stated, is as follows: In December of last year I published a book called Sidelights on South Africa, now in its third edition. A few weeks ago Lady Sykes brought out a volume on the same subject, which she calls Sidelights on the War in South Africa. On the appearance of her book my publishers, Messrs. Sampson Low & Marston, wrote to Mr. Fisher Unwin protesting against this flagrant assumption of my title, and I myself wrote to Lady Sykes pointing out two cases in which friends who had ordered my book at the libraries had received hers instead. But, although Mr. Unwin expressed his willingness to change it, Lady Sykes has refused to discontinue the use of my title for her book on the ground that she considers the two names "as dissimilar as are their contents." I am quite prepared to admit that the contents are dissimilar, but the titles are, I contend, practically identical, and likely to confuse the public. In this opinion I am fortified by such experienced booksellers as Mr. Humphrey, of Hatchard's, and Mr. Bumpus. I may, at the same time, point out that neither Lady Sykes nor Mr. Fisher Unwin have alleged ignorance of my work as an explanation of their choice of title.

The legal aspect of this matter is interesting, and, I think, not generally understood. Although, as your correspondent writes, there is no copyright in the title of a book, there most certainly is property in it. Copinger in his standard work, The Law of Copyright, is most distinct about this point. He says: "There can be no doubt that there is in a title a right capable of protection, and in the case of Bell's Life this right was asserted by Vice-Chancellor Stuart to be a right of property." The case of Weldon v. Dicks still further bears out this view. In 1873 the Rev. Henry Palmer published a novel called Trial and Triumph, a title "adopted by the defendant in entire ignorance that it had ever been used by any other person or applied to any other work. The defendant's work was entirely distinct in its plot and subject-matter from the plaintiff's book. It also appeared that both before and after the date of the first publication by the plaintiff of his books, more than one book was published by other persons under the same title, or one substantially the same." Vice-Chancellor Malins held that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction.

It will, therefore, easily be seen that, regarding a title as literary property, it is—to quote Copinger once more—"usually considered that, as the injury caused by the infringement is an injury to property, the fraudulent intent is not necessary to prove." In other words, the law gives protection to the title of a book not so much for the sake of the author as to prevent the public being deceived into buying a book under the impression that it is buying one previously published with the same or "substantially the same" title. Various attempts have, of course, been made to secure a copyright for the titles as well as for the contents of books, but this is a matter of extreme difficulty. In the report of the Select Committee appointed in 1898 to consider Lord Herschell's Copyright Amendment Bill, this point was brought forward by Mr. Daldy, who gave evidence in his capacity as Secretary to the Copyright Association. The question had been previously raised in the Trade Marks Act and not satisfactorily disposed of. On this occasion it was again shelved, at the suggestion of Lord Thring. It is believed by many authors that if some scheme could be devised by which the names of books could be registered the duplication of titles through ignorance would be obviated. This remedy was also discussed by the Commission of 1898, Mr. G. H. Thring giving evidence on behalf of the Society of Authors. But here again nothing was done. The most natural places where such registration might be effected are the British Museum or Stationers' Hall; but both these institutions have brought forward innumerable and to some extent incontrovertible reasons why neither of them should be troubled with the organisation of a system whereby the names of the multitudinous army of volumes produced year by year might be inscribed and thus protected from piracy.

But, as I have already stated, legal machinery is not really lacking by which those who use the name of a book already in circulation may be compelled to surrender it. It remains with the original proprietor of such title to set that machinery in motion, for the safeguard of literary property in general no less than for the protection of individual interest.

SIR,—It is not pleasant to find that one has used a title already adopted by another author, if only on account of one's ignorance appearing hardly a compliment to the writer aggrieved. In the case, however, which your correspondent last week brings home to me, I hope the grievance is reduced to a minimum by the insignificance of the story of mine to which she refers. The letter is headed "Book Titles," and it might from that be inferred that my story was a book, as is the work of Mr. Bennett's, against whose title I have trespassed. May I point out that this is fortunately not so? The fact of my "slender performance" being but an ephemeral story of some four thousand words may, I trust, remove the worst of the mishap and form something of an apology to the author and publisher whose rights I unwittingly infringed.—I am, &c.,

Novels and Logic.

SIR,—The Ignoratio Elenchi still persists. My fair adversary not only attacks a position which I never held, but officially announces that I have evacuated the post, and come over to her side. I never said anything against great works of fiction, from the Odyssey to Vanity Fair. What I did say was that we now produce little that commands a sale except novels. What I said, or did not say, is of infinitesimal importance. But it is important that logicians of either sex should know what the thesis of their adversary is; should not attribute to him a thesis which he never held, and then assault that.

I still think, pace Miss Forbes-Robertson, that "all the works of Thucydides" are likely to outlive those even of Mr. Meredith and Mr. James. But this is a mere opinion; perhaps, in A.D. 2000, What Maisie Knew or The Amazing Marriage will be eagerly asked for, while the historian of the Sicilian Expedition, or the philosopher who describes the death of Socrates, will be entirely forgotten. The Platonic Dialogues and the Muses of Herodotus "are but glorified school-books" in Miss Forbes-Robertson's opinion, as I understand her. I dare say that many ladies are of her mind.—I am, &c.,

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

GRANT ALLEN: A MEMOIR.

BY EDWARD CLODD.

We refer elsewhere to this biography, which is comprised in little more than 200 pages. Mr. Clodd closes his narrative with the fine and familiar lament:

They told me, Heraclitus, they told me you were dead;
They brought me bitter news to hear, and bitter tears to shed;

I wept as I remembered how often you and I
Had tired the sun with talking, and sent him down the sky.

And now that thou art lying, my dear old Carian guest,
A handful of grey ashes, laid long ago at rest,
Still are thy pleasant voices, thy nightingales, awake;
For Death, he taketh all away, but these he cannot take.

(Grant Richards.)

VILLAGE NOTES, AND SOME OTHER PAPERS.

BY PAMELA TENNANT.

Mrs. Tennant, who is one of the three ladies in Mr. Sargent's great picture in this year's Academy Exhibition, has gathered into this volume some sketches of country life which she contributed to the Outlook. Charming made up into a book, and illustrated with photogravures, these sketches look inviting. "There is a village I know of in South Wilts," Mrs. Tennant begins, "in whose cottages I have heard many things said worth recording—of humour, intentional, or otherwise, and of pathos, real and deep." (Heinemann.)

RECOLLECTIONS OF MY LIFE.

BY SIR JOSEPH FAYRER, BART.

Sir Joseph Fayrer is one of the most celebrated of army doctors. He entered the Bengal Medical Service in 1850, and served in the first Burmese War, and through the Indian Mutiny. He was in Lucknow during its beleaguering. His writings have hitherto been purely medical; but his long and varied life and its recreations, which have included big-game shooting in India, have furnished material for a bulky volume of reminiscences in which there is an abundance of exciting incidents. (Blackwood.)

SOCIAL LIFE IN THE BRITISH ARMY.

BY A BRITISH OFFICER.

A very interesting subject is treated of in this book. We are given many particulars about the inner life of a British regiment, its guest nights, its polo matches, the cost of chargers and outfits, points of etiquette, and what not. When the social life of the officers' mess has been described, we are introduced to the rank and file, to the married quarters, the canteen, the cricket match, the Sergeants' Ball, &c., &c. The author says: "In the army it is fully recognised that 'all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy.'" The book is dedicated, by permission, to Lord Wolseley, and is admirably illustrated by Mr. R. Caton Woodville. (John Long. 6s.)

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 37 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best epigrammatic verse of four lines connecting an old author with the present day. We are disappointed with the results. We award the prize to Mr. T. Constable, Hurstwood, Buxton, for the following epigram:

POPE.

I saw the shade of Pope as Mudie's guest,
 I saw it read, mark, learn—almost digest—
 Ten thousand tomes, then heard it wail in pain:
 "Would I might write my 'Danciad' yet again!"

Other replies are as follows:

DR. JONATHAN SWIFT TO GEORGE MEREDITH.

"The friable and the grumous, dizzards both!"
 Why blunt with pedantry the dart you fling?
 I plied my mother-tongue, and by my troth
 When I displayed the fang, men felt the sting.

[R. F. McC., Whitby.]

BURNS.

"A man's a man." Why, so he is!
 That's not enough to tell, sir.
 What Moderns want to know is this:
 Are women men as well, sir?

[T. B., Cheltenham.]

DEFOE.

Oh, Boy of the Past! with what rapture you read
 Of your Isle Hero's skill, and his food and his bed;
 Dear Crusoe! your island, yourself and your Co.,
 By tale-pampered lads are to-day voted "slow."

[C. M. D., London.]

SAMUEL RICHARDSON.

Oh! Richardson, what would thy Pamela say,
 Who at the word stocking blush'd rosy red?
 Could she read of poor "Tees" or "The Woman who Did,"
 She'd swoon right away, or go off her head!

[G. H., Didsbury.]

SHAKESPEARE.

I've frequently thought, If the dead could awaken
 What perfectly glorious times there would be;
 If Shakespeare, for instance, and Francis Bacon
 Could dine with Donnelly and Sidney Lee.

[C. E. H., Richmond.]

LORD CHESTERFIELD.

Preceptor, in a school of manners dead,
 Of wisdom, wit, and social dealing;
 Our ease, to courtesy most lightly wed,
 Might shock you, still you would hide your feeling.

[M. T., London.]

SIR THOMAS BROWNE.

All writing's changed, quaint, kindly Browne, since thou,
 In moments spare, wrote thy dust-smelling tomes;
 How would a Doyle write Hydrinthaphia now,
 Or thou indite another Sherlock Holmes?

[H. W. D., London.]

SHAKESPEARE.

Sweet-singing Shakespeare, would'st thou not be Sad in thine heart if the seraphs told thee
 That to day, on the star that thou blest by thy birth,
 If ten take thee up, but one sees thy worth!

[L. F., Manchester.]

SIR WALTER SCOTT—RUDYARD KIPLING.

'Twas his, the Wizard of the North, to wave his wondrous wand,
 And make our fathers breathe the air of moor and heatherland,
 Like him, whose burning genius now wafts us from afar
 The scent of spicy blossoms beneath an Eastern star.

[C. B., Bristol.]

ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON.

Ah, noble departed! our Alfred "The Great,"
 How it grieves us you took every tittle
 Of your spirit of song, when you joined the great throng,
 And you left none for Alfred "The Little"!

[L. L., Ramsgate.]

THOMAS CARLYLE.

Plain dealer in the "rough-hew'd granite" style,
 How you would vince could you return awhile
 To earth, and scan the modern wares we view—
 Fiction by Fowler, Hall Caine, and Le Queux!

[Z. McC., Whitby.]

WORDSWORTH AND REALISM.

Wordsworth, progenitor of realistic art,
 Realism did to thee infinite good reveal;
 We, the fin siècle, make prostitute our art:
 Sink goodness in oblivion, proclaiming evil real.

[A. M. P., Hampstead.]

SIR WALTER SCOTT.

Great maker of Romance, you hit the tune,
 And thousands, with variations, followed after;
 Your day of glory has not come to noon:
 Their mock heroics make a moment's laughter.

Competition No. 38 (New Series).

DR. F. J. FURNIVALL writes to us as follows:

In the Johnson Club Papers, 1899, p. 161, my friend, George Radford, writes of the great Doctor:

"His first love was Olivia Lloyd, who charmed him while he was at the school at Stourbridge. From Boswell's statement that she was a 'young Quaker,' it is clear that she was both beautiful and demure; and her very name is a melody. No wonder Johnson loved her; and his love was not inarticulate, for he told her so in what Boswell calls somewhat brutally 'a copy of verses.' These early verses have perished, and we cannot, alas! redeem them from oblivion by the sacrifice of, say, half-a-dozen mature 'Rambles.'"

It would be a charming task for your clever contributors, recollecting that the boy is father of the man, to reproduce these verses.

We agree that this task may well be attempted; and we offer a prize of One Guinea for the poem, not exceeding sixteen lines, which seems to reproduce Johnson's poem most nearly.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, June 12. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

THE CHICAMON STONE:

A Legend of the Yukon Basin.

By CLIVE PHILLIPPS-WOLLEY,

Author of "One of the Broken Brigade," &amp;c.

PUNCH.—"The Chicamon Stone" is a succession of pictures of one of the weirdest parts of the world. In power, in simplicity, in occasional grandeur, it is worthy of the theme. My Baronite, brought up on Fenimore Cooper, ruefully admits what a stagey creature he was compared with Clive Phillipps-Wolley."

The Literary Week.

IN accordance with our annual custom we devote a supplement this week to topographical and guide-book literature. The production of guide-books, as of general literature, seems to have been greatly checked by the war. However, as a set off, Mr. Newnes is about to launch a new sixpenny monthly illustrated magazine, devoted to the interests of tourists, and called The Traveller. An advance copy of the first number which lies before us is filled with varied and useful matter. Among the permanent features will be "Travel Notes and News," "In the Hotels," "What to Wear Abroad," "Peeps into New Books," "Tours through the Shops," "Sunday Morning Notes," &c., &c. The special articles are well chosen, and altogether The Traveller promises to be a most helpful counsellor and an entertaining friend.

THE Elizabethan Stage Society will give its last performance of the season next Friday evening, in the Lecture Theatre, Burlington Gardens, when Schiller's "Death of Wallenstein," translated by Samuel Taylor Coleridge, will be performed.

AMONG the novels that have reached us lately we had set aside Charlotte Leyland for a special review on account of certain qualities which distinguished it. The review was in preparation when we received the following communication from Mr. Grant Richards, the publisher of the book: "I published on May 22 Charlotte Leyland, by M. Bowles, of which a copy was sent you on that day for review. Since its publication I have learnt that one of the characters is so drawn as to constitute a libel against a lady well-known in London society. Her solicitors threaten me with proceedings unless I withdraw the book from circulation, which I am now doing; they also ask me to warn you against reviewing the book in its present shape." As the three chief characters in Charlotte Leyland revolve in orbits very far removed from "London Society," and as the story is mainly concerned with them, we hope that the book will be republished after the excisions that "constitute a libel" have been made. It would be a great pity if such excellent and promising work were to be denied the recognition that Miss Bowles deserves.

JUST now, when the peace of the world is threatened by "The Yellow Peril," it is interesting to turn to the pages of a work which aroused considerable attention at the time of its publication seven years ago—Mr. Charles H. Pearson's National Life and Character: a Forecast. This writer was "obsessed" apparently by the idea, which he explains in his work, that the Chinese whose resources he considered immense, the capacity of their people for toil unlimited, and their wants of the slenderest, would eventually dominate the universe—that China's flag would float on every sea, and her naval officers visit every port as honoured guests. He says:

The day will come, and perhaps is not far distant, when the European observer will look round to see the globe girdled with a continuous zone of the black and yellow racés, no longer too weak for aggression, or under tutelage, but independent, or practically so, in government, monopolising the trade of their own regions, and circumscribing the industry of the European; when Chinamen and the natives of Hindostan, the States of Central and South America, by that time predominantly Indian, and it may be African nations of the Congo and the Zambesi, under a dominant caste of foreign rulers, are represented by fleets in the European seas, invited to international conferences, and welcomed as allies in the quarrels of the civilised world. The citizens of these countries will then be taken up into the social relations of the white races, will throng the English turf, or the salons of Paris, and will be admitted to intermarriage. It is idle to say that, if all this should come to pass, our pride of place will not be humiliated. We were struggling among ourselves for supremacy in a world which we thought of as destined to belong to Aryan races and to the Christian faith: to the letters, and arts, and charm of social manners which we have inherited from the best times of the past. We shall wake to find ourselves elbowed and hustled, and perhaps even thrust aside, by people whom we looked upon as servile, and thought of as bound always to minister to our needs.

A line from Bret Harte irresistibly suggests itself to us.

The Ladysmith Treasury is the title of a volume of stories which Messrs. Sands & Co. announce for immediate publication. The book is dedicated to Sir George White, and it is intended to forward the profits arising from the sale to the Mayor of Ladysmith for the relief of the distress caused by the siege. The following authors have contributed stories: F. Anstey, Joseph Conrad, Bernard Capes, Edgar Fawcett, Francis Gribble, Robert Machray, Ian Maclaren, F. Frankfort Moore, W. E. Norris, Eden Phillpotts, Edwin Pugh, Morley Roberts, Gabriel Setoun, H. A. Vachell, Percy White, and "Zack." The volume has been edited by Mr. J. Eveleigh Nash.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "Dowson's 'I have been true to thee, Cynara, in my fashion,' which you quote in last week's ACADEMY, is merely a Swinburnian translation of Mr. Burnand's comic lyric, 'His heart was true to Poll.' Don't you remember how he strayed first with Bet and then with Sal, then with Susan and then with Moll; but all the time, wherever his kisses might be, 'his heart was true to Poll'?"

WE understand that Mr. Robert Barr will finish the romance of Irish life which Mr. Crane left uncompleted.

MR. H. G. WELLS, whose new novel, Love and Mr. Lewisham, is attracting very favourable notice, has finished a long story called "The First Men in the Moon." It will begin in the Strand Magazine next January.

"C. K. S.," who recently announced in the Sphere that what is called Bramwell Brontë's chair at the "Black Bull," Haworth, was for sale, now states that the price asked is £100; but he adds, "I do not for the life of me understand why the most enthusiastic admirer of the Brontë sisters should offer £100 for a chair in which . . . their very worthless brother was so frequently in the cups."

Mr. W. D. HOWELLS's pronouncements on the art of the Novel have been many, but they are always lucid and interesting. In a recent after-dinner speech he said some sensible things about the "many-headed." Thus Mr. Howells:

He is a terrible fellow, the average man, but there are a great many of him; and it is worth while trying to find out his secret, if he has one.

The difficulty is not to make him like the best, but to give him the best. In this case, as in so many others, the law of demand and supply works backward, and the demand follows the supply. We must in all these things rely upon education, but education that begins with the artists, as with those who write and paint and build, as those who model and carve. When I see people reading the nine hundred and ninety-ninth thousand of the latest historical romance, my heart sinks; but I do not lose my faith that, when some great novelist divines how to report human nature as truly as such romances report it falsely, people will read him too in the nine hundred and ninety-ninth thousand. I do not say that they will think his novel greater than those romances; probably they will not. . . . But, happily, that is not the artist's affair, in either art; his affair is to do a beautiful and true thing so simply and directly that the average man will not miss the meaning and the pleasure of it.

We have conceived a great respect for the Free Public Library of Wigan. The number of books in its collection must, we think, be far ahead of that possessed by most provincial libraries. A bulky volume of the catalogue has reached us which we supposed comprised the whole library until our eye fell on the words "Letter L Only" printed on the cover. Wigan Library is rich in L's. There are 350 pages of books whose titles or subjects begin with L. The collection of books about London possessed by Wigan is large, though we notice that many cross entries swell the list. The collection of Law books, too, seems amazingly rich to any one who knows Wigan only by the buns in its railway refreshment room. They far exceed those classed under Life, where, however, the titles lack nothing of variety:

Life, a Comedy.
Life, after Death.
Life, Adventures, and Amours.
Life, Conduct of Life.
Life, Future Life.
Life in London.
Life in Normandy.
Life, Holy Life, the Beauty of Christianity.
Life, High Life Below Stairs.
Life of a Bird.
Life of an Insect.
Life, Miseries of Human Life.
Life, Pleasures of Life.
Life Tables, &c., &c.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL & Co. will next week begin their series of "Westminster Biographies" with a monograph on Robert Browning, by Mr. Arthur Waugh. The series is of the dainty order, the volumes being delicately bound in leather. In length the biographies are of about 25,000 words apiece, and they seek to give clear but simple pictures of their subjects, selecting striking points only, and avoiding tedious detail. The volumes will be in two forms, at half-a-crown and two shillings, and fit easily into the pocket.

THE Guild of Handicraft has issued its sixth publication, an edition of Shakespeare's poems in the orthography of the early editions with initial letters, "bloomers" they are called, by Mr. Reginald Savage. The book is a fine piece of typography, and is bound in limp vellum with tapes to fasten it. Such books have their lovers, but we are not among them. The initial letters—one is attached to each stanza and sonnet throughout the volume—do but vex our eyes with their endless array and importunate blackness. But it is a matter of taste, and tastes differ profoundly.

A CORRESPONDENT who has enjoyed Mr. Thomas Secombe's article on M. Anatole France (to which we referred three weeks ago) would like ACADEMY readers to share his enjoyment of the following "delicious ironical portrait, by M. France, of the antiquary, Pignonneau." The translation is Mr. Secombe's. M. Pignonneau speaks:

"I have consecrated my entire life, as is well known, to the study of Egyptian archaeology, nor have my labours been sterile. I can say, without self-flattery, that my Memoir upon the Handle of an Egyptian Mirror in the Louvre Museum may still be consulted with advantage, though it was one of my earliest productions. . . . Encouraged by the flattering reception accorded to my studies by colleagues at the Institut, I was tempted for a moment to embark upon a work of a much wider scope—no less than a broad survey of the weights and measures in use at Alexandria under the reign of Ptolemy Auletes (80-52 B.C.). But I recognised very soon that a subject so general and so vast is not in any way adapted for treatment by a genuine man of science, and that serious scholarship could undertake it only at the risk of finding itself compromised amid all kinds of adventures. I felt that in considering several subjects at one and the same time I was abandoning the fundamental principle of an archaeologist. If to-day I confess my error, if I avow the inconceivable enthusiasm which launched me upon a project so extravagant, I do it in the interest of the young student, who will learn from my example to subdue his imagination. It is likely to be his most cruel enemy; for the scholar who has not succeeded in stifling the imagination within him is for ever lost to science. I shudder still when I think of the chasms over which I was dangled by my adventurous spirit in this (happily) transitory ardour for general ideas. I was within an ace of what is called History! What an abyss! I was upon the point of falling into Art. For History is really no more, or at best only a specious and false science. Is it not a matter of common knowledge to-day that the historian has preceded the archaeologist, just as the astrologer has preceded the astronomer, the alchemist the chemist—nay, as the ape has preceded the man? But, thank heaven! I got off with a fright."

IN the current Argosy appears this very interesting letter of Harrison Ainsworth's:

Kensal Manor House, Harrow-road, London,
 April 7, 1842.

MY DEAR DR. E.,—You must excuse a very short note in answer to your kind and sympathising letter, because I am much pressed for time, and am, of necessity, obliged to abridge all my correspondence. You ask me how much I have made by my literary exertions in one year. I will just put down the positive gains of last year:

Old St. Paul's .....	£1,000	0	0
Editorship, Bentley .....	612	0	0
For Guy Fawkes .....	150	0	0
Tower of London (about).....	300	0	0
	£2,062 0 0

by which you will see that I made upwards of £2,000 in that year. By similar exertions I could make the same amount in any year. . . .

W. HARRISON AINSWORTH.

The last sentence is delightfully sanguine and matter of fact. But Ainsworth wrote when the tastes of readers changed less rapidly than now.

MR. HERMAN MERIVALE has been given a pension on the Civil List by Mr. Balfour. It is stated that Mr. Merivale has been a sufferer in one of the recent failures of London solicitors which have attracted so much attention. For some years Mr. Merivale was editor of the Annual Register, a position once occupied by Edmund Burke. His plays, novels, and verses have been numerous.

A REACTION against the Omar Khayyám cult is bound to set in. It has, in fact, already set in. In the People's Friend Mr. A. H. Miller discusses, somewhat trenchantly, the fragmentary records of Omar, and the few and late texts of his poem; and he asks:

What can one make of a poem (or set of verses) whose supposed author may have died either in 1090 or 1126, whose poetical writings were absolutely unknown in the East—in his native Persia as well as in India—until the present century; whose text is so indefinite that it varies from 632 lines to 2064 lines, and the oldest copy of whose verses was confessedly written nearly four centuries after his death? The most devoted professor of Higher Criticism would give up such a problem in absolute despair.

Possibly, though we should hesitate to put a limit to the patience of a professor of the Higher Criticism. In any case FitzGerald's poem—be it what it may in relation to Omar—can, and does, stand on its own merits, which are many and deep and, we believe, lasting. Mr. Miller continues:

The Omar of the quatrains was a Pantheist, and disowned the Monotheism of Mahomet: he was a fatalist who believed in no hereafter, but preached the Epicurean method of enjoying to-day and caring nothing for to-morrow. He was a wine-bibber, though the Mahometan creed bound him to abstinence from wine, and it is possible that his hopeless heresy led him to pen such a stanza as this!

Yesterday this Day's Madness did prepare;
To-morrow's Silence, Triumph, or Despair:
Drink! for you know not whence you came, nor why;
Drink! for you know not why you go, nor where.

Omar's fatalism was not that of the true Son of the Faithful, who looked for a positive reward hereafter for the deeds done in his body. The poet scoffed bitterly at every such delusion. . . .

There is not much comfort in the mournful pessimism of such a creed, and it seems strangely out of harmony with the spirit of an age which has witnessed many fervent religious revivals, and has carefully avoided the pitfalls of Atheism and Materialism. Hence it is probable that the Omarism which has suddenly burst forth within these few years will rapidly sink into oblivion; and the next generation, as the present, will prefer the calm, steady faith of Tennyson's "In Memoriam" and "Crossing the Bar," to the heartless, hopeless, impotent despair of the "Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám."

Surely Mr. Miller protests too much. Many read Omar, but who takes him for a guide? In the varied moods and situations of life one teacher and then another shall prevail, one message and then another seem good. Job's friends, as well as Job, speak wisdom.

It is not generally known that "Comedy and Tragedy," which Miss Janette Steer revived with "Pygmalion and Galatea" at the Comedy Theatre on Thursday, originally appeared as a short story which Mr. W. S. Gilbert contributed to a theatrical annual edited by Mr. Clement Scott, called "The Stage Door," in 1879.

THE literary fecundity of Leigh Hunt is hardly appreciated in these days, when only his essays and his Town are read, and these by few people. Striking evidence of his industry is afforded by Messrs. Sotheby's catalogue of the library of the late Mr. Francis Harvey, in which no fewer than seventy-two works by Leigh Hunt are set down.

A WRITER in the Pall Mall Gazette has made an interesting collection of common misquotations. We take leave to make a selection from his list, which we fancy contains accusations for almost everybody. In the following examples the misquotation comes first, then the correct rendering:

"The tongue is an unruly member."—"But the tongue can no man tame; it is an unruly evil." (James iii. 8.)

"Charity covereth a multitude of sins."—"Charity shall cover the multitude of sins." (1 Peter iv. 8. Rev. Vers.: "Love covereth a multitude of sins.")

"A little knowledge is a dangerous thing."—"A little learning is a dangerous thing." (Pope. Essay on Criticism. Misquoters are hereby given notice that Pope was a man of intelligence, and did not write nonsense.)

"A man convinced against his will Will hold the same opinion still."—"He that complies against his will Is of his own opinion still." (Butler. Hudibras. Part III. Butler also was a man of intelligence.)

"Make assurance doubly sure."—"Make assurance double sure." ("Macbeth." Act IV. Sc. i.)

"Benedict the married man" should be "Benedick the married man." ("Much Ado about Nothing.")

"Falleth as the gentle dew."—"Droppeth as the gentle rain." ("Merchant of Venice." Act IV. Sc. 1.)

"The man that hath no music in his soul."—"The man that hath no music in himself." (Ibid. Act V. Sc. 1.)

"Falls like Lucifer Never to rise again."—"Falls like Lucifer Never to hope again." ("Henry VIII." Act III. Sc. 2.)

"Thick as autumn leaves in Vallombrosa."—"Thick as autumnal leaves that strew the brooks in Vallombrosa." (Milton, Paradise Lost, Book I.)

"Fresh fields and pastures new."—"Fresh woods and pastures new." (Milton, Lycidas.)

"Just cause and impediment."—"Cause or just impediment." (Book of Common Prayer.)

"The even tenour of their way."—"The noiseless tenour of their way." (Gray's Elegy.)

In his Nature in Downland, which we review elsewhere, Mr. W. H. Hudson tells, with some relish, the story of the dedication which Gilpin affixed to his last book on forestry, in which he abused the Sussex Downs. It was inscribed, says Mr. Hudson, to the memory of a still living wife, the faithful companion of his rambles for over fifty years. Of course he quite expected that she would be gone before the book was out; but he was greatly mistaken, just like the rogues who lied in the famous ballad of the mad dog and the man who was bitten by it. He it was, even Gilpin, who died, leaving his good wife alive and well to publish the book, dedication and all.

WHEN literature falls into the hands of the professional joke-maker—say the joke-maker of the Chicago Times-Herald—the effect is that of lions jumping through hoops. According to the above paper:

The most cheerful author is Samuel Smiles.

The noisiest author—Howells.

The tallest author—Longfellow.

The most flowery author—Hawthorne.

The holiest author—Pope.

The most amusing author—Thomas Tickell.

The happiest author—Gay.

The most fiery author—Burns.

The most talkative author—Chatterton.

The most distressed author—Akenside.

MR. RICHARD LE GALLIENNE, who has ere now compared the nightjar to Browning and the nightingale to Tennyson, says of the former bird in his new book, Travels in England: "He is seldom mentioned in poetry; indeed, almost all the important references to him are to be found in the writings of Mr. George Meredith. It was the nightjar, not the nightingale, I like to think, that was in the wood that holy night with Lucy and Richard; and the nightjar is the chosen bird of 'Love in the Valley.'"

Bibliographical.

No one will grudge Mr. Herman Merivale the Civil List pension which, it is said, has been bestowed upon him. It may be quite true that his contributions to literature pure and simple have not been very numerous or very important. Two prose fictions and two volumes of verse—these, with collaboration in a little Life of Thackeray, represent, I believe, the bulk of his published output in the belles lettres. Faust of Baliol (1882) is most notable, perhaps, as being based upon, or the basis of (which is it?), the play by Mr. Merivale which has been represented on the stage under no fewer than three titles—"The Modern Faust," "The Cynic," and "The Lover." "Binko's Blues," the other story, came out in 1884. It had been preceded by The White Pilgrim, and Other Poems (1883), which, again, was followed by Florien, and Other Poems. "The White Pilgrim" is a play in verse, the scenario of which was furnished by Gilbert Arthur à Becket. This piece was duly performed rather more than a quarter of a century ago. "Florien" also is a play of verse, but has never, I believe, been acted. Nevertheless, it is by his dramatic works that Mr. Merivale is best and most deservedly known. "The Modern Faust" is no longer in the current theatrical repertory; nor are "A Son of the Soil" and "Peacock's Holiday" (both adaptations), "The Lord of the Manor" (founded upon "Wilhelm Meister"), or "Civil War" (from the French). On the other hand, "All for Her" and "Forget Me Not," written in collaboration, are often in demand; "The Butler" and "The Don" (written with Mrs. Merivale) may be revived by some follower of Mr. Toole; and "Ravenswood," a dramatisation of "The Bride of Lammermoor," may some day be reproduced by Mr. Henry Irving. Personally, I think Mr. Merivale was at his best in the burlesque which he called "The Lady of Lyons Married and Settled." In the "book" of that diverting piece will be found some humorous and witty verses which, in literary quality, run the best work of Mr. W. S. Gilbert very close.

Somebody has been saying—apropos of the thirtieth anniversary of Dickens's death—that the author of Pickwick is not read nowadays, and sundry heads of public libraries have hastened to tell us that he is read, supporting their assertion by reference to the records of books by Dickens which have been "taken out" by their clients. That, I think, is irrefragable testimony. I could, in my capacity of bibliographer, recount to you a long list of recent editions of Dickens's works; but it does not follow because a book is published that it is read. People buy editions of the classics—as they buy any other furniture—to look well. Dickens's works are among "the books that no gentleman's library should be without," but I doubt very much if the "gentleman" bestows much, if any, time upon them. I find among the conventionally "educated" members of the new generation a large ignorance of Dickens. I find, moreover, among the educated members of the elder generation a marked disinclination to read Dickens over again. On the other hand, you have this undoubted demand for Dickens among the class which "takes out" books from public libraries. The conclusion is obvious. Dickens is "read," but mainly by "the people." Your "cultured" person prefers Thackeray. I do myself. But I can quite believe that Dickens, if he is conscious of his present vogue in England, is quite satisfied with the direction it has taken.

I am glad to note that the managers of the Irish Literary Theatre propose to give this year a representation of Calderon's "Purgatory of St. Patrick," as translated by Denis Florence McCarthy, and published, with other translations from Calderon, in 1853. McCarthy did much to make the Spanish dramatist known to English readers. Beside the volume named, which contained six plays, there was one, containing three plays, printed in 1861; another, devoted to one play, comprising "The Two Lovers of Heaven," appeared in 1870; and in 1873 there came a third, containing three plays. In fact, so far as bulk goes, McCarthy's versions of Calderon are more considerable than those of Omar FitzGerald, who, I fancy, tackled and "freely translated" only eight of the master's dramas.

Attention has been drawn to the opinions on savage as opposed to civilised life expressed by the late Major Thruston, whose account of his "personal experiences in Egypt and "Unyoro" has just been published by Mr. Murray. Major Thruston had thought of ending his days in this country, but soon, he says, "began to think that the advantages of a residence in England were perhaps somewhat overrated. The climate was vile, the natives were yahoos, dirty in their persons, and rude in their manners; their restrictions I found tedious, their conventionalities artificial and insufferable." So once more the major volunteered for work in Africa. As regards his appreciation of the so-called "savage," he would have found R. L. Stevenson a man after his own heart, and would have read with pleasure what Stevenson wrote from Honolulu in 1889: "I love the Polynesian: this civilisation of ours is a dingy, ungentlemanly business; it drops out too much of man, and too much of the very beauty of the poor beast." (Letters ii. 153.)

"When they do agree on the stage, their unanimity is wonderful." Thus it is that no sooner does one leading English actress announce that she is about to appear in a play having Nell Gwyn for its heroine, than another leading actress comes out with a similar announcement. Why this sudden and simultaneous interest in Nell? Mr. Frankfort Moore has just made her the central figure of a novel, thus following immediately in the wake of Mr. Anthony Hope. The worst of it is that the Nell Gwyn of the stage is not at all likely to be the Nell of history; and it is to be hoped that all those people who witness the two promised plays will straightway betake themselves to Peter Cunningham's memoir of the actress, therein to discover what sort of woman she really was. The memoir, it may be remembered, was reprinted a few years ago, with Cunningham's latest corrections and a useful introduction by Mr. H. B. Wheatley. That is the edition which should be consulted by the playgoer.

Talking of plays, I see that a London actor-manager is going to revive the drama which Charles Reade based upon Tennyson's "Dora." Altogether, our late Laureate has provided the foundations for a good many dramatic works. He suggested Mr. Gilbert's "Princess"; there are several stage versions of "Enoch Arden"; two Americans wrote a play about "Elaine"; and Mr. Comyns Carr's "King Arthur" reflected the tone and influence of Tennyson rather than those of Malory. Another poet-dramatist comes to the fore in a few days, when the Elizabethan Stage Society will perform the Schiller-Coleridge "Death of Wallenstein." Why not give us the whole trilogy, presenting the three plays on successive days? The enterprise would be worthy of the inexhaustible energy of Mr. Poel, who is always so enthusiastic about the "literary" play.

The latest autobiographer in M. A. P. is Mr. Freeman Wills, who tells us what he saw and did "in the days of his youth." He had already done something of the sort in the opening chapters of his memoir of his brother—W. G. Wills—to which book, by the way, he makes no reference in his article, though it is probably the work by which he will be remembered when The Only Way and such-like have gone into oblivion.

The Unproven.

The Unknown. By Camille Flammarion. (Harper Bros.)

M. FLAMMARION is a most distinguished astronomer, in which capacity he has lately attended the expedition sent by the French Government to observe the solar eclipse at Lisbon. He has also always had the courage of his opinions, as when he last year dissociated himself from the spirit-rappers, who had till then quoted him as their most famous convert. For which reasons we are inclined to treat The Unknown with more attention than it seems to be entitled to from intrinsic merit. In this work, which is a none too accurate translation of a French original, published, if we remember rightly, some years back, M. Flammarion gives us one hundred and eighty-one cases where persons of presumed trustworthiness have received what they consider to be communications from friends or relatives at the moment of the death of the latter, he follows this up by a short chapter on Hallucinations—which are, though he does not say so—deceits of the senses pure and simple. He then presents us with a discursive and not very closely reasoned chapter on "Psychic Action," in which he suggests the mode in which the mind of one person can be supposed, without the intervention of the senses, to act upon that of another: and he then plunges into a discussion of dreams, of which he gives instances hardly inferior in number to those which he calls "telepathic manifestations of the dying." A later volume is, we gather, to include cases of communications with the dead and of "presentiments," and the "eternal problem of free will and of destiny" is then to be discoursed upon. But, from the facts he has already collected, M. Flammarion thinks himself entitled to draw "certain preliminary conclusions" of which the following are fair specimens:

One soul [not, it will be observed, "mind"] can influence another soul at a distance, and without the aid of the senses. . . . Many dead persons [the context shows that "the deaths of many persons" is meant] have been told [i.e., announced?] by telepathic communication, by apparitions [subjective or objective], by voices distinctly heard, by songs, noises and movements (real or imaginary), and impressions of different kinds. . . .

There are psychic currents as well as aerial electric and magnetic currents, &c.

The soul, by its interior vision, may see not only what is passing at a great distance, but it may also know in advance what is to happen in the future [the italics are not ours]. The future exists potentially, determined by causes which bring to pass successive events.

These are sufficiently large conclusions, and we feel that the premisses must be correspondingly well founded to bear their weight.

M. Flammarion's premisses, however, break down so completely when examined as to make one wonder whether Frenchmen, in spite of the clearness of thought and expression that they often show, have any idea of what evidence really is. One of his theories is that at the time of death a "vibration" can be set up by the expiring person which can strike the mind or soul [we have seen that he uses the words indifferently] of another at a distance. Looking haphazard into his list of cases, we find [Case cxxx.] that a lady doctor asleep at Lausanne on October 29 was awakened by "little knocks" at her door, which had been left open for the convenience of her cat.

"By chance [she says] my eyes lighted on my cat, who was occupying his usual place at the foot of my bed. He was sitting up, with his fur bristling, trembling and growling. The door was shaken as if by a slight gust of wind, and I saw a figure wrapped in a kind of white gauze, like a veil over some black material. I could not distinctly see the face. She drew near me. I felt a cold shiver pass over me; I heard the cat growl furiously. Instinctively I shut my eyes, and when I reopened them all had disappeared."

Later she hears that a former friend of hers had died ten days before the date of the apparition, of peritonitis, and of course concludes that the vision came to inform her of the fact. Here the evidence is direct, but the death and the mysterious announcement of it did not even correspond in point of time. In other cases the time corresponds, but the evidence is of the kind known as hearsay. Thus we read [Case cxliii.] of a German professor named "Paul L—," who is warned by a mysterious voice that his sister is ill, and the warning being confirmed by telegram, sets out with his mother in a post-chaise.

On their way, about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, M. L— saw the form of his sister suddenly glide by him and brush against him as she passed through the carriage. . . . When they returned home they found that the clock had stopped at the exact hour of their sister's death, and that her picture had fallen at the same time. The portrait had been carefully nailed to the wall, but it had fallen without pulling out the nail.

As it is said in the same letter that M. L. had a firm conviction when his sister appeared to him in the post-chaise that she had died at that very moment, he was no doubt in a proper state of mind to be impressed by the dramatic stopping of the clock and the fall of the picture. But the letter that M. Flammarion produces in evidence is signed, not "Paul L.," but "V. Mouravieff," and written in 1899, whereas M. L.'s experience occurred in 1866. Is any value to be attached to hearsay after a lapse of thirty-three years? In another case (cxviii.) an "old bachelor" writes that when he was twenty-five he was in love with a girl whom her family refused to him.

Dec. 17, 1867.—I was thinking about all this, when the door of my room opened softly, and, almost noiselessly, Marthe entered. . . . Eleven o'clock struck—this I can confidently assert, for I was not sleeping. The vision drew near me, leaned lightly over me, and I tried to seize the young girl's hand. It was icy cold. I uttered a cry, the phantom disappeared, and I found myself holding a glass of cold water in my hand. . . . On the evening of the next day I heard of the death of Marthe, the night before at eleven.

As the poor old gentleman says that he still "thinks constantly of the vision," and that "it haunts his sleep," the suggestions that the vision was a dream caused by the glass of water—a theory that he himself hazards—and that he had by dint of long musing unconsciously invented the correspondence in time, are irresistible. But no common-sense explanation will do for M. Flammarion, and he appends to the story a note that "telepathic influence is much more probable"!

There are, of course, other stories in the book which, in the absence of cross-examination, appear to support M. Flammarion's views better than those that we have quoted. But the fact that these last should be gravely put forward in support of his case is, to our mind, a psychological phenomenon much more marvellous than any he quotes. Its explanation is, perhaps, to be found in a passage in his Conclusion that "the object of these researches is to discover if the soul of man exists as an entity, independent of his body, and if it will survive the destruction of the same." In other words, M. Flammarion, instead of first collecting his facts, and then extracting, if possible, the general law which they reveal, begins with a preconceived theory, and then hunts about for the facts which seem to him to fit it. Had it not been for this inversion of the scientific method, we are sure that a trained observer would never have dreamed of adducing the three cases quoted above in support of any of the conclusions given, and his having done so shows us the besetting fallacy of most of those who receive eagerly stories of apparitions and the like. That the soul of man is inserted into his body, as a celebrated Anglican preacher once said, "like a pin into a pincushion, to fall out at the first shake," is a theory nearly as old as the world, and is at the present moment held by the lowest savages quite as firmly as by the professors of the most sublime religions. Hence we are all, both by heredity and training, pre-disposed to believe in it, and would gladly grasp at anything that might confirm the faith we have received in our childhood. But up to the present, at any rate, this theory receives no confirmation from physical science, and if any such proof does come it seems hardly likely that it will take the shape of doubtfully-authenticated ghost-stories.

Rossetti at Sixteen.

Lenore. By Gottfried August Bürger. Translated from the German by Dante Gabriel Rossetti. (Ellis & Elvey).

This interesting "find" was only made last year. It was known to his brother that Rossetti had translated Bürger's Lenore in 1844, being then only sixteen; but it was believed that the poem (which was only in MS.) had perished. At Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge's sale of 1899, however, a copy turned up, and was bought by Mr. Gilbert J. Ellis. It is now for the first time published, with a preface by the poet's brother, Mr. W. M. Rossetti.

It is not probable the poet would ever himself have given it to the world, for it is not worthy of his maturity. Nevertheless, if not such a version as the adult Rossetti would have owned, its merits as a translation justify the publication, apart from literary curiosity. Bürger's Lenore was one of the first products of the Romantic movement in Germany, started by the study of our own ballad-poetry; and it had great influence in England at the outset of our own Romantic revival, when our ballad-literature was still little known. At the present day it is harder to understand the sensation it made. It has been more often translated than, perhaps, any other German poem. Taylor of Norwich was first, followed by Sir Walter Scott. Both versions, especially Taylor's, are rather adaptations than translations, but Taylor's has some fine features. Of the rest, the only one worth comparison with Rossetti's has escaped Mr. W. M. Rossetti's knowledge in the interesting list which he gives in his preface—that, namely, of Clarence Mangan, the Irish poet.

Rossetti's is certainly a remarkable performance for a youth of sixteen. Mangan's is more faithful to the German, but Rossetti is more uniformly spirited, though Mangan does not lack spirit in particular passages. One wonders if Rossetti had seen the Irish poet's version. One of his two departures from the original metre is the lengthening of the final couplet to four instead of three feet, which is precisely one of Mangan's two divergences from the original metre. Rossetti's metre, however, differs from the original in point of rhythm as well as form; it is, in fact, the rhythm which he afterwards used for his own Rose Mary. At the outset he handles it very vilely, and the translation, from a poetical standpoint, is no less vile. As, for instance:

The Empress and the King,
With ceaseless quarrel tired,
At length relaxed the stubborn hate
Which rivalry inspired.

But as Bürger really comes to business, Rossetti gets into his stride; the more demand is made upon him, the better he writes. His first chance comes with the happily alliterative stanza describing the arrival of the ghostly lover at Lenore's door; and he strives to match its alliteration in English:

But hark to the clatter and the pat pat patter
Of a horse's heavy hoof!
How the steel clanks and rings as the rider springs,
How the echo shouts aloof!
While slightly and lightly the gentle bell
Tingles and jingles softly and well;
And low and clear through the door plank thin
Comes the voice without to the ear within.

But the fifth and sixth lines are novice work compared to the felicitous alliteration of Taylor's version:

But soon she heard a tinkling hand
That twirled at the pin.

Taylor, to be sure, imitated the old ballads, whereas Rossetti has ventured for himself. Then comes one of the test stanzas of the poem; and Rossetti's rendering is decidedly spirited—marred chiefly by the bad third line.

She busked her well, and into the selle
She sprang with nimble haste—
And gently smiling, with a sweet beguiling,
Her white hands clasped his waist:
And hurry, hurry! ring, ring, ring!
To and fro they sway and swing;
Snorting and snuffing they skim the ground,
And the sparks spurt up, and the stones run round.

Rossetti is, again, full of verve in the stanza which has the famous refrain, Taylor's and Scott's imitation (rather than translation) of which we have already quoted:

How flew to the right, how flew to the left,
Trees, mountains, in the race!
How to the left, and the right and the left,
Flew town and market-place!
"What ails my love? the moon shines bright:
Bravely the dead men ride thro' the night.
Is my love afraid of the quiet dead?"
"Ah! let them alone in their dusty bed!"

Not happy, however, is the epithet "quiet dead" for the participators in this spectral ride; and Mangan's last lines are, perhaps, better:

With light-like flight, to left and right,
How fled each hamlet, tower and town!

"Hurrah! the dead ride rapidly!
Beloved, dost dread the shrouded dead?"
"Ah, no! but let them rest!" she said.

In the summons of the dead criminals, Rossetti discards fidelity with fine effect. Four lines of Mangan are, perhaps, superior; certainly closer:

"So ho! poor carcase, down with thee!
Down, king of bones, and follow me!
And thou shalt gaily dance, ho! ho!
Before us when to bed we go."

But thereafter Rossetti carries all before him, at whatever cost of literal adherence.

See, see, see! by the gallows-tree,
As they dance on the wheel's broad hoop,
Up and down, in the gleam of the moon
Half lost, an airy group:
"Ho! ho! mad mob, come hither amain,
And join in the wake of my rushing train;
Come, dance me a dance, ye dancers thin,
Ere the planks of the marriage-bed close us in."

And hush, hush, hush! the dreamy rout
Came close with a ghastly bustle,
Like the whirlwind in the hazel-bush,
When it makes the dry leaves rustle:
And faster, faster! ring, ring, ring!
To and fro they sway and swing;
Snorting and snuffing they skim the ground,
And the sparks spurt up, and the stones run round.

This is about the best thing in the translation, from a poetic standpoint, and one quite recognises in it the true Rossetti. There are two more decidedly fine stanzas, had we space to quote them; and then, with the close of the ride, the translator flags, like the hero's horse. Evidently he had neither heart nor care for the skull and rattle-bones business with which the poem ends; for it is as abominably rendered as it deserves to be. On the whole, in spite of obvious blemishes, the youthful Rossetti has executed perhaps the best translation of Lenore which exists—certainly the most energetic and spirited.

General "Unforeseen."

1815: Waterloo. By Henry Houssaye, Member of the Académie Française. Translated from the Thirty-First French Edition by Arthur Emile Mann, and Edited by A. Euan-Smith. (Adam & Charles Black.)

WE have studied M. Houssaye's remarkable and masterly work with considerable care. Every page turned has but confirmed our first impression. Here, in two paragraphs and a line of figures, is the summary of a monument of erudition, of tireless patience, of triumphant research.

BOOK I. CHAPTER I.

SECTION I.

On his return from Elba the Emperor found scarcely 200,000 men under arms. . . . The number of men on six months' leave of absence amounted to 32,800, the deserters to 85,000. It was possible to rely on the vast majority of the former; and already three or four thousand of them had rejoined their dépôts in obedience to the Royal decree of March 9. But among the 85,000 men "absent without leave" there would undoubtedly be many refractory ones; there would also be a number liable, on presenting themselves, to be finally dismissed, on the ground of their being either invalids or fathers of families. The Minister of War, Marshal Davout, reckoned that the recall of soldiers of every description would hardly muster a total of 59,000 men.

BOOK III. CHAPTER VIII.

SECTION IV.

Napoleon never exercised the commandership more efficiently, and never was his action more direct. But, in reality, forced to play the part of sergent de bataille, so censured by Maurice de Saxe, he applied all his efforts in repairing the mistakes, the omissions, and the faults of his lieutenants. And, seeing all his combinations prove abortive, all his attacks failing, his generals frittering away his splendid troops, his last army melting through their hands, and the enemy dictating to him, he lost his resolution with his confidence, hesitated, limited himself to providing against the more pressing dangers, waited for the lucky moment, let it pass, and did not dare in time to risk all in order to save all.

NOTES.

Number of pages, 159. Number of separate notes, 1,231!

Here is no attempt at word-painting or picturesque writing. The volume is built upon statistics and mortared with archives. "Two hundred thousand men": it sounds a good round number, easily enough computed. It is remarkable, however, because it is correct. In almost every existing history of Waterloo, with the exception of Sir Herbert Maxwell's (who has acknowledged his indebtedness to M. Houssaye in most generous terms), you will find a different total. Napoleon himself estimated the effective strength of the army on March 20 at 149,000 men, while Charras put it down at 224,000. But M. Houssaye always goes, behind and beyond the accepted authorities, to the original documents, musty and often forgotten; tabulates, classifies, annotates, until his search is rewarded by the discovery of bed-rock fact. We may criticise M. Houssaye's criticisms; but, as a compilation, his work is unquestionably authoritative, the most complete, the most accurate collection of facts and figures about the great campaign that has ever been offered to the public.

The opening paragraph, which we quote, is eloquent of the amazing difficulties Napoleon had to surmount and, in this way too, is characteristic of M. Houssaye's history, which, as we shall see later, is something of an apology for failure. Public opinion was hostile to the war, and even among those who responded to the call there were thousands of malcontents. The army was undisciplined, critical, without confidence in its leaders; discord reigned in the general staffs, confidence was at lowest ebb among the officers. You cannot read the figures in the first paragraph without realising that the wonder of Waterloo is not that Napoleon lost but that he almost won. And that wonder grows with every chapter.

His first sentence is typical, too, of M. Houssaye's weakness as well as his strength. One has almost to be reminded that these words usher in one of the greatest dramas of all time. M. Houssaye has neither the dramatic insight nor the wide-cast vision of the born historian. You start with the Emperor and his two hundred thousand men. As you turn the pages, these are joined by all the giant figures of that memorable year and the armies grow and grow. But in all that vast host there is not a living, breathing, moving creature, not one. M. Houssaye's Waterloo is bloodless, noiseless; M. Houssaye's Napoleon, his Wellington, his Blücher, just pieces on the great battle-board. For students of military history this is a great, an invaluable volume; to students of human history it offers next to nothing. The individual brain must do what M. Houssaye has left undone and breathe life and colour and movement and the clash of arms into this army of dry facts. For M. Houssaye seldom shows the man behind the mask of the soldier, and when once or twice, particularly in his description of the final disaster, he does lift the mask you catch a glimpse of a—corpse.

No one who has read M. Houssaye's previous works needs to be reminded that he is devoted to the Napoleon idea, and although he always endeavours to be as scrupulously fair as he is accurate, it is easy to see that he is firm in his opinion that at Waterloo the best man did not win. The real hero of his book is, however, not Napoleon, but that grim and shadowy figure whom the French have named le Général Imprévu—the unforeseen, chance, luck, providence, call it what you will. It was he who moulded the destinies of empires in the decisive hours of the century, and he who, in the guise of Ney and Grouchy and the endless array of mistakes of omission and commission of his lieutenants, hounded Napoleon to St. Helena. Such a theory can never be palatable to English taste, but now that it is admitted by almost every authority that Wellington was surprised and, in a degree, outwitted and outgeneralled at Waterloo, we are, at least, in a position to give it fair consideration. If M. Houssaye does not prove his case to our entire satisfaction, he at least convinces us that "General Unforeseen" was more often to be found working on the side of the allies than on that of the French. You have only to study his account of the first engagements of the fifteenth of June, of Ligny and Quatre-Bras, to realise how ill-luck dogged the Emperor, fastening on almost insignificant errors of judgment, on the slightest misconceptions, and worrying them into disasters. It is not always thus in war; it was not always thus with Napoleon; and the allied armies blundered more than once into victory. It was the realisation of the continued presence of General "Imprévu" at the side of his enemies which finally broke the supremacy of Napoleon's mind. Fortune had abandoned him; was, indeed, fighting against him; he lost the assurance of success; he caught sight among the opposing forces of something—Someone—more awful than flesh and blood, principalities and powers. We are strongly of opinion that it was this sense of battling with the inevitable, and not, as so many distinguished writers have affirmed, the state of his health, which was the secret of Napoleon's inaction on the morning of the seventeenth of June, the inaction which decided Waterloo. His trouble was not physical, but mental, spiritual. "With his faith in his destiny," writes M. Houssaye, "he had always been a daring, audacious gambler. Now that fortune showed herself contrary, he became a timid player. He hesitated to risk the game; he no longer followed his inspiration; temporised, weighed the chances, saw the pros and cons, and would risk nothing save on a certainty." For Napoleon knew everything was lost when he saw "General Unforeseen" take his stand at the elbow of the other player.

Fiction.

Hearts Importunate. By Evelyn Dickinson.
(Heinemann. 6s.)

This is a very British and a very good novel; and though the landscape is Australian, the people are pre-eminently English of the English, carrying English manners and ideals to a remote sheep-station—clean, candid, curt, and arrogant in the true, fino insular way.

So Hazell reflected as he sat in his sitting-room at half-past six in the morning, polishing his favourite gun. He was an early riser: India had made him so, he said; but he did not wish to be exacting to his household. By means of a spirit-lamp he could make himself a great cup of tea, wherewith to enjoy his first pipe; and he liked to spend a quiet hour or two cleaning and mending his sporting tackle, looking to his dogs and horses, and occupying himself generally with dirty and interesting work of an Englishmanly kind. About seven o'clock he expected to be supplied with a firkin or so of boiling water (for India had made him chilly) with which to remove the traces of his toil, and then came breakfast; and then the long solitary riding, which seemed, when he thought of the future, to fill the whole vista of his life.

That is the hero. The heroine matches. Both of them had been the miserable victims of conjugal or quasi-conjugal disaster—Avis Fletcher especially. Miss Fletcher wished there were no men and no women, but only slightly materialised angels. She had that passionate hatred of even the minor phenomena of sex which is to be found sometimes in women who have had to endure the pointing finger of the world. When Hazell approached her she fought him back, as it were by an instinct of self-preservation; but in the end nature was too strong for her, and the pair were united. The manner of their coming together, by the way, is stale and theatrical, and constitutes the chief defect in an admirable book. Miss Dickinson writes excellently and has much feeling for character, natural beauty, and that quality of wonderfulness in the apparently commonplace which it is the business of the novelist to discern. Her descriptions of the large and varied Bolitho household, in particular, show distinguished talent.

The Tiger's Claw. By G. B. Burgin.
(C. Arthur Pearson, Ltd. 6s.)

We have here a novel of London clerks, and its chief characteristics are a freakish good-humour and an amiable sentimentality. Mr. Burgin deals mildly with life, and yet there is a certain masterful relentlessness in his way of extracting from every situation its due toll of drollery and tenderness. The record of the friendship (based on a Mayne-Reid contract of blood) between Blount, the heavy, taciturn bourgeois youth, and "Monty" Grey, that scion of aristocracy, affords him full opportunity to exercise his gentle gifts of entertainment. In an external manner he is always fairly realistic, but when it comes to questions of motive, and crucial dialogue, he slips away from actuality, and remembers only the established conventions of a thousand novels:

Grey was silent, and Blount pursued his advantage. "You can do such a lot for me, Monty," he urged. "You're of gentle birth—I'm not; you're accustomed to good society—I'm not; you know the world—I don't. You can prevent me from being robbed in a hundred ways. Besides, the money wouldn't be any pleasure to me if I couldn't share it with you. We've always shared, haven't we? You know I think the world of you. Stop all this silly nonsense."

"Ah, but when we shared everything the difference wasn't so great. I did pay you back—sometimes."

"You've opened a new world to me," said Blount, "and now I'm going to open a new world to you—the world in which you are entitled to move by your birth and breeding. I sha'n't be happy until you marry an heiress. With your good looks," he beamed upon his friend, "you're sure to marry some beautiful girl who has heaps of money, and become a great artist."

The story is neatly invented and fluently told, but we think that the Australian aunt (though her method of testing and benefiting Blount at one stroke is decidedly fresh) is too trite and unoriginal a figure for any novel dated 1900. On the whole a quaint, fanciful, unassuming book, which it is neither fatal to read nor fatal to have left unread.

SIX STORIES NARRATED BY

MAX VON POCHHAMMER.

BY EVELYN EVERETT-GREEN.

We are not very sure whether Max von Pochhammer ever had an existence; but these purport to be stories told by him during his life. Pochhammer was a fine old Prussian army officer, and a rare raconteur. He would say: "Oh, my dear ladies, I have a story in my head! It has been with me all day. I will tell it, and you shall write it. I make you a present of it. Did you ever write a story in which the heroine should only speak one word twice over and nothing more? The only word she says is 'No!' The story begins with 'No!' and ends with 'No!' In my mind I have called the story 'No.'" There are six stories, of which the last is "No." (Leadenhall Press. 3s. 6d.)

THE PERSON IN THE HOUSE.

BY G. B. BURGIN.

This, we believe, is Mr. Burgin's thirteenth novel. Like many of its predecessors, it is concerned with the humours of London life. We hear much of a paper called Top Lights, a fourpenny fashion paper with wonderful personal paragraphs. "Did a noble dame dream of running away with her groom on Monday, by Tuesday her husband knew all about the contemplated elopement through the medium of Top Lights, which, in one instance, was thoughtful enough to append an extract from the Great Eastern time-tables, in order that the erring couple might not have too long a start of the enraged husband." (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

THE HAUNTED ROOM.

BY GEORGE HUMPHREY.

"Nothing is so extraordinary as the totally unexpected; nor so unlikely as the eagerly anticipated probable." This not very brilliant quotation from an unnamed author adorns the title-page of this "phantasmal phantasy," as the author calls his story. The illustrations give fair warning of the weird and the gruesome. (Sands. 3s. 6d.)

JAN OXBEE.

BY ORME ANGUS.

A pleasant Wessex story of the old oak settle, and Blue Boar Inn, type. Jan is a kind village Hampden, with no belief in the theory of "betters." To the parson he says: "All I know is, parson, that it do zay a good deal mwore in the New Testymnt 'bout the rights ov the pore and wrongs the rich do than 'bout betters. I never zeen betters mentioned as I knows on, and the only betters I knows be they that follow the Bible better than me. And I tell 'ee that iv 'ee preached a bit mwore 'bout gentry doen their duty and less 'bout vaults ov we pore volks things might be a lot better." The story is prettily illustrated, and is followed by four shorter stories. (Ward Lock. 3s. 6d.)

MUMMER MYSTIC PLAYS.

BY ALASTOR GRAEME.

The title is an enigma. The stories are two, and are concerned with country-house loves, romps, and flirtations. The second, "What's Gone of Monie?" is explained as "A Study in the Vulgarly of the Modern Maiden." (New Century Co.)

THE TRAVELLER

For Whom the World is a Playground.

A HIGH-CLASS SIXPENNY WEEKLY JOURNAL,
Profusely Illustrated, and appealing at all Seasons to all Classes who Travel or Tour for Health, Pleasure, Sport, or Business, at Home or Abroad.

THERE IS NO SIMILAR PAPER PUBLISHED IN ANY COUNTRY.

The business of Modern Travel has assumed such enormous proportions that it is remarkable no high-class weekly journal has yet been published to reflect and represent this important phase of life.

THE TRAVELLER is designed to be such an organ—a high-class weekly journal, abundantly illustrated, and devoted to the great business of holiday travel and tours, both at home and abroad, for health, sport, and pleasure. The journal will be so arranged as to appeal to all classes at all seasons.

The aim of THE TRAVELLER is to be the best Guide to Travel—an encyclopædia to which every traveller and tourist can turn, with the certainty of finding in it, or through it, absolutely reliable information on whatever point in connection with Travel he desires information.

Under the heading of "The Travel Bureau," all correspondence concerning routes to all parts of the earth, outfits, expenditure, hotels, pensions, apartments, &c., will be answered; and the public may rest assured that no trouble or outlay will be spared to procure for them information which will be at once eminently practical and absolutely reliable.

Another feature will be Sport; reliable information on all the principal sporting centres of Europe, America, Africa, &c., will be given, and new sporting countries—as they are opened up—will be described.

Amongst the important features will be interesting notes and news from home and foreign hotels; what to wear abroad; what our home railways are doing; Church notes from tourist resorts; details of forthcoming tours at home and abroad; Photographic, Motor-car, Guide-book, and Yachting notes on new lines; and, under the heading of "Aids to Travel," illustrated notes of all novelties and of the innumerable requisites which the latter-day traveller of both sexes needs en route will be given.

THE TRAVELLER will be arranged and edited in a way worthy of the scheme itself, and of the firm connected with its establishment and distribution, and will possess its own correspondents in all parts of the world.

Books About Places.

A Retrospect.

IN the ACADEMY of June 10 last year we looked back on the topographical literature of 1898-99. We propose to take a similar retrospect of the books of 1899-1900.

English country life has found many new books and some new writers. Mr. Baring-Gould has written so much, and so well, about English country life that it was with reluctance that we found rather grave fault with his two-volume work, A Book of the West (Methuen), published last August. To be sure, Mr. Baring-Gould cut the ground from under his critics' feet by the preface remark: "There are ten thousand omissions . . . the book is not intended to supersede guide-books, but to prepare the mind to use these later with discretion." But less competent pens could do such work, and the title, A Book of the West, suggested something more than a budget of anecdotes, quotations, and scraps, without finality and without an index. Still, there is the book, undeniably full of West Country stories and lore. Many of the stories are excellent. Quite recently Mr. Gould has given us a work of less pretension in A Quiet Village (Isbister)—a record of quaint village "characters" with whom he has made acquaintance. We reviewed this book so recently that there is no need to reaffirm its entertaining qualities. A very similar book, but of a less personal kind, was Mrs. Caroline Geary's Rural Life (Long), published last November. The stories it contained were gathered from many sources, and some of them were not new. But others were indigenous to the author's village, twenty miles from London, which has changed so little that an inhabitant remarked of it: "'Tis as 'tis, and it can't be no 'tisserer." A book that was vague as to locality, but delightful for its photographs, was Mr. Clifton Johnson's Among English Hedgerows (Macmillan), issued last December. Mr. Johnson is an American, and he pre-supposed in his American readers almost no knowledge at all of English country customs. Hence his book abounds in quaint and rather illuminating observations like this: "The English, when they want to travel on foot anywhere, . . . are apt to go, not by road, but by foot-path." Mr. W. F. Collier's Country Matters in Short (Duckworth) showed an English knowledge of England, and gave sound information on "Cub Hunting," "The Tongue of the Hound," &c. In his chapter on "The Chastity of Flowers," Mr. Collier suggested that Shakespeare had a prevision of a scientific truth when he wrote of the flowers "lamenting some enforced chastity"—a view not shared by Mr. Huxley, to whom the author had sent his essay, nor by many correspondents of the ACADEMY who discussed the point. More literary in its style, and more historical in its substance than any of these books, was Mr. Halliwell Sutcliffe's By Moor and Fell (Unwin), published last March. As a novelist Mr. Sutcliffe has made the Yorkshire moors his favourite background; in this book the background is all, and is treated topographically. The book is instinct with the author's love of his subject. Old squirearchical days, old Methodist days, old Brontë days, old ghost stories—Mr. Sutcliffe knows them all; and he knows the bleak moors and lonesome stone villages where their dramas were enacted. It is a pleasure to re-state our high opinion of this book. Mr. H. Thornhill Timmins's Nooks and Corners of Shropshire (Stock), noticed by us in the same month, was a gossiping antiquarian journal of walks through Shropshire by an author who was his own artist. In Dr. Mackennal's

Haunts and Homes of the Pilgrim Fathers the Lincolnshire and Cambridge homes of the Fathers were described with spirit. Mr. Norway's Highways and Byways of Yorkshire (Macmillan) was written on the plan common to the excellent series to which it belongs, and was illustrated by Mr. Pennell. The contents were, perhaps, too uniformly historical.

Books primarily concerned with natural history, antiquities, history, &c., often contain much interesting topography. Mr. Charles Dixon's Bird Life in a Southern County (Walter Scott) and the same author's Among the Birds of Northern Shires (Blackie) both fall within our retrospect. Mr. George A. B. Dewar's Wild Life in Hampshire Highlands (Dent) and Mr. John Watson's The English Lake District Fisheries (Lawrence & Bullen) are natural history books of topographical interest. A new and extremely fine edition of White's Natural History of Selborne, edited by the late Mr. Grant Allen, was issued by Mr. John Lane last November. Mr. B. C. A. Windle's Shakespeare's Country (Methuen) was a capital little book, with a map of the Shakespeare country pasted on its cover. The Picturesque History of Yorkshire (Dent) has made steady progress in monthly parts under its editor, Mr. J. S. Fletcher; it is a museum of local lore and views. The Northumberland County History Committee issued the fifth volume of its great History of Northumberland (Reid) early in this year; it dealt with the parishes of Warkworth and Shilbottle. A new edition of Mr. Frederic Harrison's Annals of an old Manor House: Sutton Place, Guildford, came to remind us that this is a model book of its kind. Mr. Harrison very properly describes not only the house, but its rich backgrounds of hills and woods and the water-meadows of the Wey.

Books about London have been fairly numerous, though not very striking. Mr. H. Barton Baker's Stories of the Streets of London (Chapman & Hall) was an industrious compilation of anecdote, by no means inspired, but by no means dull. Mr. C. W. Heckethorn's London Souvenirs (Chatto) was more original, but wanted style, and was somewhat marred to the reader by rash judgments on matters outside the scope of the book, as, for instance, the author's condemnation of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales as "not poetry," and an amazing diatribe against meat in the form of chops and steaks. But, setting aside some obvious faults, the book was full of curious matter. Mr. Edward Calow's Old London Taverns (Downey) recalled the "cosy roughness" of eating houses twenty to fifty years ago, the strength of the book being in its personal recollections. The Hampstead Annual (S. C. Mayle) duly appeared last January. Among books incidentally touching on London life we must not omit to mention Mr. E. A. Vizetelly's With Zola in England (Chatto), which, though primarily concerned with the Dreyfus case, shows how London suburban life struck M. Zola.

Scottish social life and topography is producing an active new literature. Mr. Henry Grey Graham's admirable Social Life of Scotland in the Eighteenth Century contained a great deal of topographical matter. Mr. Howard Crosby Butler's Scotland's Ruined Abbeys (Macmillan) was an American architect's treatment of a subject on which no very handy work existed. Mr. John Geddie's Romantic Edinburgh (Sands), recently noticed by us, is a gossiping book, well indexed, but not too well illustrated.

Among guide-books to European towns and countries, Miss Hannah Lynch's Toledo (Dent) probably deserves the first place. Its mingling of narrative and impressionism is very effective. Miss Lynch quotes Maurice Barré on Toledo: "It is less a town, a noisy affair yielding to the commodities of life, than a significant spot for the soul . . . an image of exaltation in solitude, a cry in the desert."

Mr. Grant Allen's The European Tour (Richards), published last October, was a spirited, almost masterful guide-book for American visitors to Europe. Mr. Allen button-holed his readers and talked to them with rapidity and emphasis. "Don't go first to Rome," was his advice to Americans bound for Italy, and he repeated the advice in capital letters. "To see Venice before you have seen Florence is a serious mistake; to see Rome before you have seen Florence is a fatal blunder."

Mr. Percy Dearmer's Highways and Byways in Normandy, illustrated by Mr. Pennell, was reviewed by us only a month ago, under the heading "The Stones of Normandy," Mr. Dearmer's preoccupation being with church architecture and stained glass.

Books on Klondike were frequent when everyone seemed to be going to Klondike. Mr. Robert C. Kirk's Twelve Months in Klondike (Heinemann) and Mr. Angelo Heilprin's Alaska and the Klondike (Pearson) were, perhaps, the most notable works in this class.

Butterfly Topography.

Travels in England. By Richard Le Gallienne. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

THE trouble about Mr. Le Gallienne is that he fails to show us, under all his happy fancies and gay casualness, a thread of purpose, a reminiscence of work and experience in the background, which would enable us to enjoy this book as his, and our own, recreation. He dismays the reader by letting it seem that this is his work—this butterfly tricksomeness, this feather-tickling of the face of life, this airy literary mention of its deeper significances. The great essayists have never left this void. Read Hazlitt's essay, "On Going a Journey," and you will find we know not what undercurrent of sterner things—the mid-stream of a man's life, swaying no lilies but running on, on, on, with a certain purpose, or fatality; authorising his riparian play. It is this we miss. Confessedly Mr. Le Gallienne does not propose to be useful or definite. He proposes not so much to travel as to lie in the sun and say things. "Any excuse to be near the warm heart of the mighty Mother: hay-making, playing at soldiers in Woolmer Forest, writing books about nothing—anything at all, anything at all." At first the reader is pleased with the free uncertain prospect. A summer book, a dance of thoughts! . . . But it is odd how the mind begins to demand sureties when it finds that it is to be prettily fooled and flattered through 300 pages. It will not let the smilingest dandy of a writer fill its view for long, unless he convinces it that he is a dandy only for the nonce, or by your leave, or for a mask. Mr. Le Gallienne, we think, fails to give this satisfaction. We are reluctant to say so, because it cannot be proved by extracts. Isolated extracts will always show Mr. Le Gallienne as the possessor of a delightful fancy, or an interesting melancholy. He is infinitely pleasant, wayward, sad, and bookish. But he would have been the same had his tour been totally different, or ten times as long. He would have written thus of Bosnia, or of Billingsgate.

He is too literary. Hazlitt was purely literary, yet there was a difference; his thoughts had a secret connexion and consistency, they hinted of thoughts he kept back, they disclosed a man and then a curtain. Mr. Le Gallienne's comments on life and nature are too prodigal and uncouthly. They take you here and they take you there; and, never palling, they pall. Can you not imagine how this fails on the 193rd page, that might have pleased on the 19th:

Pewsy, of course, is a very minor Crewe. Probably no one has ever thought of it before as a form of Clapham Junction. . . . It was to lead me to Avebury in Wilts. That was its one and only significance. Yet, so strange are the vagaries of human destiny that who knows but some day Pewsy may suddenly become for me the very centre of the universe, the capital of dreams. A face at a window, a voice from heaven, and how differently I had written of Pewsy. Or, some day a letter may come with the Pewsy postmark that shall change the whole course of my life. Who knows!

And can you not divine our reason for laughing aloud, and again aloud, over this passage about a service in Fairford Church:

I listened, too, to a sermon of great antiquarian interest on the text: "They shall come from the East and the West, but the children of the kingdom shall be cast out." The rector warned us against the dangers of several thousand years ago with much eloquence, and, meanwhile, I prayed to the painted windows.

But if these limitations haunt, you are not to suppose that Mr. Le Gallienne is not often satisfying. Sometimes he is so fresh and felicitous that you forget the general in the gay particular. His description of a Shropshire dairy, managed by a wiry farmer's wife and her six daughters—all content with their lot and proud of their work—rings true and simple, though he must remark: "There is something to be said for work that compels us to hear the morning stars singing."

As we mounted the stairs to the cheese-room the Squire asked our hostess why she didn't let some of her rooms to summer visitors. She had thought of it, she said, but she feared that her cooking might prove too humble. She was all right on simple dishes, joints and puddings, but, she added, in a phrase which particularly delighted me, "I should be lost on jellies." . . . I suppose she would resent a cheese in marble for her tombstone, with the inscription: "She made a good Cheshire cheese—and six beautiful daughters"; and yet, when you think what would be implied in the inscription, what prouder monument would any of us ask?

Mr. Le Gallienne went to Selborne, Winchester, Stonehenge, Stratford-on-Avon, Lechlade, the Cotswolds, and other places—but his route is no more important than his commentary. They are both wayward and pretty.

Chalk Hills and Shepherds.

Nature in Downland. By W. W. Hudson. (Longmans.)

MR. HUDSON is well known for his pleasant and accurate books on bird life; on the birds of London he is an authority. Here he is not too birdy, but just birdy enough. His field naturalist's journal, kept always and everywhere, had in it many pages about the Downs, but this book is no mere expansion of those notes. It is a book about Down life, human, animal, avine, and floral, distilled in great measure from the author's memory. The Sussex Downs have been waiting for their book. White of Selborne wrote of them with heavy, sincere rapture; and sundry obscure authors like William Hay, Charlotte Smith, and Hurdis, the local poet, have written out their love of these rolling chalk lands. Richard Jefferies did not die in Sussex before he had praised it. But the Downs have not really been put into a book. Mr. Hudson's opportunity, therefore, has been great. We think he has risen to it. Other writers could have been more literary, whimsically digressive, and aptly quotational. But Mr. Hudson comes to us with the smell of the Downs in his clothes, and with a hundred plain things to tell.

No analysis of the pleasure received from this or that type of scenery is likely to be very convincing; for one thing, one doesn't want analysis. Still, Mr. Hudson is probably on the right track when he traces the beauty of the Sussex Downs to their "fungus-like roundness and smoothness." Fungus is not a nice word (Mr. Hudson takes it from Gilbert White), but it suggests the broad, dreamy curves, the "solemn slope of mighty limbs asleep," which the Downs yield the eye. Furthermore, it is not a Down that is beautiful, but the Downs; not a curve, but many curves. As Mr. Hudson points out, Hogarth's theory of beauty, and Burke's, derive a likeness from the Downs, where undulations please the eye because they invite the feet. Even Mr. Herbert Spencer is quoted—but enough! We shall give the reader the idea that Mr. Hudson writes bookishly, whereas he writes like this:

One wonders which of the three following common sights of the Sussex Downs carries us further back in time: the cluster of cottages, with church and farm buildings, that form the village nestling in the valley, and, seen from above, appearing as a mere red spot in the prospect; the cloaked shepherd, crook in hand, standing motionless on some vast green slope, his grey, rough-haired sheep-dog resting at his feet; or the team of coal-black, long-horned oxen drawing the plough or carrying the corn.

These are the insignia of the Downs. Mr. Hudson does not forget the surface on which they shine. The turf, fragrant and springy and centuries old, with its peculiar "medicine smell with something subtler added," is the fundamental fact. Once destroyed, as it has been in many places by short-lived attempts in tillage, this proud turf does not return. Flowers come and make marvellous patches, wild gardens, natural carpets flung on the ancient floor. Here viper's bugloss usurps an acre, there white campion queens it over a large parallelogram, or forget-me-not flourishes on a field forgotten. We have delightful glimpses of the animal life of the Downs, which includes foxes, badgers, shrews, moles, stoats, adders, and big snakes. How is it that moles, which are supposed to be always athirst, can flourish on the high dry Downs in summer, where even the shepherds have to fetch their water from sources three or four miles away? That is one of many delightful riddles propounded by Mr. Hudson. In such cases he has always consulted the natives, and has always learned something. Thus with the moles:

Walking on I met an intelligent-looking shepherd, who was, I found, a good observer and something of a naturalist; and to him I put the question that occupied me. He told me that he had been shepherding on these hills over forty years, and the moles had always been there where they had no water to drink. "They must drink or die," said I; "it is down in the books, and therefore it must be true." He shook his head at the books, and replied that the moles came out at night to lick the grass—the dew was enough for them. "If that is so," I said, "then they must die of thirst in seasons when there is no dew." They do die," he answered; "in very dry, windy summers, when there is no dew, you find a good many moles lying about dead on these hills every morning." He added that they did not all die; that a year or so after a time of great mortality they become numerous again.

The shepherds are great men. They neither dream dreams nor see visions, but they know their work, and all that comes near it, and are content. Even the young men are content; and one of them—a tall, handsome fellow of twenty-three—defended his calling and its wages against Mr. Hudson's pretended ridicule with quiet spirit. At last Mr. Hudson said:

How could he marry on twelve and sixpence a week? At that there came a pleasant, far-away look into his eyes; it could be seen that they were turned inward, and were occupied with the image of a particular and incomparable She. He smiled, and appeared to think it was not impossible to marry on twelve and sixpence a week.

Such is the shepherd of the Downs in youth; in age he is not soured. We leave untouched chapters on "Shepherds Wheatears," "Summer Heat," "Swallows and Churches," and "Chichester." Mr. Hudson's book ranks with the late Mr. Gibbs's A Cotswold Village; it has the same plainness and intimacy.

Some Atlases.

The Royal Atlas of England and Wales. Edited by J. G. Bartholomew. (Newnes.)

Philip's Handy-Volume Atlas of London. Third Edition. (Philip & Son.)

Cook's Historical and Literary Map of London. (Cook & Son.)

THE folio Royal Atlas of England and Wales is noble in its proportions, and greatly to be desired. It is England spread on your desk—political England, ecclesiastical England, populated England, railway England, geological England, orographical England, and—England. In all there are seventy maps and town plans, and what they do not tell about England's surface cannot be much. The maps proper are indexed as "topographical sections," and are named after some fairly central town. Thus Section III. is "Newcastle," and gives us the southern half of Northumberland, the country westward to Hexham, a great part of Durham, and the top of Yorkshire's north-east shoulder, with Whitby for its epaulette. The scale is the noble one of four miles to an inch.

A fascinating section is No. 64, showing the relative population of the districts round London. The density of population is shown by means of nine colours. London and urban districts are marked black. Slate colour indicates districts with a population of over 512 inhabitants to the square mile, purple indicates districts of from 384 to 512 inhabitants to the square mile, and successive colours graduating down to white show the thinning out of the population in all directions. The results are most curious and instructive. South and west of London the slate colour flows out for miles, halting at Croydon and Wallington, extending a finger to Epsom, an arm to Leatherhead, and a writhing leg to Godalming—such extended limbs always following the lines of railway. An unbroken expanse of slate colour (512 to the mile) stretches from Hounslow to Windsor, and thence, to one's surprise, flows on in a narrow stream to Cookham. The invasion of Essex by the London clerk and working man is graphically shown by dun streamers to Hoddesdon in Hertfordshire and to Blake Hall in Essex. But each colour tells its own interesting story, and the local relations of the colours to each other are the most interesting feature of all. A bright yellow arm stretching from Hertfordshire right into London indicates the thinly populated Lea valley and the Hackney marshes. It takes a still fainter tint of yellow to indicate the population of the Plumstead marshes, and the waste lands lying around the lower docks of London. There are curious incongruities. At Chislehurst you are in slate colour (above 512); but only two miles further south, at Orpington, you are in yellow (64 to 128); and west of Orpington for many miles there is a tract of country as far as Guildford which is several degrees less populous than the country north and south of it. As a guide to the choice of a residential district the map is singularly useful. We should add that an exhaustive index completes the Atlas.

Messrs. Philips's Handy-Volume Atlas displays London in fifty-five sectional maps bound into a book which can be slipped into the pocket. The arbitrary divisions of London necessitated by a book atlas produces some interesting results. In not a single instance has the bookbinder's sheers cut out an unbroken expanse of streets; but this is all but attained in Plate 17, where the City-road, De Beauvoir-town, and Bethnal-green districts spread their miles of brick, and are relieved by nothing larger or greener than London Fields. Another depressing section, lying south of Bermondsey, is just redeemed by Southwark's small park and some nameless nursery gardens near the Old Kent road. London's many Londons are curiously differentiated in these fifty-five sections. Her dishabille, her ragged edges, her strange contrasts, her growths and stagnations, are caught "in the act," so to speak, by the accidents of binding. The maps are clear, and in the more open districts they appear to be as complete as could be fairly expected. Unfortunately the scale (three inches to the mile) is not large enough to permit every street to be marked, and this defect becomes a little serious in the case of a very short but well-known street like York-street, Covent-garden, which is here merged in Tavistock-street. Pantons-street, Leicester-square, is marked but not named, and, of course, its very short continuation, Spur-street, suffers equally. Being unnamed in the maps, these streets are naturally unnamed in the index. However, a map is an affair of scale, and you cannot have a big scale and a very compact atlas, or a big scale and a very cheap atlas. For its scale this atlas is excellent.

Messrs. Cook's folding map of London is very clear, and includes such distant suburbs as Hampstead and Cricklewood. With the map we have some interesting information, in the form of lists, concerning historical and literary landmarks, places referred to by Dickens, reliques of old London, &c., with references to their places in the map. The list of houses in which great men have lived is particularly interesting, as it enables us to compare their readiness to support the inconveniences of a change of residence. Boswell had eight London addresses in his life, being outdistanced by Dr. Johnson, who had fourteen. Milton lived in twelve different London houses, or twice as many as Shelley. Sydney Smith removed ten times, Swift ten times. Dickens had eleven London addresses to show for Thackeray's six and Bulwer Lytton's seven. Cowper is credited with only his Temple address, but he lived in Ely-place as an apprentice to the law. Ruskin's Denmark-hill home, and Browning's home in South London also escape notice, although the map includes their sites. The general interest of the list is perhaps greater than its detailed accuracy. The derivations of some London street names given in another list are somewhat too courageous. Rotten-row may be a corruption of Route du Roi, but there is no agreement on the point. Nor is the derivation of Gutter-lane, from "Guthrum, an ancient Dane," very satisfying. Notting-hill is doubtless a corruption of Nutting-hill. The obviousness of some origins given, such as Haymarket from a "market of hay or straw," is exquailed by the unexpectedness of "Blind Chapel-court—a corruption of Blanche Appleton-court." A useful and interesting map.

England.

A Picturesque History of Yorkshire. Part XI. (J. M. Dent & Co. 1s. net.)

Guide to the English Lakes. (Black.)

Guide to the Wye. (Black. 1s.)

Guide to East Kent. (Black. 1s.)

Part XI. of Messrs. Dent's well-known work deals principally with the valley of the Ure, with Ripon, and its cathedral, and Fountains Abbey; while a beginning is made with Wensleydale. Perhaps the greatest attraction of this, as of other parts of the work is its revelation of the charms of little known ancient towns and villages off all beaten tracks. Yorkshire is one of the best of English counties in which to find such places. Masham is one.

Its appearance is quaint, and suggestive of long-dead centuries. It consists, practically, of one great market square, surrounded by old-fashioned houses, with an obelisk or pillar, rising from a base of four steps, in the centre, and at the east end a very fine church, surmounted by a handsome octagonal spire of considerable height. . . . When Leland visited this part of Yorkshire he found Masham pretty much as it shows itself to the traveller of to-day. "Masseham," he remarks, "is a praty quik"—this was a favourite expression of his—"market-town, and a fair Chirch, an a bridge of tymbre. A little byuethle Masseham on the other side of Yore river lye the Aldbury village. At the end of Masseham townlet, I passed over a fair river called Bourne, it goeth into the Ure thereby a little byneth the bridge." There were good markets in Leland's time, but these seem to have decayed, though there is still a great annual cattle and sheep fair here, held about the middle of September, whereto as many as forty thousand sheep are usually brought for sale. During this fair open house is kept by every person in the place, and there is a staple dish of roast beef and pickled cabbage to which every comer is made heartily welcome. While the fair lasts Masham is a place of bustle and excitement; when it is over the little town settles down to the quietest and most monotonous of existences, save on market days, when the folk from the dales come in to give it a momentary increase of life.

The illustrations are of somewhat varying styles and excellence, and the reader has usually to choose between a competent prettiness and a less competent matter-of-factness. But there is no doubt that this work will be, when completed, a literary and pictorial record of great interest.

Messrs. Black's Guide to the English Lakes has assumed an entirely different aspect in this edition. The arrangement of the book has been altered, and the whole district divided into five sections: the Windermere, the Ullswater, the Central, the Keswick, and the Coast sections. Otherwise the features of the guide are preserved. The maps are excellent and alluring. A more difficult district to compass and compress could hardly present itself to the maker of a guide-book; but the editor appears to have surmounted most obstacles. We might suggest a longer note on Swarthmoor Hall, which is briefly, almost inaccurately, described as "once the residence of George Fox." Quaker visitors to the Lakes—who are many—will probably desire a better account than this of the place they regard as their Mecca.

It was Magee—was it not?—who said to his brother of Hereford: "If you will give me your river, I will give you my See." The offer was inspired by a sight of the lovely banks of the Wye. Black's Guide to the Wye, a handy little volume, goes far to explain Magee's enthusiasm. We doubt if the following particulars about the Severn Tunnel are so well known as they are interesting:

Over 3,000 men were employed in this bold enterprise, which was attended with incidents of perilous and, indeed, romantic adventure. After seven years' labour, the works were inundated by the tide, and sixty men had to be rescued by one small boat making repeated trips of a mile underground after being lowered into a shaft. Only one man was drowned, who tried to save himself by swimming; but the brave young engineer, Mr. G. O. Formby, who headed the rescuing party, for hours wet to the skin in the choking darkness, then laid the seeds of an illness from which he died prematurely. The tunnel is now kept dry only by constant pumping. At Sudbrook (South brook), below Portakewett, are the great pumping works, where gigantic pumps discharge daily from twenty to thirty million gallons. The pumping houses have not only to drain the tunnel, but to supply water to several villages whose wells have been sucked dry by these subterranean operations. The works are not open to visitors without special permit.

The guide to East Kent, by the same firm, reaches its fourteenth edition this year.

London.

Black's Guide to London and its Environs. Edited by A. R. Hope Moncrieff. Eleventh Edition. (A. & C. Black. 1s.)

Our Great City; or, London the Heart of the Empire. By H. O. Arnold-Forster. (Cassell.)

Cassell's Guide to London. (Cassell. 6d.)

To look through London guide-books is to wish for a week to fill in the larger gaps in one's knowledge of London. The present writer has lived in London for fifteen years, has made the study of its streets and life a hobby, has collected prints and books relating to London, and has roamed its miles of suburbs in all directions; yet he has never entered the Tower of London, or seen the effigies of the Crusaders in the Temple Church, or visited the Tate Gallery, or admired (from within) "the most beautiful and most venerable monument of old London"—the Charterhouse. And yet how pleasant it would be to give a week to seeing London in the receptive spirit of the country cousin. "A catalpa tree in the garden is said to have been planted by him, perhaps brought by Raleigh from America." The writer is Mr. Hope Moncrieff, the garden that of Gray's Inn, the planter Lord Bacon. Really, it would be very interesting to look up that catalpa tree with the aid of Black's Guide, and, looking at it, to murmur: "Perhaps brought by Raleigh from America." Nay, given time for such reflections, one might find a subtle pleasure in quoting Wordsworth's sonnet, written on Westminster Bridge, in conjunction with the fact that the length of the bridge is 1,160 feet. Then there are descriptions which titillate the mind:

Opposite Kensington, on the other side of the Park, lies Bayswater, not quite such a fashionable quarter, but still highly respectable, and in parts more than respectable.

Surely one might learn a few things in an afternoon devoted to the identification of those parts of Bayswater which are more than respectable. It will be perceived that Black's Guide to London, like all the guides ever written, has its unconscious humours as well as its curiosities of information. But its solid merits are indisputable: they include orderly arrangement, an abundance of good maps, and a lively sense of the stranger's needs.

Mr. Arnold-Forster's book is a sign of the times, and our wonder is that it has not arrived sooner. London citizenship will never recover its old vitality until its old connexion with education is revived. Persuaded of this, Mr. Arnold-Forster has compiled a London primer, which he hopes will be used in London schools. After examining the book with care we share that hope. The book is eminently suited for schools, if we except the statement, on page 41, that Edward III. won the battle of Agincourt. Mr. Arnold-Forster has begun at the beginning—that is, with the soil on which London stands. He traces the early history of London, legendary, Roman, Saxon, Norman, Plantagenet, Tudor, and the rest. The survey is lucid and bright throughout, though, with intention, elementary. Chapters XVIII. and XIX., on "Pictures from the Book of the Streets of London," are happily inspired. The young Londoner is bidden to see dimmest antiquity in the name of Ludgate, Saxon saintliness in St. Swithin's-lane, Roman road-making in London Stone; and to recognise the features of an old and rural London in the names of Brook-street, Fleet-street, Holborn, Great Windmill-street, Spitalfields, and Finsbury. The White Friars and the Black Friars and the Knights Templar are traced in surviving names, and the names of kings and queens and battlefields are shown to be daily on the lips of 'bus conductors. Old trades and their localities are recognised under names like Vintry Wharf, Cornhill, Ironmonger-lane, Ave Maria-lane, and Seacoal-lane. Other chapters describe St. Paul's, Westminster Abbey, the Houses of Parliament, the British Museum, the National Gallery, &c. The Thames, with its trade and government, is carefully considered; and the government of London as a whole is explained in terms simple enough to be understood by the little child, and even by the oldest ratepayer. In short, Mr. Arnold-Forster has made excellent use of his space. The very birds of London have a chapter to roost in; and, not content with describing London as it was and is, the author adds a final suggestive chapter on "London as it Might Be."

Cassell's Guide is a good sixpenny booklet, with one map and many illustrations. A well-planned round of visits, to occupy a week, is sketched out. The book is full of sound information and suggestions. Fancy going to see the "grounds of the Toxophilite Society, which exists for the promotion of archery."

Paris.

Exhibition Paris. (Heinemann.)

Paris. By Augustus J. C. Hare. 2 vols. Second Edition, revised. (George Allen. 3s. each.)

Guide to Paris. (Black. 1s.)

THE title Exhibition Paris is to some extent misleading. Exhibition Paris is indeed exhaustively dealt with; but normal Paris prevails, as it should do. We doubt whether any guide to Paris so directly and completely useful as this exists. The information about hotels, &c., is no beggarly array of generalities, but is full, modern, and convincing; and this note, one soon finds, is the note of the book. There are fifteen closely packed, classified columns devoted solely to questions of eating and drinking. There are sections on Tobacco, Cigars, Illness, Chemists, Laundresses, Hairdressers, Lost Property, Telephones, Furniture, &c., &c. The visitor is told what he must do if he is arrested by the police. He is directed to the best shops for curiosities, Dress Materials, Flowers, Fireworks, Boots, Gloves, Jewels, Bronzes, and Books. Plans of the seating accommodation in the principal theatres are given; and the section on "Paris by Night" is a complete guide to amusements. It is only on p. 111 that the sights of Paris, properly speaking, are taken in hand; nearly two hundred pages are devoted to them—pages alive with woodcuts. At page 300 Exhibition Paris begins, and continues to page 431, the end. A complexity of usefulness marks every page. We may add, as showing the alertness of the compiler, that a Calendar of Events from May to October is included in the book, so that no English visitor need miss a race meeting or fail to see the fountains play at Versailles, or lose the chance of taking a walk in the Sewers or the Catacombs. Exhibition Paris is the guide to Paris for this year. (Heinemann. 2s. 6d. net.)

Mr. Hare's guide-books have a distinction of their own. They are not cheap, but good paper and charming woodcuts make them singularly attractive. The black bindings with red lines were an inspiration. "The conscientious hard work of two years" were given, says the author, to this book and Days Near Paris, and there is evidence on every page of this book of original study. The references to, and quotations from, French writers are extremely numerous and suggestive. Victor Hugo, Zola, and Taine are frequently drawn upon for picturesque descriptions. This guide-book may be best used as an intellectual companion, and the tourist can seek in other books the "dull-useful information" which Mr. Hare compresses into a few pages.

Black's Guide to Paris is modelled on the Guide to London, issued by the same firm. The present edition, however, includes about fifty new pages dealing with the Exhibition. The map of the Exhibition is quite admirable. By means of six colours one can immediately distinguish the Exhibition buildings proper, the special foreign pavilions, the exhibits with an extra charge, the restaurants, gardens, walks, &c. After the Exhibition section follows the guide to Paris proper, illustrated with photographs, and followed by the usual sections on Rouen, Le Havre, Calais, &c., with information for cyclists. We can confidently recommend this guide-book to those whose time in Paris is limited.

Books within Books.

WE get what we bring; we receive what we have; we find what we possess.

THE world is only a huge mirror, wherein each sees the reflection of his own soul: it is splendid or sordid, lovely or hateful, according to the light and shadow of individuality that falls upon it. We can obtain no more than we bring, we can find no more than we possess.

The world proving itself capable of so infinite a variety of readings, it is not to be wondered at that certain distillations out of it, embodied in forms of art, should make widely different appeal to different temperaments. The curious intellectual divergencies in book reviewing give the critical journals the vitality of human documents; their very contradictions constituting fleeting glimpses of alien souls. And in novels, the supposed influence of books on fictitious characters is even more widely various. Thus we find some famous classic exhibiting through the mediumship of the novelist directly opposite tendencies. Was not the madness of Don Quixote fed on mediæval romances? Yet in a charming modern novel, The Choir Invisible, the mediæval romance of the Morte d'Arthur is made the purifying motive of a life. Of all books, however, The Imitation of Christ has received in fiction the most strikingly various treatment.

The Imitation of Christ is the fullest statement we have of the doctrine of Renunciation. Now, in the manner of regarding Renunciation is to be found the root-difference between all religions and all philosophies. If the body is equal with the spirit—if the gratification of its impulses, affections, appetites, is necessary to a complete life, then Renunciation for its own sake is an evil: so say the Epicureans, the Elizabethans, Walt Whitman, and many others. But if the spirit as the higher self demands for its perfecting the suppression of the lower self, then Renunciation becomes the noblest of virtues: and we find among the upholders of this view the Stoics, the Buddhists, the Puritans, and Thomas à Kempis. Thus, on the one hand, the Imitation appears as the most elevating of all influences, waking a soul out of dull torpor, uplifting it, and preparing it for a moral triumph unequalled in fiction: and on the other, the same book is represented as a pernicious bane, sapping away strength and vitality of character, and reducing the mind of its unfortunate reader to a weakness bordering upon insanity.

You remember in The Mill on the Floss, where Bob Jakin brings to Maggie some coloured prints and a few second-hand books. It is the moment of supreme need in the girl's life—the moment when her passionate personality is struggling into consciousness to be constantly tortured and repelled by the depression of daily circumstance. Her proud father has been made bankrupt, and forced to serve under his enemy Wakem; the mother, separated from her household gods, becomes ever more childish and querulous; Tom, whom Maggie adores, is self-centred and cold. "To the early precocity of the girl she added that early experience of struggle, of conflict between the inward impulse and outward fact which is the lot of every imaginative and passionate nature." The little old clumsy book brought to her by the packman, marked in faded ink and with its corners turned down, is to be the almost unfailing source of spiritual strength to her throughout life.

Know that the love of thyself doth hurt thee more than anything else in the world. . . . If thou seekest this or that, and wouldst be here or there to enjoy thy own will and pleasure, thou shalt never be quiet or free from care: for in everything somewhat will be wanting and in every place there will be some that will cross thee. . . . Blessed are those ears which hearken not unto the voice which soundeth outwardly, but unto the truth which teacheth inwardly.

When Maggie reads this for the first time, a strange thrill of awe passes through her, "as if she had been awakened in the night by a strain of solemn music, telling of beings whose souls had been astir while hers was in stupor. . . ."

Maggie's story is the story of the suppression of a magnificent self, culminating in a sacrifice that may allow question of its wisdom, but none of its sublimity. The state of moral exaltation produced by the old monk's book is almost incomprehensible to a moment inclined to regard the gratification of self with so appreciative an eye. Think of The Gay Lord Quex, and then pass to such sentences as the following: "I have often said unto thee, and now again I say the same, Forsake thyself, resign thyself, and thou shalt enjoy much inward peace. . . . If thou wert inwardly good and pure, then wouldst thou be able to see and understand all things clearly without impediment. . . ." The contrast has the force of a shock.

George Eliot has given us two direct utterances on The Imitation of Christ. The inmost truth of the old monk's outpourings, she tells us, is, "that renunciation remains sorrow, though sorrow borne willingly." And she attributes the power of the book, which "works miracles to this day, turning bitter waters into sweetness," to the fact that it is the "direct communication of a human soul's belief and experience": "it was written down by a hand that waited for the heart's prompting: it is the chronicle of a solitary hidden anguish, struggle, trust, and triumph."

No such understanding criticism is to be found in At the Cross Roads, by Miss Montrósor, in which, somewhat casually, The Imitation of Christ appears. It does not, in this novel, prepare the soul for strenuous conflict, but helps, by its presence, to contribute something to an atmosphere already charged with simplicity and restfulness. While Maggie practises asceticism, Lady Jane discards luxury: her rooms are scantily furnished; the walls are distempered blue; "it was a pleasant place, and one that sometimes suggested a reminiscence of some far-away French convent cell." "'Your room is like a Quakers' meeting,'" Gillian says. Lady Jane herself wears black "with white cambric frills in her sleeve and round her throat." She reads the Imitation in the Latin edition, "for the stateliness of the old language pleased her." In all this the insistence on externals is very marked. The description is almost entirely confined to material things. The Imitation has indeed no definable spiritual influence upon Lady Jane. Her days of effort and struggle are over. Out of the hard, mediæval teaching she extracts only a sentiment of purity and austerity. This is her statement of life: "'The world is sad, I think; but underneath the sadness one finds—God.'"

Lady Jane's room suggests some far-away French convent cell; let us now see how The Imitation of Christ is employed in a Jesuit monastery in France. The scene occurs in Eugène Sue's Wandering Jew, which combines series upon series of extra-melodramatic situations, never approached by the most daring of Adelphi flights, with chapters that display penetrating observation and wide common-sense. It is hard to reconcile the last tragi-comic scene, where Rodin is confronted with his six victims, ranged upon black biers, dressed in black grave-clothes, and faintly illumined by the bluish light of a silver lamp, with the admirable description of the Jesuit's tactics in working on Hardy's sensuous feelings in order to win him to a religious life from its sensuous side. Throughout this novel the Jesuits are painted in the darkest colours. We read of the "profound and diabolical craft of the Reverend Fathers." Their object is to extinguish free will and power of discrimination, so that they may secure large donations for their order. They are represented as having in the Imitation one of their most powerful auxiliaries: "In that awful book may be found a thousand terrors to operate on weak minds, a thousand slavish maxims to chain and degrade the pusillanimous soul." Thoughts and reflections from its merciless pages, written in very large characters, were suspended in black frames about the room where the man they desire to influence is confined: "Thou art nothing but dust and ashes, grief and tears are thy portion. Believe not in any son of man. There are no such things as friendship or ties of kindred. All human affections are false. . . ." The same book that brought Maggie an infinite hope brought to Hardy inextinguishable despair. What is to some one of the most precious of spiritual possessions is stigmatised by Eugene Sue as impious and Machiavellian. Truly, in Milton's words, the mind is its own place; it can make a heaven of hell, a hell of heaven; and no book affords such materials for building at once so pure a heaven and so gloomy a hell as The Imitation of Christ.

Things Seen.

The Dog.

THE stream of humanity lounged through the Strand. In the broad June sunlight everything was stark and plain, and the utter limp dependence of the little monkey on the retriever's curly back touched me with its gratuitous pathos. The retriever strode through us in the wake of two young men, its masters, willing, seemingly, to cut a caper. And I was angry with those young men, as though they were perpetrators of an impertinence in bringing their fragile toy in the highway of bulging omnibuses and skimming cabs. I was angry because I knew they sought to unloosen in themselves and in me the ancient spring of laughter that gushes forth at sight of the ignorant astonishment, the clinging misery, of a tiny thing. Confronted with nothing less than our whole civilisation, the monkey was afraid even of heaven, and with lowered head sprawled over the retriever as a crab sprawls over a stone.

Presently the procession was obliged to quit the pavement, on account of the ambition of a monster hotel to expand its lungs. And so, while the seasoned human pedestrians monopolised the meagre footway of planks that skirted the hotel, the retriever trotted into the road and mixed himself with the vehicular traffic.

At last there was a slight congestion in the eastward hurrying tide. There were those who paused and those who, remembering the flight of time, thriftily threw back a pitying glance. I heard the noise of a body scraped along the road. I saw a dog's paw quiver painfully in the air, and a hansom cabman gaze down commiseratingly from a godlike height. And just then the Tivoli discharged its smiling throng.

Altruism.

It was in a great railway terminus, in a corner by the chief exit. Two tall wooden pillar boxes stood near each other, dumbly appealing for newspapers for the two great hospitals of the city. On his knees before one of them was a messenger-boy, evidently sent to empty it and bring the contents for distribution in the wards. The busy crowd in the station passed him unheeding as they hurried to and from their trains. But the little lad was so business-like and so much interested in his work that I, having a moment to spare, spent it in watching him.

The box was emptied: the contents were lying before him; and he gave them a solemn and careful scrutiny while he arranged them into a satisfactory bundle. They were mostly dailies, penny or half-penny; here and there came a little spice, say Tit-Bits or Answers; once or twice a plum in the shape of a Punch or Graphic. But suddenly he came upon a new thing—a handful of religious tracts.

For a moment he pondered.

Then a happy inspiration came to him. He rose from his knees and dropped the tracts into the box for the other hospital.

A Famous Experiment.*

THE Brook Farm experiment owed its origin, in the famous 'forties of Boston, U.S.A., to one of those revulsions from the precarious felicity of an artificial system which, in other ages, have manifested themselves by withdrawal to the desert or the convent. The Transcendental Club, out of which the colony came, derived its principles through Edward Everett and George Ticknor and Carlyle in various measures from Fichte and Schelling and Hegel and Schleiermacher, disciples—faithful or dissentient—of Kant. Among its members were Emerson, Alcott, Thoreau, the Channings, Nathaniel Hawthorne and the lady who afterwards became his wife—Sophia Peabody, and the Ripleys. It was by George Ripley—afterwards described by Carlyle as "a Socinian minister who left his pulpit in order to reform the world by cultivating onions"—that the Brook Farm Settlement was imagined. Its purpose was "to insure a more natural union between intellectual and manual labour . . . to guarantee the highest mental freedom by providing all with labour adapted to their tastes and talents . . . to do away with the necessity of menial services . . . and thus to prepare a society of liberal, intelligent, and cultivated persons, whose relations with each other would permit a more wholesome and simple life than can be led amidst the pressure of competitive institutions."

Brook Farm was purchased in 1841 by Ripley, for the most part with borrowed money, and was afterwards divided into twenty-four parcels, of which Hawthorne, who was one of the original settlers, held two. The labour, both agricultural and mechanical, was entrusted to Groups formed of harmonic numbers—3, 5, 7, or 12; and this is the only note of naked lunacy in the game. Such a delectable way of life, wrote "Nathaniel Hawthorne, Ploughman," had never been seen on earth since the days of the early Christians.

On April 16 he broke a machine for chopping hay, through very excess of effort, and his remarkable energy then employed itself on a heap of manure. This useful adjunct to the new life he soon began to call his "gold mine." . . . Presently he writes: "I have milked a cow!"

For six months he was ecstatically convinced that toil "defiles the hands indeed, but not the soul." Then came a reaction:

On August 12 he burst forth in a different, but not less rhapsodical, strain: "In a little more than a fortnight I shall be free from my bondage—free to enjoy Nature—free to think and feel. . . . Oh, labour is the curse of the world, and nobody can meddle with it without becoming proportionately brutified! Is it a praiseworthy matter that I have spent five golden months in providing food for cows and horses? It is not so."

But it is in his Blithedale Romance that his matured impressions are to be sought.

* Brook Farm: its Members, Scholars, and Visitors. By Lindsay Swift. (Macmillan.)

A company which in the main disused tobacco was not likely to be free in its conscience as to the consumption of the dead bodies of animals. The vegetarian "quiddle" was generously represented. Sam Larned went so far as to abstain from milk on the ground that "his relation to the cow did not justify him in drawing on her reserves." On the other hand, Ripley is said to have worn a worried look during the decline of a calf which it had been sought to raise, while setting free its dam from her maternal function, on hay tea.

Outdoor amusements enjoyed a vogue, and there was a good deal of harmless philandering. Emerson (whose every reference to Brook Farm, says Mr. Swift, suggests that someone is laughing behind the shrubbery) gives a general notion that the Farmers' life was one long, guileless picnic. Not even the practice of punning, which seems to have been treated with shameless indulgence, availed to hush the prevalent mirth; nay, the contentious Brownson himself, when he paid the Farmers a visit, was unable to damp down the cheerful buzz, or to cast a doubt upon the enduring humour of the request to cut the pie "from the centre to the periphery." Not that higher matters were ruled out. Miss Ripley declared herself at one time weary of "the extravagant moods of young girls," and "sick of the very word affinity"; and there is an account, by Mrs. Kirby, of a well-sustained argument on the burning question, "Is labour in itself ideal, or do we, in effect, cloth it with the spirit we bring to it?"

Divers of the apostles of the "Newness," after the collapse of the community, won distinction in the world; and some found salvation in the Church of Rome. Of these the most notable were Brownson and Father Hecker, whose name has by differing critics been sealed with the note of "heretic" and that of "saint."

One cannot but regret that an enterprise which, though its financial position was never sound, at one time showed fair promise was, by a series of fatalities, brought to naught.

Correspondence.

Mathilde Blind.

SIR,—I hope someone more capable than I will take up the cudgels for Mathilde Blind, because I feel that my weapons must needs be awkward: that I can resent such criticism as appeared in your last issue only in the blind, helpless fashion of a devotee who sees a blow aimed at one of his idols. Several times lately I have read similar reviews of Miss Blind's poetry, and, curious to state, Shelley seems to have come in for some of the depreciation so liberally bestowed upon her, in more than one instance. His pedestal is too strong to need buttressing, but the woman poet seems to lack a valiant supporter. If, as your reviewer says, she has no "high imagination, emotional power or grace of form," a humble inquirer would like to know why her fame is steadily increasing year by year, and why a writer of such known critical acumen as Dr. Garnett should be found to edit her work?

Can it be that, in spite of her failure to satisfy the poetic analyst of this century end, she possessed some indefinable quality that has stamped her with the hall-mark of genius? I do not assert this, being able to speak from the purely amateur point of view only—that of the lover rather than dissector; but I do assert that I am not easily moved by poetry, and that Mathilde Blind's poetry has affected me powerfully. I have read her often during the past ten years and never with any waning of appreciation. It seemed to me the quotations given in last week's ACADEMY did not represent her fairly, and I wish I dare trespass on its space to supplement them with some of her more spontaneous and pregnant passages.

We are constantly told that the critical age is never the creative age, but perhaps we are not sufficiently conscious of the sterilising power of criticism. May it not be possible that the barrenness of our era in great works of art is due, on the one hand, to the niggling, pedantic spirit of our much trusted reviewers; on the other hand, to the over-laudation of mediocrity by scribblers of the rank-and-file? And our fashions are so strange! Recently a great cloud of incense arose before the suddenly-erected altar of a young poet, of whose slender dramatic work one of the herd of fulsome critics wrote: "He has achieved the impossible"! A second Shakespeare could have been welcomed with no more éclat. Yet to many outside this fashionable literary circle the comet has appeared a very ordinary rocket! To honour all that betrays promise in the newcomer is well and just; but when his admirers, in acclaiming him a god, would dethrone Shelley and others whom time has hallowed, questions and comparisons are bound to arise. Fortunately, nothing can harm the poet who, "being dead, yet liveth." We only, who are alive and love, can be pierced by the shafts hurled at our idols.—I am, &c.,

M. L. PENDERED.

[Miss Pendered is, of course, very welcome to her opinion. It does not happen to be ours—that is all.]

SIR,—I was much interested in the review of Mathilde Blind's poems published in the ACADEMY of June 2.

Apart from their own intrinsic value, these poems represent an attempt which has not unfrequently been made, to create, as it were, a poetry of science—and more particularly of evolution.

As we recall the various efforts in this direction, the question suggests itself: why has no poet hitherto succeeded in treating the subject in a really satisfactory manner? Why has there been no so-called Apotheosis of Evolution?

It would be difficult to conceive of a more sublime theme, or one offering a wider field to the poetic imagination.

Many writers have contributed to this field of literature, among whom the names of George Eliot, Romanes, and Mr. William Watson come familiarly to the mind.

But their finest passages leave us—to quote your reviewer—untouched and cold; and we are unwittingly reminded of the famous parody:

An ape there was once, in the days that were earlier,
The centuries passed and his hair became curlier,
Some centuries more gave a thumb to his fist,
Then he called himself man—and a Positivist.

One sonnet alone, and that by an almost forgotten writer, seems to rise to the level of true poetry.

It is by Emily Pfeiffer, and bears the hall-mark of original thought and expression in every line, but more especially in the last.

TO NATURE.

Dread force, in whom of old we loved to see
A nursing mother, clothing with her life
The seeds of Love divine—with what sore strife
We hold or yield our thoughts of Love and thee!
Thou art not calm, but restless as the ocean,
Filling with aimless toil the endless years,
Stumbling on thought and throwing off the spheres,
Churning the Universe with mindless motion.
Dull fount of joy, unhallowed source of tears,
Cold motor of our fervid faith and song,
Dead, but engendering life, love, pangs and fears,
Thou crownedst thy wild work with foulest wrong
When first thou lighted on a seeming goal,
And darkly blundered on man's suffering soul.

—I am, &c.,

Novels and Logic.

SIR,—Mr. Lang puts forward a law of logic as a canon of criticism. My paper did not pretend to deal with Mr. Lang's special thesis, but to criticise certain of his statements and his general tone of contempt towards the novel.

For Students of Stevenson.

SIR,—A correspondent in British Columbia asks me, in a letter: "Who is the man (in The Wrecker) met in San Francisco whose name is 'known to lovers of good English'; 'who tramped and toiled and had such a profit of his life among the Islands'; and from whose house Dodd returned with the first glamour of the Islands over him, bearing Omoo under one arm and the man's own book under the other?" Can any of your readers help me to the answer?—I am, &c.,

George Eliot at Richmond.

SIR,—Those who care for literature and its nobler memories may like to get out of the train at Richmond, Surrey, and ask anyone for No. 8, Parkshot. The house almost touches the station.

Between 1855 and 1859 George Eliot not only made the decision which revealed herself to herself by setting to work on Amos Barton, but wrote all the Scenes of Clerical Life, and practically the whole of Adam Bede, in cheap lodgings in this little house.

I should like to set a few who care for literature thinking whether it is not worth while at least to consider, among the right men and women, if it is not wise and practicable to secure the permanent existence of the house (the demolition of which is very imminent), and its use in some way to the benefit of Richmond and of London in definite memory of George Eliot.

There will be difficulties, because the cottage is the centre one of three; and they are clearly marked for demolition, that something solidier and more profitable may take their place. I should like to see the centre one actually acquired and preserved and placed under trustees, were it only as a place of deposit for bicycles, though I love them not. And I grudgingly make the suggestion that I may be humble in aim and practical. But let it be plainly and permanently recorded upon the house that in its second floor the Scenes of Clerical Life and Adam Bede were written.—I am, &c.,

CHARLES SELBY OAKLEY.

Dr. Johnson's Thunder.

SIR,—It is, I suppose, to the credit of us women that we are born hero-worshippers, to the extent even of worshipping the idols of our idols, nay, to worshipping other women. I suppose there are few women who read at all who do not heartily admire the exquisite literary instinct of Mrs. Meynell. But has not Mrs. Meynell's appreciation of Ruskin's merits led her to yield a too ready approval to his judgment of Johnson, a judgment surely which Johnson's own sturdy common sense would not have approved? To say of Johnson's style that "its symmetry is as of thunder answering from two horizons" seems to her to outstep the legitimate limits of even oratorical and hyperbolic prose. The vigour of Dr. Johnson's style was, like Fred Bayham's emotions, "manly, sir, manly," but it contains a very perceptible trace of artifice, and if we must resort to metaphor to describe it, the image of answering salvos of artillery would be more apposite than that of the elementary roarings of nature. And even the devoutest admirer of Johnson must admit that the salvos were often of blank cartridge!—I am, &c.,

F. L. A.

[Ruskin described the symmetry of Johnson's style, not his style as a whole, by the simile of "thunder answering from two horizons." Surely the sonorousness and balance of Johnson's style—these two qualities—are finely indicated in the phrase to which our correspondent objects. Is not this enough?]

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

THOMAS GIRTIN.

BY LAURENCE BINYON.

Mr. Binyon, who is known in the literary world by his poetry, is an assistant in the Department of Prints and Drawings in the British Museum. This splendidly illustrated study of the work of Girtin is largely based on the water-colours in the national collection, but drawings in private collections also are reproduced. Girtin's fame is undoubtedly less than he deserves. Mr. Binyon boldly declares: "When Girtin died he was Turner's rival on more than equal terms." And he continues: "Had Turner died with him, Girtin's name would stand the higher." Mr. Binyon's suggestive essay fills twenty-two pages; the remainder of the volume, a folio, is taken up with photographs of Girtin's water-colours. (Seeley. £2 2s.)

PARIS.

BY HILAIRE BELLOC.

Loving Paris of to-day, Mr. Belloc, whose literary range seems to be quite indefinitely wide, has written this book about Paris of yesterday. He says: "The more vivid be the contemporary effect of a city, the more urgently does the question of its origin and development press upon one. . . . In the effort to satisfy this a man will read this book and that, look up old prints and catch the chance phrases of memoirs; he will, for his own sake, clear out a rough sketch of the whole past of what he loves, and he will end by making a record that is as incomplete and fragmentary, as incongruous a mixture of the general theory of life and of particular trifles, as are the notes and letters we keep to remind us of absent friends. This is the way my book was written." (Arnold. 7s. 6d.)

TALKS WITH OLD ENGLISH

CRICKETERS.

BY A. W. PULLIN.

"There is no attempt in this volume to give a life-history of the famous cricketers whose portraits adorn its pages. . . . The idea kept in view is to delve deep into the mine of personal reminiscence. . . . The preparation of these talks . . . was originally undertaken on behalf of the Yorkshire Post." (Blackwood. 6s.)

In addition to the foregoing, we have received:

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 38 (New Series).

LAST week we offered, at the suggestion of Dr. Furnivall, a prize of One Guinea for the best reproduction of the lost verses addressed by Dr. Johnson, when he was at Stonbridge school, to Olivia Lloyd, the young Quakeress. We have decided that the prize is due to Mr. F. B. Doveton, Torquay, for the following poem :

Oh deign to listen to my simple lay !
Scorn not my homely measures, maid demure ;
Thy beauty's star illumines my dreary way ;
My heart is sick—thou only hast the cure !
And when thou wanderest by the crystal stream,
Or 'mid the umbrage of green pendent boughs,
Forget not one who cannot cease to dream
Of thee, and at thy shrine perform his vows.
And, though my years be few, yet none the less
For thee great deeds and doughty would I dare ;
Brave the recesses of the wilderness,
Or slay his cubs from the Siberian bear !
Only some token would I humbly ask
Of thee, Olivia, gentle as the dove ;
Some sign to cheer me in my daily task,
And prove that thou thy worshipper dost love !

Other poems are as follows :

Sweet maid demure, thou charmer of our race,
Venus herself auro lacked thy simple grace,
Nor glanced such love from her rich lustrous eyes.
As shines in thine, where only virtue lies,
Purest of daughters thou of all the earth,
Blest is the spot that's honoured by thy birth ;
Blest more the place where thou shalt live thy days,
Lit by thy light of love's warmth-giving rays.
Teach this poor suppliant how to plead with thee
For favours from the fount of purity ;
Inspire this heart with goodness and with grace,
That I may more deserve to see thy face.
In thy loved presence all base thoughts shall flee,
And heaven itself seems near at sight of thee :
God's choicest gifts enshrined in female frame
All seem revealed, Olivia, in thy name !

[H. W. D., London.]

Olivia, since the day I saw that face,
Matchless and perfect in each separate grace,
One only hope my weary heart hath known—
The hope of making thee my very own.
Thy modesty of manner and of dress,
The truth and purity which all may guess,
The beauty of thy form and of thy soul,
Making a very perfect human whole,
All rise before me, making every day
Not worth the numbering, if thou'rt away :
All rise before me, making every night
With endless dreamings of thee sweet and bright.
Olivia, dear Olivia, kind and fair,
Pity and love to thy poor servant spare.

[G. C. P., London.]

Olivia, fair as she whom Avon's bard
Portrayed ; dear object of Orsino's heart,
Can I aspire that Fate may prove less hard
To me ill favoured ? Nay, Cesario's part
Is not for me whom Nature has denied
Her gifts that fascinate the casual eye.
Ah ! happy he who, welcome at thy side,
Finds thee respondent to his burdened sigh !
Thrice happy he who through this weary while
Of transitory things shall gain thy love ;
Who thro' the impending cloud shall see thy smile
That bids him dwell dejecting care above !
My fair, be thine to rule the nobler sphere ;
'Tis vain that I should yearn to share thy life ;
I, slave of all that most is sad and drear :
Thou, peace's angel in a world of strife.

[L. L., Ramsgate.]

Fair Livy, hear thy Samuel's lay,
Extend one glance benign on him,
Experiencing the live-long day
Dan Cupid's darts in every limb.
His copy-book is scrawled with doves,
And olive-boughs, and nuptial rings ;
His dreams are of Cythera's groves,
Responsive nymphs, and similar things.
Grant me, High Jove, the hour to see
That shall abridge my single life
With this : "I Samuel take thee, Olivia, to my wedded wife" !

[R. F. McC., Whitby.]

Mistress Olivia, with the beaming eye,
Which for its brightness with the stars can vie,
Oh, fairest of the fair, deign but to look
On one who leaves for thee his every book.
Your Samuel Johnson pants with passion's flame :
Ah, cruel fair ! alone thou art to blame.
Possessed of every grace beneath the sun,
Fair Queen of Beauty, leave me not undone.
Pure-souled Olivia, maid devoid of wiles,
Not in thy breast, as in the crocodile's,
Lurk treachery and deceit. It needs but this
To plunge thy lover in the realms of bliss :
That thou wilt listen to his tale of love
As did a mortal to immortal Jove.

[A. W., London.]

Diana chaste were counted all too bold,
And Cynthia unworthy of her name ;
And all fair virgins were as dark to light
Compared with thee, sweet mistress of my flame.

If Philomel would grant me her sweet voice,
I'd pour my passion in a melting lay,
Till zephyr should my love-sick measures waft,
And to my lady's bosom find a way.

A roseate hue the morn has given thy cheek,
And lily white the night has kissed thy heart ;
Thy eyes two stars that rise to higher state,
Thy lips the nectar cup the gods have pressed.

And if too bold, too over bold my plaint,
The gentle lightning of thine eye I'll meet,
Forsaking roses for the branch of peace,
Lay thy own name, Olivia, at thy feet.

[H. E. M., Edinburgh.]

Rejuvenescent Phœbus circumsolves
His terrene nymph : responsive to his art
She warms ; but my unchangeable resolves
Gain not the sister-fort, thy moon-cold heart.

Olivia ! 'Tis a name that Avon's swan
Hath made immortal ; but, were Shakespeare mute,
Thy charms, self justified, would yet live on.
O, live, Olivia, beauty a flower and root !

Thy predecessor by a reigning duke
Was long adored, though every sigh proved vain.
Thou reignest as a queen, and if thy look
Shall rest in kindness on a serving swain,
Nor earth, nor sea, nor sky, nor heaven, nor hell
Shall hold a truer knight than Samuel.

[T. C., Buxted.]

O fairest nymph, thy charma unite
To fill a lover with delight ;
Thy tranquil mind, with mirth imbued,
Leaves far the coquette and the prude.
Olivia, loveliest of thy sex,
May naught thy gentle nature vex !
Thy uttered name doth conjure forth
An image of surpassing worth.
I see a flower of rarest grace,
Oft as I gaze upon thy face.
Ah ! beauteous maid, shall I implore,
Or stay enraptured and adore ?
The love my heart can not restrain
Is mix'd of chastened joy and pain ;
If tongue refuse its office meet
I'll lay me at thy virgin feet.

ONE WEEK FROM TO-DAY—PERHAPS SOONER,
The Times
 MUST WITHDRAW ITS REMARKABLE OFFER OF
“The First Fifty Years of ‘Punch,’ 1841-1891.”

(Reprinted by the Proprietors of Punch from their Original Plates.)

100 Volumes in 25,

AND A 26th

“THE HISTORY OF ‘PUNCH,’ BY M. H. SPIELMANN.

“NOW OR NEVER.”

No such advantageous cession to secure the volumes has ever been presented, and when the present edition is exhausted the opportunity ends. For the moment a purchaser who promptly sends his order effects a direct saving of not less than £25 6s. 3d.

The untold weekly parts of “Punch” cost 3d. each, or for the 2,657 numbers, including the almanacs, £33 4s. 3d. The large paper edition of “The History of ‘Punch’” was published at £2 2s. These two items amount to £35 6s. 3d.

The binding of the 25 quadruple volumes of “Punch” would cost, at the ordinary retail price, about £5 in cloth, or £10 in half-morocco.

Most persons naturally select the durable half-morocco binding for a set of volumes, which become more valuable every year, and the total price to them for the loose “Punch” numbers, “The History of ‘Punch,’” and the binders’ bill, would make the cost of the 26 volumes at least £45 6s. 3d.

As against this, “The Times” offers the half-morocco set for £20.

Here is an immediate saving of £25 6s. 3d.—of over £55 per cent.; but that is not all. You may compare the price now named by “The Times” not only with the price which you would have had to pay in the ordinary course, but also with the price which these sets of “Punch” will command a few years hence.

The copies supplied by “The Times” at the present prices will have a direct tendency to stimulate a keener interest in “Punch,” a more general demand for the volumes. The series becomes more interesting and, therefore, of a higher market value each year.

THE “PUNCH” BOOKCASE.

A number of Special Bookcases for PUNCH have been manufactured and will be supplied to purchasers of THE FIRST FIFTY YEARS OF PUNCH at much less than the ordinary price for so substantial a piece of furniture.

The PUNCH Bookcase is about 52 inches in height, 30 inches in width, and 12½ inches in depth. It is made of dark quartered oak, and it is intended to stand either against a wall or across a corner of a room.

PRICES FOR PURCHASERS TO-DAY.

Winning of May," &c. In 1 vol., crown 8vo, price 6s.
"The scene is laid in the England of to-day, and though the story is romantic in a sense, it is so within modern limitations.
What most strikes one is the excellence of the construction.
Women especially will like this novel, which will appeal successfully to their feelings."—Globe.
"The story is wholesome, the author grips her involved plot thoroughly, and the developing interest leads up to a finish in which everybody is made happy."—Glasgow Herald.

The Literary Week.

TOLSTOI, we imagine, will find himself able to bear the latest arrow of outrageous fortune with equanimity. The Holy Synod of Russia has issued a secret ukase excommunicating him on account of his novel, Resurrection. It declares that Tolstoi has shown himself clearly and plainly to be an enemy of the Orthodox Christian Church. Among other sins, he is charged with distorting the sacred text of the Gospel, finding fault with Holy Church, calling it a human arrangement, and so on.

MR. GEORGE MOORE has finished the first writing of his novel Sister Teresa, which we are informed is not a sequel to Evelyn Innes. Sister Teresa was contained in the original idea, and the publication of Evelyn Innes was decided on because the book had lengthened out to 500 pages, and Mr. Moore's publisher felt that novels of 1,000 pages in length would demand some new form of publication not easy to devise. Sister Teresa will be as long, or nearly as long as Evelyn Innes, and when the two books are brought together, as Mr. Moore hopes they will ultimately be, the story of Evelyn Innes will be the longest novel ever written about one character, for together the two books will contain about 300,000 words. As soon as Sister Teresa is finished Mr. Moore will begin to re-write Evelyn Innes. The two books will be published together probably in the spring of next year.

MR. FRANKFORT MOORE writes (apropos of this remark in our Bibliographical page last week: "Mr. Frankfort Moore has just made Nell Gwyn the central figure of a novel, thus following immediately in the wake of Mr. Anthony Hope"):

To prevent the confusion which might arise from our both addressing the same lady, do me the favour to allow me to remind you that the first of my "Nell Gwyn" episodes appeared in the pages of Pearson's Magazine eighteen months before Mr. Anthony Hope's "Simon Dale" had begun its course in serial form. Your mention last week of the fact that my "Nell Gwyn, Comedian," followed hard upon "Simon Dale" suggests that I was made aware of the possibilities of the "Impudent Comedian" by studying her portrait as painted by the master hand of Mr. Anthony Hope. Though I daresay I might have done so with great advantage to my art, yet, having written and printed my story, the privilege of following in the wake of another novelist was denied to me.

MR. CHARLES WHIBLEY has marked his recovery from severe illness by the completion of his editorial work on the "Tudor Translations." Vol. III. of Rabelais, which comprises Motteaux' version of Books IV. and V., will shortly be in the subscribers' hands.

Two literary clubs, the Johnson and the Whitefriars, have chosen Stratford-on-Avon as the scene of their annual outing. The Whitefriars Club has the advantage over the Johnson Club in that the members will take tea, so we learn from the Sphere, with Miss Marie Corelli.

AMONG the contents of the new number of the Anglo-Saxon Review we note "The Logic of Events," by Mr. Maurice Hewlett; "The Limitations of Art," by Mr. W. H. Mallock; and "An Eclogue of the Downs," by Mr. John Davidson.

MR. JAMES LANE ALLEN's new novel, The Increasing Purpose (formerly announced under the title of The Hemp-breaker), will be published shortly by Macmillan & Co. The key-note of the story is given in Tennyson's well-known lines from "Locksley Hall":

Yet I doubt not through the ages one increasing purpose runs,
And the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns.

It is a little difficult to keep pace with Mr. Crockett's exuberant production. This week we review Joan of the Sword Hand; this week, too, his newest novel, Little Anna Mark, is upon us. It has 446 pages, and begins thus:

"Come in hither, Joe Janet! Here you will see at one eye-blink the whole cursed pack kennelled, the lying priest that slandered me, the fatted English calf that disinherited me, and the gap-toothed old hound that begat me—and did me other disservice beside!"

WE are asked to state that the New Liberal Review, to which we referred the other day, will be a monthly and not a weekly publication. It will be under the control of Mr. Cecil Harmsworth.

WITH the opening of the Wallace collection in Hertford House, Manchester-square, next week a most interesting and valuable addition will be made to the galleries of London. The collection which the late Lady Wallace bequeathed to the British nation is housed in 22 rooms, arranged as follows:

- |  |  |
|--|--|
| 1. Portraits of Royal Personages.                                  | and Paintings by Canaletto and Guardi.                           |
| 2. French Furniture.   | 13, 14. Dutch Schools of 17th Century.                           |
| 3. Painting of the Earlier Schools, Majolica, and Limoges Enamels. | 15. French and British Schools of 19th Century.                  |
| 4. Sculpture Hall.   | 16. Italian, Spanish, Flemish, Dutch, and English Schools.       |
| 5, 6, 7. European Armoury.   | 17. Schools of 17th Century.                                     |
| 8. Oriental Armoury.   | 18, 19, 20, and Great Staircase. French Schools of 18th Century. |
| 9, 10. French and British Schools of 19th Century.                 | 21, 22. Water-colours.   |
| 11. Paintings by Oudry and Desportes, and Miniatures.              |  |
| 12. French Furniture, &c.,   |  |

THE book which Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne has arranged for the benefit of the War Fund will be published, almost immediately, under the title of "For Britain's Soldiers." Messrs. Methuen, who are bringing it out, are giving their services gratuitously. The contributors are Messrs. Alden, Besant, Crockett, Hornung, Hyne, Kipling, Mason, Moore, Pemberton, Roberts, Ridgway, Wells, White, Wood, and Mrs. Croker.

THE issue of the "Works of George Warrington Stevens" has begun with a volume entitled Things Seen: Impressions of Men, Cities, and Books. The title hardly fits such of the contents of the volume as the article on "Mr. Balfour's Philosophy," "From the New Gibbon," or "The New Humanitarianism." A golden-brown canvas has been chosen for the binding; the Hon. John Collier's admirable portrait of Mr. Stevens is reproduced as frontispiece. Mr. G. S. Street has selected and edited; and Mr. Henley has written the introductory Memoir, which, however, is rather to be described as a critical appreciation. When Mr. Stevens joined the Daily Mail, this is how he stood, Mr. Henley thinks:

He had shown, not once but many times, that he could understand. He was now to prove to admiration that he could both understand and see: that, given a figure, an aspect, an incident, even a great and notable passage in affairs, he could apply that admirable brain of his to the task of observing and realising what he saw, on lines so essential and so clean that, his faculty of speech thrown in, 'twas easy for him—almost too easy—to pass on the final effect of his vision. This is putting it baldly enough, no doubt; and I do not know that it will make matters very much better to note that, at the time of his recording his impressions in the terms which made his fame, he stood alone among English journalists. To be sure, the capacity he showed was not now for the first time shown in English journalism. Dickens had exemplified it, and that with "an immense and far-reaching instinct of the Picturesque" (I quote from memory, from Mr. Henry James); so had Ruskin; so had Meredith and R. L. Stevenson; so had Rudyard Kipling. I do not think that Stevens was deeply read in any of these writers; and that I do not think so is enough to show that I hold him better versed in Greek and Latin than he was in English. All the same, he was cut out of the same stuff with them: the peculiar capacity for vision and realisation, which was theirs, was his also; so that his "Omdurman," done amid the stinks and horrors of the field, is like to remain a classic—and a classic unsurpassed—for many years to come. He had a sort of visual grip of things: not reckless, nor haphazard, nor touched with sentiment; but alert, athletic, of an absolute and unalterable serenity. I am told (and I can very well believe) that a certain commander-in-chief, himself the hardest and sternest of communicants, has, on his own confession, been more than once indebted to George's despatches for essentials in his own.

The volume, to which we shall return, renews one's knowledge of the variety of Mr. Stevens's work.

THE strongest and most original appreciation of the late Mr. R. A. M. Stevenson which has yet come in our way is certainly Mr. Henley's in the Pall Mall Magazine. It is a little startling to find Mr. Henley writing such sentences as these of R. A. M. S. and R. L. S.:

Each is a loss to us. But I think, as I sit here writing of both, that we shall get ten Lewises, or a hundred even, or ever we get a Bob.

Certainly a little startling; but Mr. Henley has a right to the opinion. He suggests that R. A. M. S. was the greater, though the less productive and definable man; and he places them in the relation of master and pupil:

Lewis [Mr. Henley's spelling] Stevenson was, of course, for all his weak lung, one of fortune's favourites; but I have ever thought, and I shall ever believe that, in having his cousin for a chief influence in his beginnings, he was especially favoured—favoured, it may be, even beyond his deserts.

Mr. Henley is writing with R. A. M. S.'s talk in his ears. The books of R. L. S. are before us; but his cousin's talk is returned to air, and perhaps no single register of it has been kept. Not all able men write; some of the ablest loathe writing. Mr. Henley says that R. A. M. S. loathed it. "His true gift was that of talk; and he had it—Heavens! in what perfection! I think I've heard the best of my time; but among them there is but one

R. A. M. S." Here is his picture of R. A. M. S. among his listeners, in his own room:

Someone, bright-eyed, a little flushed, ever courteous, ever kindly, ever humorous, taking any bit of the Universe as his theme, descanting upon it as if he had a prescriptive right in it, and delighting everyone who listened by the unfailing excellence, wisdom, sanity—(however insane it seemed at times!) of what he had to say. Says a friend of his, and mine, in a letter announcing his death: "He was commentary, and that should go on for ever. Good commentary on whatever God saw fit to provide. It seems to me to dwindle the applications of the Universe that it can no longer serve for his interpretations." Had Lewis lived to reassert himself, and had it been possible for any one of us to sit and heed while these two—the Master and the Pupil—talked of That which is, That which must be, and That which may be, then should we have heard about the best that spoken speech can do.

Who invented the Circulating Library? Mr. Archibald Clark, who tries to answer this question in the Library, is properly cautious. Hints and projects there may have been in abundance before the Rev. Samuel Fancourt started his circulating library in Crane-court, Fleet-street, next door to the Royal Society, about 1740 or 1742. Fancourt was a Nonconformist minister at Salisbury, who was driven up to London by some quarrel with his congregation. Author, schoolmaster, and librarian, he struggled along for many years in London. Time has saved few particulars of his methods of working the library, which was governed by a committee. The subscription was a guinea a year at first, but it was considerably reduced later. Fancourt seems to have got together about 3,000 volumes, and to have attracted many subscribers; but in the end things went badly with him, and he died in Hoxton under the care of religious people in his ninetieth year. The details of his work in Crane-court are few and vague, and the interest of Mr. Clark's article would have been increased if he had given the titles of some of the more typical books in Fancourt's Catalogue; for he compiled a catalogue.

AMONG books which have been "called back"—reissued, that is to say, to meet an entirely new demand—must be numbered Major-Gen. Baden Powell's The Downfall of Premph, first published in 1896. It is now reissued in Messrs. Methuen's Sixpenny Library, with illustrations "after" B.-P.'s own sketches. A few of the illustrations, however, do not appear to have been re-drawn. B.-P.'s "Apology to the Reader" is a very characteristic document. The reason for the book:

On every side I am badgered—and I suppose that most of the other members of the expedition have been similarly badgered—with the remark:

"Oh, you have come back? Now I do hope you are writing a book about it. You are wasting your opportunities if you don't."

These importunities have reached a climax. I will take the plunge. I will shut myself up for four days, and will overhaul my diary.

The moral of the book:

That my tale should not be entirely futile, I shall endeavour to make it point a moral, and to save the reader the trouble of wading through its tedious pages. I will here at once say that the moral may be summed up thus:

A smile and a stick will carry you through any difficulty in the world, more especially if you act upon the old West Coast Motto, "Softly, softly, catchee monkey."

MR. T. W. H. CROSLAND, whose humorous odes are a popular feature of the Outlook, has republished a selection of these eccentric compositions. And for a railway journey, in which the jig of the lines may come into harmony with the jog of the carriage, they make good shilling reading. We take the liberty of quoting, and (by curtailment) mutilating the most literary of these undeniably "pleasant" odes:

TO MR. W. B. YEATS.

But, when it comes
To
The Celtic
Muse,
I sneeze:
There is no such person—
That is to say,
The Muse of Mr. Yeats and his following
Is not Celtic at all,
But merely the late William Blake
Done up
In green petticoats—
And William Blake
Was A Cockney.

I have not the smallest desire
To discount
Your great gifts, Mr. Yeats;
I hold
That you have given us
A considerable body
Of decent poetry,
And I forgive you
Many things in consequence.
At the same time,
Until you expunge "Celtic"
From among the epithets
Of your Muse,
Some of us
Will never feel ourselves Really able
To swallow you.

PARTS 6 and 7 of The History of the Boer War (Methuen), just issued, are particularly interesting: they comprise the fights of Modder River, Magersfontein, and Stormberg. Mr. Cunliffe's narrative flows with ease, and his commentary is just and helpful. The illustrations are excellent.

THE recent completion of the "Eversley" Shakespeare (Macmillan), in ten volumes, is followed by its re-issue in separate plays, with Prof. C. H. Herford's introductions. The merits of the "Eversley" edition are, therefore, simply retained in this subdivided edition. Prof. Herford's introductions are very much to the point; and his notes are sound. The latter might have been different; some seem rather needless; some that seem called for are not given; but to say this is only to say what is suggested by every annotated Shakespeare. The reader's whole curiosity cannot be satisfied in a handy edition; a library of comment must leave much in the dark. Alike for easy reading or close study the "Eversley" Shakespeare is excellent.

THE language of invective is seldom seen nowadays in print; but it can still be studied when an American Presidential Election is imminent. We do not refer to the slangy abuse of inferior newspapers; but to the reasoned denunciations of such a paper as the New York Nation. On the merits of the questions now engaging the American public we have no opinion to express; we merely wish to show that the blend of logic and wrath which is found in Defoe, Junius, and other pamphleteers is not quite dead. Under the title of "The Idol," the Nation has a scathing article on Mr. McKinley's career at White House, concluding as follows:

The fulsome adulation bestowed upon McKinley has surpassed anything in the memory of the present generation, and has been worthy of the subjects of a South American Rosas. His reputation for humanity and statesmanship has been gained by keeping his mouth shut at a critical time when Congress seemed driving towards what the country dreaded. Yet he has made no disguise of his profession that the Constitution does not extend over him ex proprio vigore, and that, as a rule, he has no veto for any action whatsoever taken by a Republican Congress. Complete party subserviency, a rare gift for wire-pulling, a genius for cant and humbug, mark his public career both in and out of the White House. Of courage—even of genuine feeling unalloyed by selfish consideration—not a trace. He has never coined a phrase that will be remembered except to his shame, nor contributed one leading idea to the political thought of the day. In spite of the tremendous changes in the extent of national territory and the Republican ideals wrought under his administration, he must personally sink at last into the oblivion of a Buchanan or a Pierce, but to a lower level.

That McKinley's renomination, a fortnight hence, is inevitable we cannot doubt; nor do we judge the probabilities of his re-election according to our hopes.

"It may succeed; and if our sins should call For more than common punishment, it shall."

IN the same magazine, Mr. H. B. Wheatley discusses with acumen the new Rules for Compiling the Catalogues in the Department of Printed Books in the British Museum, recently issued by order of the Trustees. Cataloguing is one of those things which looks simple, but is in fact full of mysteries; looks dull, but is in fact the breath of life to eager librarians. To us there seems to be force in some of Mr. Wheatley's criticisms. For example, by the Museum rules Peers are placed under their surnames; but, as Mr. Wheatley points out, the Peer's name is lost in his title; we do not think of Marlborough as Churchill, and in a score of cases the search for a Peer's book involves a previous search for his family name—which is a nuisance. Another of Mr. Wheatley's objections is directed to Rule 11, which tells us: "In the case of authors who change their name, or add to it a second, after having begun to write under the first, the heading is to consist of the original name followed by the word 'afterwards,' and the name subsequently adopted." Mr. Wheatley points out how badly this works in the case of Mrs. Sherwood, a well-known writer, whose works must be looked for under her first name of Butt.

A still better example may, however, be instanced. The well-known historian, Sir Francis Palgrave (1788-1861), changed his name from Cohen to Palgrave in 1823, but before that date two trifling publications appeared under his original name: in 1797 a translation into French from a Latin version of The Battle of the Frogs and Mice, made at the age of eight and published by his father, and in 1818 a collection of Anglo-Norman Chansons, published by himself. None of the works which made his name famous were published under the name of Cohen, and possibly nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand readers are ignorant that Palgrave ever bore another name. May we not, therefore, object to a rule that causes his works to be hidden away under the heading of Cohen?

But surely there is a cross reference to Cohen under Palgrave? If so, the reader has not much ground for complaint. In any case the force of these objections is not easy to measure. The rules are founded, we must suppose, on a vast number of instances, and a continuous and detailed experience. We do not know that they are bad because we see a few of their inevitable failures dangled before our eyes. They must fail and perplex sometimes; but how often do they succeed?

THERE is a useful account of Modern Persian Literature in the June North American Review, by Mr. E. Denison Ross, Professor of Persian in University College. It is probably news to many that Persia contains no printing press, and that for the distribution of its literature it relies entirely on copyists and on lithography. Early in the present century a printing press was set up at Tabriz, but its career was brief and inglorious:

The unpopularity of type-writing in Persia is due to two principal causes: firstly, the straightness of the lines offends a Persian's artistic sense; and, secondly, in printed books the character of the letters is entirely lost. The same cause which leads a Persian to esteem so highly great calligraphers makes him deplore all absence of character in a type-printed book. What most delights him is a well-written MS., and he takes the same delight in the copyist's work as we take in the touch of an old master. Failing this, he contents himself with a lithograph, which is usually the facsimile of the writing of some fairly good scribe, and has, at any rate, a human element about it.

Under these circumstances it might be thought that no very visible book-trade is done in Persia. But such is not the case:

In every big bazaar a certain number of shops are set apart for the sale of books. In these one finds the book-seller—in his long, dark outer mantle and his high, black lamb's-skin hat—seated on the floor surrounded by his little stock-in-trade. The front of his shop is open, like a butcher's, while his books are either arranged in shelves against the three walls, or in heaps upon the floor. His collection usually consists of lithograph editions of Korans, school-books, favourite poets and historians, but the assortment is limited. Besides these, hidden away in a corner, he often has one or two MSS. which he has either bought as a speculation or is trying to dispose of for a friend.

Even lithography has not been much applied to the multiplication of Persian standard works. Many of these exist only in MS., while others have been lithographed only by the efforts of Indians and Europeans.

C. K. S. publishes in the Sphere the following verses by Mr. George Cable, the well-known American novelist. They were printed in a newspaper a quarter of a century ago, and were written, Mr. Cable explains, on the birth of his eldest child:

THE NEW ARRIVAL.

There came to port last Sunday night
The queerest little craft,
Without an inch of rigging on,
I looked, and looked, and laughed!
It seemed so curious that she Should cross the unknown water,
And moor herself right in my room—
My daughter! O my daughter!

Yet by these presents witness all,
She's welcome fifty times,
And comes consigned to Hope and Love
And common-metre rhymes.
She has no manifest but this,
No flag floats o'er the water;
She's too new for the British Lloyds—
My daughter! O my daughter!

Ring out wild bells, and tame ones too,
Ring out the lovers' moon,
Ring in the little worsted socks,
Ring in the bib and spoon.
Ring out the muse, ring in the nurse,
Ring in the milk and water;
Away with paper, pen and ink—
My daughter! O my daughter!

Bibliographical.

As I write, Mr. Arthur Waugh's monograph on Robert Browning is at the point of issue, and I read that Mr. Stopford Brooke is at work upon the Browning Lectures which are to be published as a companion to his book on Tennyson. Few, perhaps—save Browningolaters—are aware of the extent of the literature which has grown up round Robert Browning. The ball was set rolling in 1885, when Mrs. Sutherland Orr produced her Handbook to the Works. Then came an interval of five years, the year 1890 being exceedingly productive. Then it was that we had from Mr. William Sharp his Life of the poet, from Mr. Edmund Gosse his Personalia, from Mr. J. T. Nettle-ship his book of critical essays, from Mr. E. Berdoo his account of Browning's Message, and from Mr. W. G. Kingsland his celebration of Browning as "chief poet of the age." In 1891 came the Life and Letters, by Mrs. Orr; the Guide, by Mr. G. W. Cooke; the Cyclopaedia, by Mr. Berdoo; and the Primer, by F. Mary Wilson.

Even more fertile was 1892, which brought with it disquisitions by W. F. Revell on Browning's Criticism of Life, by W. Fairfax on his association with the Drama, and by Jeanie Morison on certain of his poems, together with an Introduction by Corson, a Primer by Esther Defries, and a collection by F. Galand of Sermons from Browning. In 1893 came a book of Studies (by F. Walters) of Some of Browning's Poems; also a discourse on Browning and Whitman by O. L. Triggs. In 1894 the poet was let alone, but in 1895 we had A Few Words on him by L. H. Vincent, a discussion (by H. Jones) of his philosophical teaching, and a volume of Studies by members of the Browning Society. Mr. Berdoo reappeared in 1896 with a treatise on the poet's Christian Faith. In 1898 we had more Studies—this time from the pen of Mr. J. Fotheringham. Last year brought with it not only The Letters of Robert Browning and Elizabeth Barrett, but a collection of Essays by Marion Little. And these details have to do only with the books and brochures relating to Browning; of magazine articles I cannot here say anything.

In last week's ACADEMY an esteemed correspondent quoted the following lines as from "a famous parody":

An ape there was once, in the days that were earlier,
The centuries passed and his hair became curlier,
Some centuries more gave a thumb to his fist,
Then he called himself man—and a Positivist.

The writer, no doubt, was quoting from memory; but what Mortimer Collins really penned was, of course, this:

There was an Ape in the days that were earlier;
Centuries passed, and his hair became curlier.
Centuries more gave a thumb to his wrist—
Then he was Man, and a Positivist.

This, obviously, is at once more concise and more effective. Nor is it correct to speak of the jeu d'esprit from which the stanza is taken as a "parody." It is part and parcel of Collins's British Birds, which is simply a rhythmic essay in the Aristophanic manner.

I observe that somewhere in the provinces next week there is to be performed a dramatic piece called "The Publisher." I hope we may regard this as significant of the position taken by the publishing fraternity in the social cosmogony to-day. Not that this will be by any means the first appearance of a publisher on the theatrical boards. On the contrary, so long ago as 1757 the dramatis personæ of a comedy by Foote, called "The Author," included a publisher named Vamp. Authors themselves have always been tolerably conspicuous in the drama. There was one, called Luckless, in Fielding's "Author's Farce" (1730), and another, called Dramatick, in "The Author's Triumph" (1737). Still, I do not think that either authors or publishers are accepted as very heroic figures on the stage. They do not seem to possess for the public the element of romance.

It is understood that Mr. Whibley's new book, called The Pageantry of Life, is to deal with notable fops and such-like. It is not a bad subject (as the elect would say), because, although Beau Brummell has been pretty well exploited, there are other men of his profession who still lack celebration. Beau Nash, for example, has been but little discoursed upon. I remember a book, named The Wits and Beaux of Society, written by "Grace and Philip Wharton," which had a certain measure of vogue a few decades ago; but possibly Mr. Whibley has never so much as heard of it.

Love's Comedy. By Henrik Ibsen. Translated by C. H. Herford. (Duckworth & Co. 3s. 6d.)

THIS English edition of the first of Ibsen's three great satiric dramas in verse is an admirable one in every respect. To a brilliant translation of the play Prof. Herford has added a critical estimate which leaves little else to be said; and in the matter of format the publishers have done their part worthily. Prof. Herford has been assisted in the work of translation by Mr. William Archer, who is alone responsible for the first twenty pages, and to some slight extent by Mr. Edmund Gosse. The latter critic, by the way, who was probably the first prophet that Ibsen ever had in this country, remarked many years ago, in an essay containing a number of extracts from Love's Comedy, that he had translated Ibsen's rhymes into blank verse—"a rhymed play being a shocking thing to English readers since Dryden's day." Prof. Herford, at any rate, has shown that a rhymed play in English need not be a shocking thing. His ingenuities, his felicities, and his occasional sheer lyrical force and beauty, could not easily be over-praised. His version of Love's Comedy will certainly rank with his version of Brand. Mr. Gosse's fragments, nevertheless, are extremely successful, and there are moments when he can surpass Prof. Herford in the adroit terseness of epigrammatic wit. Thus:

He loved her to the tones of his guitar,
And she responded on the harpsicord—
And first they lived on credit—is distinctly better than—

He loved her to the notes of the guitar
And she gave lessons on the violin—
Then all, of course, on credit they bespoke—

This is scarcely the time of day to enter upon a detailed discussion of Love's Comedy. Written in 1862, the last thing that Ibsen did before he turned his back upon inimical Norway, it has formed the theme of countless dissertations since then. The public have long known all about it; now they are put in a position to know the piece itself. The tendency of critical opinion has been, while admitting the extraordinary talent displayed in the comedy, to place it in a category by itself as a general picture of manners rather than with the other dramas as a pièce à thèse. Mr. Gosse, for example, after dealing fully with the first two rather stagnant acts, dismisses the third in a few lines as something merely "tragical." It seems to us that Love's Comedy is just as much a problem-play, just as typical of its author, as anything that Ibsen ever wrote. The first two acts, with their elaborate and ferocious satire upon a society which insists on turning Love into prose, are but a preparation for the third, where all the action and most of the lyricism is concentrated. Brilliant as they are, the first two acts cannot be compared with the third. Here the problem—whether or not Love and Marriage are reconcilable—is stated and solved with a simplicity, a poetical beauty, and a dramatic effectiveness, worthy of the early direct vigour of a great genius. Svanhild's superb outburst strikes the note of high song at the beginning of the act:

O suffer me in silence still to dream.
Speak you for me; my budding thoughts, grown strong,
One after one will burgeon into song,
Like lilies in the bosom of the stream.

Homeless within my mother's house I dwelt,
Lonely in all I thought, in all I felt,
A guest unbidden at the feast of mirth—
Accounted nothing—less than nothing—worth.
Then you appeared! For the first time I heard
My own thought uttered in another's word;

To my lame visions you gave wings and feet—
You young unmasker of the obsolete!
Half with your caustic keenness you alarmed me
Half with your radiant eloquence you charmed me,
As sea-girt forests summon with their spell
The sea their flinty beaches still repel.
Now I have read the bottom of your soul,
Now you have won me, undivided, whole;
Dear forest, where my tossing billows beat,
My tide's at flood and never will retreat.

From this point, even through all the reasoned dialectics of Guldstad, the tension is never loosed till Svanhild's final words are uttered:

Now over is my life, by lea and lawn,
The leaves are falling;—now the world may take me.

We have said that the problem is stated and solved. But we should hesitate to admit that it is solved in the right way. Ibsen's animus against the conditions of marriage is too marked and too bitter to allow him to hold the scales evenly. His conclusion is that love is bound to die in marriage, and that sudden death, with a sort of after life in memory, is preferable to this lingering torture of extinction. Therefore Guldstad, the sagacious bourgeois and far-seeing Philistine, is "put on" to frighten the lovers:

That heartfelt love can weather unimpaired
Custom, and Poverty, and Age, and Grief.
Well, say it be so; possibly you're right;
But see the matter in another light.
What love is, no man ever told us—whence
It issues, that ecstatic confidence
That one life may fulfil itself in two—
To this no mortal ever found the clue.
But marriage is a practical concern,
As also is betrothal, my good sir—
And by experience easily we learn
That we are fitted just for her, or her,
But love, you know, goes blindly to its fate,
Chooses a woman, not a wife, for mate;
And what if now this chosen woman was
No wife for you—?

With such two-edged words Guldstad begins his attack—an attack which continually increases in subtlety and strength of logic—until at last the lovers yield, and, after they have sought and found a pale voluptuous ecstasy in the sensation of parting for all eternity, Svanhild gives herself mildly to the ingenious and opulent Guldstad. But could this have occurred so? Could a passion which Ibsen would have us believe was of the sort known as elemental have ended in so futile and so logical a manner? The event of a great passion is not decided by syllogisms. The supreme lovers never think; they feel. They never measure risks; they accept them. Had Guldstad's argument been a thousandfold more potent than it was, a great love must have prevailed against it, brushing it aside by mere instinct. Great lovers never yet parted except at the bidding of a lofty sense of duty, and not always then. Svanhild and Falk had no such motive for separation, and, therefore, when they part we cease to believe in them. For them to part was a transgression against human nature. Human nature is more imperious than logic, and life is not to be mapped out by the pen of reason. And so it happens that the conclusion of Love's Comedy—brilliant, beautiful, tender—while a triumph of symmetrical rationalism, is a fatal lapse from essential truth. The very core of it is false, and not all the pageant of genius can cover up this disastrous secret. In Love's Comedy Ibsen has sinned the artistic sin of putting an environment round an idea, instead of drawing the idea from the environment. He invented a proposition, and tried to demonstrate it by means of an art-work. But in art the proposition, instead of preceding, must succeed the work.

Neither Prof. Herford nor Mr. William Archer nor Mr. Edmund Gosse nor Dr. George Brandes seems to have pointed out the fact that Love's Comedy is the spiritual complement of Gautier's Mademoiselle de Maupin. And Théodore's final letter to Albert, after she has quitted him, fails to convince in exactly the same way, and from the same cause, that the last scene of Love's Comedy fails to convince. "Cela durera six mois, deux ans, dix ans même, si vous voulez, mais il faut toujours quo tout finisse. . . . A quoi bon attendre d'en venir là?" What sweet dolour! What pretty melancholia! And how ignoble an attenuation of Love! Such utterances may be the voice of reason, but the sublime madness of Tristan and Isolde is more sane.

The Newman of His Time.

The Confessions of St. Augustine. In Ten Books. (Kegan Paul.)

It is not a new translation of the famous Confessions of St. Augustine which Messrs. Kegan Paul have issued; but it is a new and limited edition, beautiful in letterpress and parchment binding. It is so fine an edition that we are the more tempted to regret the publishers did not depart from the bad old precedent by issuing a complete translation. For, in accordance with the usual custom, the last three books are omitted. It is true that these last three books have no personal bearing, and are not of a nature to interest the majority of readers. But that is a matter for the reader himself, not for publisher or translator. Why should this, alone of all masterpieces, be subject to arbitrary and sweeping mutilation, in an age which is seriously indignant at the omission of the smallest obscenity from any profane author? We sincerely hope that some publisher will have the enterprise to give us a complete edition of the Confessions, leaving the responsibility for all they contain, as it should be left, with their illustrious author.

The fact that such an iniquity can be perpetrated, and has for a number of years been perpetrated, without so much as a comment, suggests that this famous book is more familiar by name than in fact. Even Byron talked of it; but when he said that St. Augustine "in his fine Confessions makes us envy his transgressions," one wonders whether he had read it—as Byron was certainly the last person one would expect to read St. Augustine. For anything less voluptuous than the saint's account of those "transgressions" could not well be conceived: the romantic reader will be disposed, indeed, to complain that it is so meagre and dispassionate. In truth, the reader who approaches this book with expectations roused by the customary manner of reference to it is likely to be very considerably discomfited. Have the customary referrers themselves any first-hand knowledge of it? one is moved to speculate. They suggest to the modern reader that he will find in Augustine a classical Amiel, a religious Mario Bashkirtseff—intimate details of early profligacy, experiments on life, soul-questioning and world-questioning. But to the reader accustomed to the very open door, the extreme dishabille and unquailing "realism" of the modish autobiography, St. Augustine will seem very skimmed milk indeed. They will fool as if they had gone to a theatre and come by mistake upon a pulpit-orator. The biography has not much detail according to our ideas; it is cast in a most undramatic—we might almost say un-narrative—form; and it is soaked through with the religious spirit in such a fashion that you are not for a moment suffered to forget the intense religious preoccupation of its author. To the student of character this feature is itself a document, an integral part of the man, and therefore of the book's appeal. But to the general reader it must come as a disconcerting surprise. He will have the temerity to say that the great and lauded Confessions are "dry."

Yet if you will put yourself in the proper attitude they are not that: nay, if you put yourself in the proper attitude you will understand the traditional reputation of the book. Conceive yourself a Christian—or, if you will, a Pagan—in the days of Valentinian the Emperor, when Christianity was established, through the Imperial profession of it, but Paganism was the aristocratic and fashionable creed. To be a Christian still meant to draw upon yourself cold looks and obloquy from your friends, if you were a member of the higher orders, as Augustine shows us in this book. The question between Paganism and Christianity was a burning question, as full of vital appeal to the hearts and consciences of the moment as the old Tractarian controversy (let us say) in its day. But the appeal was more instant, more universal. Upon such a world came forth this book from the Newman of his time, a man who had gone through the great internal struggle through which thousands were going, and had attained high ecclesiastical rank, high reputation as a great controversial writer, in the Church of his final adoption. It was Augustine's Apologia pro Vita Sua. This—and more. For it was a world entirely without personal literature of any kind; a world still feeding on the stately remains of the classical authors, brought up on their coldly impersonal models, imbued with their impersonal literary traditions. And this man had gone through the great struggle common to most of mankind—decide it how they will—the struggle between the higher life and the lower, between the body and the soul, the beast and the angel. In this he had gone through more than the calm recluse of Littlemore. Upon a world so without the very conception of, or precedent for, personal literature he exploded the record of that personal struggle. Related simply, truthfully, without ostentation and without suppression, in so far as he undertook to relate it at all. Exploded is the right word, for the effect was resounding. It was Newman to an age which had no precedent for a Newman; it was Rousseau to an age which had not conceived in its heart the possibility of a Rousseau. It was the mirror of what all were experiencing held up before eyes which had never seen the likeness of a mirror. All which to us seems human and charming was to them trebly so; all which to us seems pale was to them magically and startlingly frank. An added intimacy of detail was not conceivable to them. The reverberations of that first éclatant sensation have come down the ages to us, impressing modern criticism of the book with the stress of accumulated tradition. It is as difficult to speak independently of it as to speak independently of Homer.

Yet when all this has been deduced and allowed for, there remains an undoubted residuum of eternal appeal. It was no traditional reverence which made Shelley condense an exquisite quotation from it as a heading for Alastor. "I was in love with love, nor had I aught which I might love; and I sought for what I might love, being in love with love." So it runs, as far as it is possible to translate it; and it suggests the reason of the Confessions' perennial appeal. For the quotation might stand as the motto of the Confessions themselves; it represents the whole strife and quest to which Augustine finally worked out the issue which satisfied himself. It was not the issue of Alastor; but the quest in both was the same. So long as that is the quest of the human heart, to human hearts the Confessions will have their interest.

For the man is very human, and has a very human history, notably human among religious biographies. We may well believe that his sins were forgiven him because he had loved much. The brilliant boy of Tagaste, who grew into the brilliant young teacher of rhetoric, had a strong element of the poet in him. In a more propitious age we may believe he would have been a poet; but it was an age when the hearthstone of poetry was cold, and the most distinguished career open to such gifts was doubtless that of rhetoric. The Confessions are full of poetic flashes. "Too late," he exclaims after his conversion, "too late I learned to love Thee, O Thou Beauty of ancient days!" The outburst is lyrical; it recalls a modern poet, who laments

That life was once so low, and love arrived so late.

Poetry and philosophy make Platonism, and "Plato the divine" was a passion with Augustine: the two milestones in his conversion are Plato and Paul. The open humanity of the man shines forth at every turn. Like Newman, he had a genius for friendship, and a magnetic power of retaining it; like Newman, he carried many of his friends with him even in his change of creed. There was a natural ingenuousness and refinement in him which caused him to retain an invincible modesty of demeanour and an unstated attraction even during the aberrations of his youth. And, indeed, his very sensuality was singularly unsensual, strikingly delicate for that age of unashamed coarseness. In his early quest for "quid amarem" he did not scruple to search for and pick up his mistress in the church itself—like that very different personage, Mr. Pepys. But, having found her, he remained absolutely faithful to her, and she to him, until the date of his conversion—an affection which he extended to the son she bore him. There must have been something unique, and uniquely fascinating, about the young rhetorician's character, for such mutual constancy, in such a period of society, and so irregular a connexion. Nor can his choice, one must surmise, have been a bad one, apart from the nature of the tie itself. Who she was or what she was Augustine never mentions: she passes from his narrative nameless and all but noteless. One regrets that it was not his conversion which at last broke the constant bond between them, but his mother's persistent treaty that he should "range himself" (as the French say) by a respectable marriage. And the immediate result of the separation was simply, alas! that Augustine took another mistress. Under the circumstances one feels a compassion for the hapless girl, and no little impatience with certain of the saint's biographers. One such, an ecclesiastic, expresses his hope that the sinning woman spent the rest of her life (in the convent to which she retired) repenting her sin in having so long kept this great servant of God from the Church to which he naturally pertained. Seeing that it was Augustine (so far as may be gathered from his own implication) who sought her, not she who sought Augustine; seeing her fidelity till she was set aside by his own decree, a more unjust attitude towards the poor child could not well be conceived. We are tempted to hope (and suppose) that the saint spent a considerable portion of his remaining life in repentance that he seduced a tender-hearted girl, and, after years of faithful cohabitation, abandoned the still loving mother of his child to shame. Unfair as it would be, it is less unfair than the position of the ecclesiastical biographer. We need hardly say that Augustine in no wise gives the smallest countenance to this ungenerous and iniquitous judgment. The saint was emphatically a gentleman—after the ideas of his time. If he did not marry the girl (and how many modern gentlemen would think it necessary?), he abstains from any slur upon her. He would hardly view it as an honour to him that anyone should cast on his poor victim the obloquy of enticement which he never cast; reversing their relations in a falsified zeal for his glory. He, the seducer, made the seduced; she, the betrayed, made the betrayer. It is not the attitude of the Confessions, nor one which could be less than abhorrent to the man who meant those Confessions to be a disclosure of his early flagitiousness.

How far, one may ask, has that purpose of self-humiliation caused him to exaggerate his early sins? It does not seem to have led him into any intemperance of statement. His errors, on his own showing, were very much less than those of most brilliant young men in the heyday of the senses and the passionate search for happiness which hurried him from Tagaste to Carthage, and Carthage to Rome and Rome to Milan. But it has biased him towards intemperance of judgment. His boyish lies, thefts, and gluttonies are set forth with an ascetic rigour of condemnation. He even declares that when Christ said, "Of such is the kingdom of Heaven," He must have spoken allegorically of the low stature of children, since they are too evil for the words to be literally understood!

But the mention of Augustine's childhood recalls what is assuredly a main part in the undying human appeal of this book. And that is Monica, his mother. She is one of the great and beautiful female figures of literature, no less than of history, as she is drawn by the tender touches of her son; she stands side by side with Antigone, Imogen, Cordelia. The world will not forget the ideal record of that long prayerful and patient pursuit of her child who was gone astray, which drew from the old bishop the declaration that the son of so many tears could not perish. "Elevaverunt flumina voces"—the floods have lifted up their voice; those floods of her year-long and life-long tears, the voice of which is heard through the ages "with the sound of many waters." That scene by night at Ostia, when she sat with the son whose conversion had at last been yielded to her prayers, discoursing of the heaven into which she was about to enter, remains in its unearthly beauty one of the memorable things in literature. That alone would make the Confessions divinely human, so long as man is born of woman.

Up and Down the World.

Travels Through the Alps. By James D. Forbes. Edited by W. A. B. Coolidge. (Black. 20s. net.)

Rambles and Studies in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Dalmatia. By Robert Munro. (Blackwood. 12s. 6d. net.)

Handbook for Travellers in Greece. Seventh Edition. (Murray. 20s.)

Handbook for Travellers in Constantinople, Brusa, and the Troad. (Murray. 7s. 6d.)

An Illustrated Historical Handbook to the Parish of Chelsea. By Reginald Blunt. (Lamley & Co.)

A THICK volume of nearly 600 pages now contains the more popular Alpine writings of the late Prof. Forbes—writings familiar to every student of Alpine phenomena and Alpine climbing. Four works are included, of which the longest is Travels Through the Alps of Savoy and Other Parts of the Penine Chain, originally published in 1843. A scientific appendix which was added to the second edition of 1845 has been omitted in accordance with the editor's intention of presenting in this volume only Forbes's narratives of travel and his more popular science. While, however, the scientific appendix has been left out, nothing has been taken from the learned survey of the Mer de Glace at Chamonix; and the chapter on "Experiments on the Motion of Ice" also remains, to be studied deeply or lightly at the reader's discretion. The second work is the Journals of Excursions in the High Alps of Dauphiné, Berne, and Saxony, originally printed at the end of Forbes's Norway and its Glaciers Visited in 1851, and now little known to Alpine students. The third work is an article from the Quarterly Review for April, 1857, on "Pedestrianism in Switzerland"; and the fourth is an article from the North British Review for March, 1865, on the "Topography of the Chain of Mont Blanc." Mr. Coolidge, whose editorship is simply the most competent that could have been obtained, gives us a careful and condensed biographical sketch of Forbes, whose Alpine career began in 1839. The points on which he lays emphasis are that Forbes was one of the earliest of British explorers of the High Alps; was the author of the first detailed book in English dealing with such explorations; and was a link between Saussure and the founders of the English Alpine Club. The grand conclusions of the book—i.e., Forbes's Theory of the Motion of Glaciers—remain as true as ever. Science has practically rested on Forbes's discovery, and Charles Kingsley's praise may be quoted to-day as freely as when it was penned. "We have heard Prof. Forbes's book on glaciers called an Epic Poem, and not without reason. But what gives that noble book its epic character is neither the glaciers, nor the laws of them, but the discovery of those laws; the methodic, truthful, valiant, patient battle between man and Nature, his final victory, his wrestling from her the secret which had been locked for ages in the ice-caves of the Alps, guarded by cold and fatigue, danger and superstitious dread." It was a happy idea to bind up with the "Epic" the smaller but not less characteristic works of one of the greatest of writers on the Alps. There are pages in the Quarterly article on "Pedestrianism in Switzerland" which call men to the Alps with a voice of power and priesthood. The article was written shortly after the Crimean War, and Forbes writes with eloquence:

We have all lately heard much of the influence of even remote chances of danger on the minds of our gallant officers and soldiers; we have heard much of the transition from the indolence of barrack life to the privation and risk of the battlefield, and to the sobering, humanising effect which it produced on minds possessing any tinge of nobleness of character. An Alpine journey is, perhaps, the nearest approach to a campaign with which the ordinary civilian has a chance of meeting. He has some of the excitements, and many of the difficulties and privations of warfare, without any of its disgusting and dreadful features.

Prof. Forbes had the true "out-of-door mind," to use a phrase of which he was fond; and in this great volume we meet science and manhood, brain and muscle, in a happy combination. With all its specialism—specialism of the scientist and specialism of the climber—these writings glow and live as a book; and we are glad that they have been printed and interpreted anew.

The second and enlarged edition of Mr. Munro's work is of great importance to the ethnologist. First published in 1895, the book aimed "to give an abbreviated account of the attractions—scenic, social, and scientific—of a portion of the Balkan peninsula, which, till lately, was almost inaccessible and unknown to the people of Western Europe." Mr. Munro is secretary of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, and an archaeologist of high attainments—his books on ancient Scottish lake dwellings, the European lake dwellings, and on many curious prehistoric problems being standard works. This reprint and enlargement of a work of great interest derives importance from the fact that the Government of Bosnia-Herzegovina has abandoned its intention of publishing a bilingual report of the proceedings of the Special Congress of Archaeologists and Anthropologists, held at Sarajevo in 1894. It was while attending this Congress that Mr. Munro wrote his work, which now has the distinction of being the only record in book form of the proceedings. The book cannot be described as "popular," and yet it would be an act of folly on the part of even the ordinary traveller to knowingly neglect Mr. Munro's work, in which is gathered a great deal of sound information about the archaeology of this interesting corner of Europe, together with much trustworthy inference and suggestion. Some new plates have been added, and the omission of an index from the first edition has been supplied.

Mr. Blunt's Chelsea guide strikes us as very good. We wish the paper had been less highly glazed, and something warmer in tint; but these are small points, on which tastes will differ. Although Mr. Blunt makes little claim to original research, we must credit him with a good deal of originality. One perceives immediately that he has thought out a clear working plan. The book is arranged on the basis of two itineraries, the first (the most interesting) taking riverside Chelsea, the second striking inland. For each of these itineraries a special map, not too large, and very easily folded, is supplied in a convenient part of the book, and on each the itinerary is marked in red. Once this simple arrangement is grasped, all is plain; Mr. Blunt squares his shoulders to the task of guidance. It is, of course, along the river side that his talk becomes glowing. Chelsea was essentially a river-side village, and the real Chelsea can be seen even now only from the river. There, or within sight of the water, the reverend things of the place group themselves: the church, Carlyle's house, Turner's cottage, Lindsey House, Cheyne Walk, and the sites of Sir Thomas More's house, Winchester House, Henry's VIII.'s Manor House, &c., &c. But we are not going to thread old Chelsea together. Mr. Blunt's book is to be read on the spot; every sentence is written with that idea; and, by the way, there are blank pages left for your inmost thoughts as you gaze at the old brick house in which Rossetti could not persuade Mr. Meredith to live. You don't know the story? Rossetti wanted everyone with brains, and a heart at all like his own, to live with him. He asked Ruskin, and Mr. Swinburne, and G. P. Boyce, and his brother William, and Mr. Meredith.

Mr. Meredith rather irresponsibly agreed to occupy a couple of rooms there, should the lease be effected. One morning, shortly after Rossetti moved in, Mr. Meredith, who was living in Mayfair, drove over to Chelsea to inspect his new apartments. "It was past noon [this is Mr. Meredith's own account]; Rossetti had not yet risen, although it was an exquisite day. On the breakfast table, on a huge dish, rested five thick slabs of bacon upon which five rigid eggs had slowly bled to death. Presently Rossetti appeared in dressing-gown and slippers down at heel, and devoured the dainty repast like an ogre." This decided Mr. Meredith. He did not even trouble to look at his rooms, but sent in a quarter's rent that afternoon, and remained in Mayfair, where eggs and bacon were presumably more appetisingly served.

We can recommend Mr. Blunt's guide to anyone who wishes to explore one of the most fascinating of London suburbs; it is a model of helpfulness.

Mr. Murray's excellent Handbooks to Greece and Constantinople are each in new editions. In the Greece the new French discoveries at Delphi have been carefully noted, and the work of archaeological schools at Corinth, Melos, Paros, &c., has also been taken into account whenever necessary. The Constantinople handbook contains a re-written account of the Imperial Museum, and the Map of Ancient Constantinople has been revised by Prof. van Millingen.

Two Literary Exercises.

The Story of Eros and Psyche from Apuleius, and the First Book of the Iliad of Homer. Done into English by Edward Carpenter. (Swan Sonnenschein. 2s. 6d.)

OF the two pieces which make up this little book, the writing of the former must have been by far the easier, because Mr. Carpenter merely retells the story, thus drawing attention to his manner of telling, his literary craftsmanship; he does not invite comparison with the original or with Adlington's classic. It is quite otherwise with his verse-rendering of the Iliad. Here it is inevitable that two tests will be applied: are we helped to feel and understand the original better from the rhythm and language of the translation? and is there sufficient vitality and interest in the narrative to hold the attention of readers ignorant of Greek? No one now, thanks to criticism, dares to turn Homer into rhymed pentameters (Pope's Iliad is an original poem, and not a translation); and there can be little question that Homer flows better in English hexameters than Dante does in imitations of the triple rhyme or Virgil in any of the ordinary metres. The reason is not far to seek: it lies in the primitiveness of Homer's theme. His story is of a people just emerging into civilisation. As Mr. Carpenter says, in a very short but suggestive introduction, "On the whole, it will be found very helpful to mentally compare the Greeks of the Iliad as to manners and customs with the North American Indians or African Kafirs and Zulus a few years back." It is this simplicity of subject-matter, both the words and ideas being those of a pastoral and seafaring folk living in clans, which makes the hexameter—the least conventional metre—eminently suitable for translating Homer. All epics written in the youth of the world can be rendered with precision in the original metres. Morris's Beowulf is much more satisfying in verse than a prose translation would have been by the same hand. It is not so with artificial epics like the Æneid; the time, the atmosphere cannot be transferred, and there is nothing for it but to be content with prose versions. Mr. Carpenter's hexameters read easily, the word-order is that of prose, there is no affectation of quaintness, and the meaning is always as transparent as that of the original.

Let me not find thee again, old man, by the deep-bellied warships,
 Either tarrying now or turning back hereafter,
 Lest, indeed the god's sceptre avail thee naught, nor his garland;
 For her I never will free—till old age itself overtake her,
 Far from her land, in Argos, as parcel and part of our household,
 Busy [by day] at the loom and sharing [my couch] [at even].

We quote below Clough's rendering of the same passage for comparison:

Old man, let me not, by the hollow ships of Achæia
 Linger find you now, or henceforth ever appearing,
 Lest to defend you fail the staff and wreaths of Apollo.
 Her do I not release until old age come upon her,
 In my house in the land of Argos, far from her country,
 Stepping at the loom and in the chamber attending.

Clough's translation of καὶ ἐμὸν λέχος ἀντίωσαν "and in the chamber attending" is preferable to Mr. Carpenter's, and brings out much more forcibly the contrast; otherwise there is little to choose between the two versions. The second is a little rougher, and the word-order slightly more twisted. In both the translation is literal, and proves the suitability of the metre.

Mr. Whibley, in his introduction to a reprint of Adlington's translation (1566) of Apuleius' Golden Ass, refers to the Eros and Psyche episode as "an interlude which, although exquisitely planned and phrased, is yet the one conspicuous fault of the book." Be this as it may, it is nevertheless this intercalated fable which has made Apuleius known to the many. It is not a little remarkable that a story which seems to be as old as the hills, to which neither time nor locality can be assigned, cannot be traced back farther than the second century A.D., and that Apuleius was the first—it is not conceivable that he could have wholly invented it—to tell the story. "To what extent Apuleius may have amplified, and elaborated the material that came to him, it would be impossible to say. As a writer he is full of invention, humour, lively wit, and varied learning and experience." Mr. Andrew Lang has very carefully examined the fable, but without establishing anything definite as to its sources. This is the way in which the author describes the first sight Psyche has of her husband Eros:

But the instant the light fell that way, and the mysteries of the couch were revealed, she beheld the very gentlest and sweetest of all wild creatures, even Eros himself, the beautiful God of Love, there fast asleep; at sight of whom the glad flame of the lamp shone doubly bright, and even the wicked knife repented of its edge.

But as for Psyche, astounded at such a vision, she lost control of her senses; and, faint, and deadly pale, and trembling all over, fell on her knees, and indeed would have hid the knife in her own bosom, had it not nimbly (as it were of its own accord) slipped from her hand. And now, faint and unnerved as she was, it was new life to her to gaze on those divine features . . . to see his dewy wings of dazzling whiteness and fair smooth body such as Venus might well have given birth to.

Devon for Ever!

Nummits and Crummits. By Sarah Hewett. (Burleigh.)

LOVE of county (to describe which some diminutive variant of "patriotism" ought to be coined) never reaches so intense a degree of warmth as with Devonians. Yorkshiremen, Northumbrians, men of Kent, Cornishmen, all may be glowing sons of their especial soil; but it is to Devon that we go for the most exultant filial joy. Not only in life, but in literature; for what other county can bring forward such pages as have been written of Devon by Kingsley, Blackmore, Mr. Baring-Gould, and Mr. Eden Phillpotts—to name these only?

And now comes another good Devonian to do reverence to the mother county: a smaller voice, it is true, but a sincere one. Nummits and Crummits is a collection of quaint Devoniana. To other historians Miss (or Mrs.) Hewett leaves the highroad story—whereon the mile-stones are such noble Devonshire names as Francis Drake—and concerns herself merely with the byways. Her title comes from this scrap of doggerel on "Meal Times":

A wee-bit and breakfast,
 A stay-bit and dinner,
 A nummit and a crummit,
 And a bit arter supper.

Superstitions, weather saws, old songs, comic stories, quaint personages—these are Miss Hewett's material, and she sets them down very pleasantly. Bamfylde Moore Carew is here, for example, and so is Joanna Southcott. So also are the Cheritons, the North Devon savages, and though one now and then may regret that the delicate hand of a woman is setting forth their histories, rather than that of a sociologist of sterner stuff, yet they lack not interest.

In the Cheritons we are particularly interested, because they are so recent: this wild family of Amazons and Ishmaels dwelt in primitive barbarity within sixteen miles of Exeter, as nigh our own day as the seventies. The Cheritons lived on their own freehold in a state of unparalleled uncleanness and tribal completeness. The patriarch of the family favoured, like Diogenes, a barrel lined with brake fern. They married not but multiplied exceedingly; they stole, and now and then laid waste the neighbouring farms; they obeyed no laws and treated all strangers with violence. At length, in the seventies, the march of civilisation proved too much for them and the Cheritons disappeared. That is as far as the story goes. But the point is, where are they now? It would be worth while to track down some of the descendants. A stock that clung so picturesquely to the old order would make a good study.

Among Miss Hewett's stories we like best the report of the goose stealing case. Mr. Lamshead's goose Sally was stolen by Samuel Scrane. Mr. Lamshead went to Scrane's and identified his property. After Mr. Lamshead had given the court the account of this identification and the goose's joy at regaining his master, this dialogue ensued:

MAGISTRATE'S CLERK: This seems far too ridiculous for belief. Did anyone witness the mutual recognition between you and the goose.

LAMBSHEAD: Whativer be telling about, sir? You spayketh so fine there's no understanding aw'ee; but s'pose you be axing who 'twas zeed my guze Sallie recognise me? Why, then, when I went to Serane's 'ouze, Billy Chubb and Nick Stradles went with me, and they both aw'm zeed Sallie rin tu me.

MAGISTRATE'S CLERK: Did you, Chubb, see the goose when she recognised Lambshead?

BILLY CHUBB: 'Ess, by Gor, I did, and 'twas a sight for sore eyes, I kin tell'ee, for when thickee old genelman went vore and ealed she, 'er 'urned tu'n a-hissing and a-tissing as if 'twas 'er father. When us luke into the back-'ouze nobody eude tell wan guze from t'other; but the very instant 'er master spoke, 'er up and 'urned tu'n and rubbed 'er 'ead agin his legs so loving as a cheel. Mr. Lambshead mutched 'er down awver 'er head and neck and 'er was so plaised as Punch, 'er was.

Miss Hewett does not always tell stories well. We do not consider her version of the old story of the parson and the pup is so good as the simpler non-Devonian form. It will be remembered that a visiting parson, conversing after service with the clerk, excused the shortness of his sermon on the ground that his dog ate up some of the manuscript. Whereupon the clerk is made to say: "Lor! now, zir, did 'er ate um all up? I warndee yu widden mind letting our passen 'ome yer have a pup of your dog, widdee now? for he du mappery a darned sight tu long tu please us, most times." Now, that is altogether too long. The point comes out with more distinctness if the clerk is merely made to reply, earnestly: "I wish, sir, you'd let our parson have one of her pups."

Literature.

The Rhodesians. By "Stracey Chambers." (John Lane.)

THE South African difficulty has produced a great deal of writing but very little literature. This little book is, however, literature. It is very grim, very sordid, very slight; but it lives. It has the true note. And not only is it authentic, it is also shapely. The author is an impressionistic artist, with a particular gift for separating the important from the unimportant. Taken piecemeal the book is, as we have said, very slight; but the cumulative effect is extraordinary. So quietly the author adds detail to detail that one may at the moment miss her purpose altogether; but then, after laying the book aside, the picture begins to assert itself, and goes on growing, until one's mind is filled with a disheartening impression, in which are blended the hot sun, the poor little struggling wives, the tawdry townships, the down-at-heels bread-winners, the seamy-lived speculators, the resentful Kaffirs, the dust, the heat, the whiskey, and all the other ingredients of financial imperialism and immature colonisation.

As stories pure and simple, these episodes will probably be voted dull. It is too much to expect a public accustomed to unflinching symmetry in romance to be interested in such wayward and ragged emotions as have play among dispirited colonists in a disappointing tropical El Dorado. Whether they are really dull or not is a matter of temperament. Personally, we have found them interesting. Best of all, perhaps, is "The Knot in the Loin Cloth," which is both a narrative of fact and a terrible little parable of the white man's progress. A passage from the beginning of this masterly story will illustrate the author's direct method. A few Englishmen—loafers, tramps, officials—are lounging about a store when a consumptive Kaffir comes into view, limping through the heat.

A man reclining in a deck-chair looked up with an imprecation: "Trust the blooming Kafir to make himself a nuisance; if it isn't their bally crops, it's their precious bodies—anything to upset the labour market—curse them! It's their climate; so why can't they stick it, that's what I want to know?"

But no one present finding himself in a position to solve this enigma, his inquiry remained unanswered, and he was forced to fall back for solace on an ancient number of the Strand Magazine.

Meanwhile, the black speck on the road loomed larger. "The boy" bore the customary long stick, to which was fastened his various goods and chattels—a cooking-pot and accordion (tied up in a red handkerchief), a brightly-coloured blanket, and the boots he had taken off when fording the swollen stream a mile or so back as well as to flounder through the squelching slush, for no primitive Kafir ever cares to soil his foot-gear, which he wears more with an eye to personal adornment than use. The group of men, having nothing better to do, took stock of the black, as he slowly, and with evident weariness and pain, made his way up the slight ascent.

"The brute's about ready to peg out," observed one of the railway men.

"Takes a darn'd lot to kill a nigger," returned another.

"I remember passing him upon the Salisbury road about two days ago, and he looked about ready to corpse it then," remarked the older of the two tramps, "and I've not been travelling fast."

"A mine boy," again observed the first speaker; "they all seem to go that way when they've worked the 'low levels' any time—no stamina."

"Or too frequent 'shifts,'" suggested another. "I'm dashed if I know how any man, black or white, can stand the fumes of the dynamite without caving in."

The matter of the story we shall not reveal. The reader must seek the book for it.

The author of The Rhodesians, we would say in conclusion, has done with her few strokes more to bring European Rhodesia home to us than scores of the Chartered Company's blue-books and huge volumes could do. She has performed a remarkable impressionistic feat.

Other New Books.

AN OLD FAMILY.

BY MONSIGNOR SETON.

Here American aristocracy lifts up its head. The author is the Roman Catholic Bishop of Jersey City, and a descendant in the oldest cadet line from the main branch of the Setons—viz., that of Seton of Parbroath. He gave forty years to the collecting of his material—a circumstance which, he thinks, requires some apology in view of Paul's advice to Timothy and Titus to "avoid foolish questions" and "endless genealogies." Alas for Paul, the more reconcile the questions and the more endless the genealogy, the greater the temptation to explore both. Moreover, the provocation of the "insolence of wealth" and the claims now "advanced in every direction by Americans who aspire to Society" has strengthened the author's impulse to record the history of the Seton family and its American branch. The name of Seton is reverberant with Scottish history, and even to those who know least about it it is a kind of shibboleth. One expects it to emerge from almost any song or tale of Scotland, as in the Lord of the Isles:

Where's Nigel Bruce, and De la Haye,
And valiant Seton—where are they?
Where Somerville, the kind and free?
And Fraser, flower of chivalry?

The Setons, like all Scotland's noble families, were of Norman origin, and they are of the few families who can be traced right back to Norman soil.

All this is set forth in procession by the author. Throughout this portion of his work he is but following in the footsteps of other historians of the family, notably, of course, Sir Richard Maitland of Lethington, who annalised the family down to 1599. A completed history of the family, by Mr. George Seton, was published four years ago. In general interest the best pages in Dr. Seton's work are those in which he describes his own childhood in his father's mansion on an estate now practically swallowed up in New York:

We were brought up in aristocratic seclusion. Our ancient Scotch descent, our gentle English connexions, and the social superiority of our family were made familiar to us from childhood; while the heirlooms and miniatures, and old letters with armorial seals upon them, would be tangible witnesses of our association with other lands and other ages. . . . Our nearest visitors lived five miles away. . . . Our only railroad station was William's Bridge, three miles distant, which my father used to say was quite near enough to a gentleman's house; and he usually preferred to drive the twelve or fifteen miles down the old Boston post road, through West Farms and Harlem, to the City. Like all the Colonial families, my father had a stock of old Madeira. . . . The late Cardinal (then Archbishop) McCloskey, who was a guest, spoke to me once about the inestimable flavour of that wine. . . . The fire always seemed brighter and pleasanter to me because the hickory and chestnut and beechwood logs and the hemlock cones came from our own place. . . . Our Fourth of July fireworks used to gather the villagers to our front lawn, which was free that evening to all.

What a novel there is here! This island of peace and pride being overtaken by railways, trusts, electricity, "notions," and New York—even by patriotism, for Dr. Seton says that theirs was the only house around which either had a flag, or ever thought of raising it. Dr. Seton is amply justified of his long labour.

FRANCE SINCE 1814. BY BARON PIERRE DE COUBERTIN.

Baron Pierre de Coubertin's work, or the greater part of it, has, if we mistake not, already appeared in the shape of a series of articles in one of the English reviews, though no mention is made of the fact in this volume. However, that does not detract from the interest of this study by a capable observer of a most important period of French history. M. de Coubertin holds, and rightly, we think, that historians have made a great mistake in splitting up the history of France since the death of Napoleon I. into periods perfectly distinct from each other. All these phases have a continuity which M. de Coubertin endeavours to bring out, and with success, though perhaps all his conclusions will not meet with universal acceptance. Three French nations have been struggling with one another during the past century; in the centre the real French nation, which has always called for repose. "She is naturally somewhat apathetic, and suffers herself to be circumvented rather too easily; but, after all, she is the true France, and it is impossible to understand her history if we do not see in her the victim of those others, Reactionaries and Jacobins, who for eighty years have outraged her turn by turn." The Reactionaries and the Jacobins have always entertained a lively hatred for each other, and the true France has suffered in consequence. But M. de Coubertin holds that the Hundred Days was the period of greatest misfortune for modern France. In 1814 Louis XVIII. had come back as a heaven-sent sovereign, and no one imagined that his throne could be overturned. The ease with which he fell in 1815 destroyed the prestige of the Royal family, and paved the way for the interminable revolutions and disturbances which have followed. Those interested in the France of to-day will find this book suggestive and informing. (Chapman & Hall.)

OXFORD ROWING. BY THE REV. W. E. SHERWOOD.

Mr. Sherwood, it will be remembered, rowed for Oxford in 1873 and 1874, and, with a few years' interval, has been treasurer of the O.U.B.C. ever since. He is, therefore, peculiarly fitted to deal with a matter which has demanded much patient research in official and other papers, and the result is a book worthy of the subject. The first half of the volume is the more interesting, and deals with the history of rowing and of the various races of Oxford from the earliest known time. Incidentally Mr. Sherwood points out that Thackeray makes the Rev. Bute Crawley stroke the Christ Church boat in his undergraduate days, taking ten years to pay off his college debts, and accomplishing this in 179—. Thackeray thus antedates the races at Oxford by at least thirty years: a curious and interesting little bit of criticism. The larger half of the book is taken up with statistics of the races. There are two excellent indexes, and the volume is well illustrated with photographs and with reproductions of old prints (Henry Frowde.)

Fiction.

Joan of the Sword Hand. By S. R. Crockett.
(Ward, Lock & Co. 6s.)

A MAN in woman's clothing—that was the charm of "Charley's Aunt." The same, and the converse withal, constitute the charm of Joan of the Sword. All resemblance between the play and the novel there cease; in the former case ludicrous incongruity was the object; in the latter—whatever the object—a grateful warmth and intimacy of sex-feeling is the result. Absurd as it may seem to those who think of Mr. Crockett as the ex-minister, his new novel contains more than a touch reminding one of Mlle. de Maupin and Rosette. The pleasant trepidations which he excites in an unaustrere critic are enhanced by the fact that he has laid his scenes in regions contiguous to that ruled over by Hugo of "the Red Axe," and has fixed his period a few years after that hero's accession to the mythical principedom of Plassenburg. There is really no limit to the riot a man's fancy can run in a country and an age which are both of his own invention. Yet Mr. Crockett does set himself a limit. True love is instant and irrevocable in its pages and marriage is the goal of even the basest of his characters. But his rhetorical flourishes would still bear subjugation. "I am the Duchess of Hohenstein," says Joan, "and I do not leave this boat till I know in what place I am, and who this may be that cries 'Follow!' to the daughter of Henry the Lion!" And rhetoric bedizens even the supreme moment when a desperate woman is about to fire the enemy's powder-magazine. Needless to say, when the heroine's brother "knew very well that he was going to his death . . . none would have discovered from his bearing that there was aught upon his mind of graver concern than the fit of a doublet or, perhaps, the favour of a pretty maid-of-honour." But, for all that, Mr. Crockett is master of a very vigorous and picturesque style; he knows and reveals a great deal about woman-nature, and he has a sense of humour which can express itself in whole scenes and not in mere intermittent guffaws. The Cardinal's interview with the Pope, for instance, is an excellent piece of comedy.

The Angel of Chance. By G. G. Chatterton.
(John Long. 6s.)

CHANCE was certainly an angel to endow an ill-provided orphan with £4,000 a year; but the title of the story, and its rather pretentious motto, do not prevent the reader from being slightly bored by the obvious lack of artistic intention which characterises the performance as a whole. Rachel Meredith swims beautifully, and her admirer, who has made her acquaintance in the water, loses his preference for the affected and petite woman. Of the latter we are told: "She fluttered away in the froth of the waves, and down she sank finally in the salt sea-water, where floated unconsciously the leg of Rachel Meredith above her grave!" Such jocosity is slightly inept.

Mrs. Grundy is displeased when she discovers that the pair have swum to shore in curtailed raiment to avoid spending a night together on the pier, and her anger causes their abrupt separation. The reader is sorry, but cannot fail to remark that they might have had the intelligence to throw their discarded garments into the sea instead of leaving them as compromising evidence on the pier.

A horrid system of punctuation, and a tendency to a frank ugliness of phraseology, do not conceal the fact that Mr. Chatterton is master of a clever and engaging style. The bits of seascape and landscape which he proffers us are touched with personality. Here is one who can speak of "purple willow-herb and golden hawkweed, campion red and white, the speedwell thrusting bright blue eye up through the delicate yellow cinquefoil." He is friends with Nature. His rector and curate, too, are very well done, the former so chronically comfortable, the latter a "dusty cyclist with [a] bag of infant's clothing swung cumbrously from his machine." Poor, awkward altruist, it is a pity that he fell in love with the heroine when he could not even open a gate properly! In fine, The Angel of Chance is a pleasant book, though, as we have suggested, deficient in motive power.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE KNIGHTS OF THE CROSS. BY HENRYK SIENKIEWICZ.

The size of this novel is appalling. It is issued in two volumes, called "First Half" and "Second Half," and is accompanied by a "group" portrait of the author and his translator, Mr. Jeremiah Curtin. The work should act as a kind of sandbank in which the American enthusiasm for historical novels can bury itself. The period is that of the Hussite Wars, wars which arose out of "ideas of race and religion which were born in Bohemia." (Dent. 2 vols. 6s. each.)

AFRICAN NIGHTS' ENTERTAINMENT. BY A. J. DAWSON.

We have here fifteen stories by the author of Bismillah, full of verve and colour, and dealing with the contact of Europeans and Moors. The sixth story is typical, and tells how Clare Mayburn's soul was fired and melted by Moroccan life, its heat and hues, its veiled women, its despotism and stoicism, "the unchanging picturesqueness of the Thousand and One Nights, the dramatic inevitability of the Old Testament." All this was very detrimental to the claims of her engaged lover, Algernon Taunton, with his milk and water correctness, his "impossible checked knickerbockers, his Chippendale legs . . . and his little remarks about 'Oriental effects.'" The Byronic happened. (Heinemann. 6s.)

BLIX. BY FRANK NORRIS.

"A Love Idyll," by the able author of Shanghai'd and McTeague. Blix is the nickname of the heroine, given to her by Condé Rivers when they decide on a Platonic friendship. Blix is San Francisco girlhood at its whitest, ripest, best. Condé writes stories, and is just "convalescing from Maupassant" when we meet him. Blix's family, the Bessomers, supply some delightful youngsters. Novels are written, and sunsets dye the floor of the Pacific. The story makes for fun and happiness. (Richards. 3s. 6d.)

SOCIAL SINNERS. BY EMILE A. PALIER.

An extremely crude story of politics and adultery. The hero, in the height of his ambition, is a candidate for Congress, a husband, the father of two illegitimate children, and the lover of a third woman. Much of the story reads very much like a vulgar police report. (New York: Abbey Press.)

OUTRIDDEN.

BY FOX RUSSELL.

A sporting novel by the author of Cross Country Reminiscences. Hounds bay through the book, and horses leave hardly room for the characters. "Lovers in truth they were," we read at last, "though Jack Stanforth and Geraldine Leycester have been married for eighteen months or more. . . . A grand-looking bay horse trots up at sound of the familiar voices, and rubs his nose affectionately against Jack's sleeve and Geraldine's hand." (Everett. 2s.)

BY ANNA,
COMTESSE DE BRÉMONT.

DAUGHTERS OF PLEASURE.

A story of theatrical life, its jealousies, and dangers. We are much in theatres, before and behind the scenes; and in the end the three heroines, Athene, Hera, and Neara, emerge with laurels, characters, and husbands. (Greening. 6s.)

THE BEAUTIFUL MRS. LEACH. BY WINIFRED GRAHAM.

Unhesitating melodrama. Marriage in the first chapter is followed by murder in the second, and there is mystery, sin, rouge-et-noir, "The Avenging Voice," &c. But at last: "He laughed gaily at her words, catching her to his heart, and the gold-fish rose upon the surface of the still water to watch that fond embrace." (Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.)

CAGED!

BY HEADON HILL.

Some misprints are funny. The first sentence of this "Romance of a Lunatic Asylum" reads: "It was in 1857—the year of Mutiny and Terror, when the cries of women and children went up to Heaven for mercy and found it not." Somehow—we don't know why—this quite prepared us for Flash Alf and his crimes; and the gruesome "Grey House," where a series of heartrending shrieks suggests to the proprietor "one of those pretty dears in the refractory ward"; and the diamond worth £60,000, to steal which Flash Alf goes to India while other characters languish in the Grey House. "You had forgotten the old well?" says one of the characters. But the author has forgotten nothing. The story is all excitement. (Ward, Lock. 6s.)

THE PRISON HOUSE.

BY JANE JONES.

"A young man married is a man that's marred" is the quotation over the fourteenth chapter, and over the fifteenth: "Slowly, slowly, slowly the days succeeded each other." It was the case of a man of the world married to a woman who knew nothing, and shrank from London, and evil, and life generally. She disliked Society, and wanted her husband to go to church. "Every Sunday morning and every Sunday afternoon Mary wrestled for her husband's soul." A second woman appeared, and had her reign; then came what little balm was left in Gilead. A sombre story. (Blackwood. 6s.)

SPUN YARN.

BY MORGAN ROBERTSON.

Sixteen stories of sea life, naval and mercantile. The second story, "The Brain of a Battle-ship," ends gloriously: "'Rise up,' said Mr. Clarkson, as they surrounded him; 'rise up, Daniel Drake Nelson Farragut Finnegan. You are small potatoes and few in the hill; you are shamefully drunk and your nose bleeds; you are stricken with Spanish mildew, and you smell vilely—but you are immortal. You have been a disgrace to the service, but Fate in her gentle irony has redeemed you, permitting you, in one brief moment of your mis-spent life, to save your country the command of the seas—to guide, with your sub-conscious self, the finest battle-ship the science of this world has constructed to glorious victory.' . . . But Finnegan only snored." (Richards. 6s.)

A Novelist of the Unknown.*

EVERYONE KNOWS that Mr. Wells, as a novelist, has two fields of vision. Broadly speaking, one is stellar, the other mundane. In the one he looks for big things that may be, in the other for little things that are. He must be a singular reader who is not struck by the divergencies of power which have given us the Time Machine and Mr. Hoopdriver's bicycle; which have shown us the Martians devastating London, and Mr. Lewisham devastated by love. Yet we would remark that the distance between these two fields is more than obviously great. For whenever Mr. Wells returns—we had almost written "homeward plods his weary way"—from Mars, or from the forward abysses of Time, to this dull little nineteenth-century Earth, he straightway throws off the trappings of distances and æons and sits down to depict suburban manners. His gestures no longer connote measureless ether, or a fifth sense. He does not even call the nations into his study, like Mr. Kipling, or desire, with Stevenson, to dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea and be the Ariel of Literature. Unspoiled by the influences of the Pleiades, he dissects the mind of a Kensington draper's assistant; unblinded by visions of Science in her glory, he tells us how a student jilted Science for a poor girl in Clapham.

Now there is one description which applies to Mr. Wells in both these characters. To discover it would be something of a feat if it were anything more than this: that in both he is breaking fresh ground, in both he is an explorer. Not in Mars and not in Clapham has he stepped in another man's tracks. Hoopdriver, with his pins and aspirations, was as much to seek, really, as Graham and his flying machine. So far, then, Mr. Wells is revealed as the most enterprising of novelists, exploiting a planet and a draper's shop as calmly as Cinquevalli tosses a cannon ball with a pea. But the simile—like every simile—calls for correction. There are profound literary differences to be named and considered. We deny in toto (to use a loved phrase of Smithers in Love and Mr. Lewisham) that Mr. Wells's stellar novels are to be compared with his mundane novels. That seems a strong view, but it is our view. We hear an opponent blurt: "Consider the imagination of The War of the Worlds." But the word "imagination" does not satisfy us here. Four-fifths of what passes for "imagination" in Mr. Wells's scientific novels is not essential imagination; it is rather the skilful—the absolutely daring and decorative—use of science. It is science in purple; science producing her "effects"—the glory and smoke of the "experiment"; science rehearsing what she will be. When Mr. Wells appears to be soaring, he is really only calculating generously; when he seems to be creating, he is only playing behind the professor's back; and the ladder by which he climbs, immeasurably aerial though it seems, is an extension ladder taken from the laboratory cupboard.

Science, taking the bit between her teeth, can run gloriously amok among the principalities and powers; but the Phaeton who gives her her head is not exercising his imagination—he is merely having a lark. We have a deeper objection to scientific novels. It is that their subject-matter is outside literature, and is, indeed, as noxious to literature as we feel that spiritualism is to life. We have the strongest conviction that scientific anticipations of the future of man and of the universe, even when, like Mr. Wells's, they are brilliantly conceived, have no more to do with the art of the novel than The Battle of Dorking.

These our troubles pass like a summer cloud when we turn to Mr. Wells's two novels of human life, The Wheels of Chance (1898) and his new novel, Love and Mr. Lewisham. Here Mr. Wells is doing really fine work, and we use the word in a sense far beyond clever. To call such novels as these "clever" is the first infirmity of ignoble critics. Clever they are; and, if one must dabble in the word, we are prepared to rant with Laertes, and pile Pelions of proof on Ossas of assertion that Mr. Wells is clever. But we dislike the word, and we resent its application to a fine novelist. "Clever" in dealing with flesh and blood! Clever in tracing tears to their springs in the human heart! Clever in justifying the ways of God to men or of men to God! No. The great novelists cannot be thought of as clever. They are sagacious, charitable, wise, and tender. Was Scott clever, or Cervantes, or Sterne, or Dickens? No one would use so base a word. It is just a suspicion of cleverness which causes a few minds to see an everlasting ghostly mark of interrogation at the end of every proclamation of the genius of Thackeray. It is precisely because we see in Mr. Wells those greater things—the sympathy of one who knows and the big hand of one who loves—that we feel eager about his work. If the analysis of the mind of Hoopdriver, the Kensington draper's assistant who longed for gentility, who cajoled and lied and blundered toward higher things, was clever, then assuredly it was a higher quality that saved The Wheels of Chance from being one long humorous butchery of Hoopdriver. It is indeed alight with humour, and Hoopdriver is not spared a single shaft of ridicule that a good man may give or take. But there is one thing that Mr. Wells never does, or allows his reader to do, and that is to doubt the essential manhood, dignity, and native sweetness of the man who cannot help sticking pins into his lapels. You have the queerest feelings of regret as you see Hoopdriver's back disappear with his bicycle into the stable yard attached to Messrs. Antrobus's emporium in Kensington—his holiday, his dream of culture, his worship of a beautiful girl, all to be settled and adjusted in the intervals of "Hoopdriver, Forward!"

In Love and Mr. Lewisham Mr. Wells's qualities appear to even greater advantage. For one thing, this novel is a higher organism than The Wheels of Chance. In The Wheels of Chance the incidents of a bicycle chase through several counties supply a kind of material or mechanical interest—the easy interest of every chase. The analysis of character triumphs, but somewhat by emergence. In Love and Mr. Lewisham character is all; Mr. Wells is doing his best work all along. We are not going to describe the story in any detail. When we meet Mr. Lewisham he is a very young master—in fact, eighteen—at Whortley Proprietary School, Whortley, Sussex. There he "hears his years before him, all the tumult of his life"; sees it every morning as his head comes through his shirt, and his eyes fall on the magnificent schema of study which he has pinned on the bedroom wall of his humble lodging. Chance-wise, he meets Ethel Henderson, and the pretty fools steal walks and talks and plight their love; and Mr. Lewisham is dismissed the school with his character (in the Proprietary School sense) considerably damaged. In London he toils at the Kensington Normal Science School; toils manfully, little embarrassed by memories of Ethel, who has vanished into Clapham. The Career flourishes. It enlists a supporter, too, in a fellow-student, Miss Heydinger, a girl of the period, who encourages him to wear the red tie of Socialism. Laboratory work, examinations, and glowing talks in the Gallery of Old Iron at the Museum with his Egeria. But Ethel is to come again into his life, and she does it, so to speak, with a vengeance. More naturally than it sounds, he meets her in a darkened room, at a spiritualistic séance, whither he has gone in laughing scepticism with some fellow-students; meets her, too, as the docile accomplice of her step-father, Mr. Chaffery, in a despicable imposture. Her helplessness and her beauty and the old Whortley days are too much for his common sense and strength of will. And when he finds that Ethel is innocent at heart, though not quite in conscience, it is enough; he loves her, will save her. There are wonderful walks to Clapham, dwindling honours at the school, tears and dismays in Miss Heydinger's bosom, and remorse (about the Career) which cannot be uttered. At times he sees all things with deadly clearness:

He suddenly perceived with absolute conviction that after the séance he should have gone home and forgotten her. Why had he felt that irresistible impulse to seek her out? Why had his imagination spun such a strange web of impossibilities about her? He was involved now, foolishly involved. All his future was a sacrifice to this transitory ghost of love making in the streets.

Transitory ghost it should have been, but was not. Marry the stepdaughter of a Chaffery, a quack, a blasphemer of science! Marry on a legacy of one hundred pounds! A pretty pitiful marriage, full of its own mad sweetness. For she was sweet, was Ethel, and for a time her wifehood could hold its own against the Career. It was the bills and the price of coal that brought complete revelation: these, and the reproaches of Miss Heydinger, and the blankness of his scholastic prospects. The revolution, the rebellion, the final solution—need we speak of them? Lewisham is submissive to Love, and passes with resolute resignation into the obscurity of a small home, parentage, and Clapham. The child is coming, and this—yes, this—is life; the other was just vanity; at any rate, it is over, quite over. The schema that had long lined a trunk is torn up without a pang—in the stillness of thought.

That is the theme, and it is worked out with a searching analysis that would be merciless if it were not, in fact, so very merciful. We have need of such themes. Modern fiction will be regenerated by these faithful seizures of neglected types. It has great work to do in floating little men (who are not little) and narrow lives (which yet globe all life) into our ken. Dickens did it by caricature, by an emphasis necessary in his day. But it has yet to be done in the noble manner; and it is much that for Mr. Horatio Sparkins we have now Mr. Hoopdriver. Let Mr. Wells travel this road. These two novels may be masterpieces or not (we should be the last to deny it); but we are certain that their production tends to create the atmosphere in which masterpieces are born. Our own faith in his future is immovable, and we know not how we can pay him a less formal compliment than by saying that when we closed Love and Mr. Lewisham, full of gratitude and stimulations, we involuntarily groped for a definition of good novel writing which might celebrate our mood. And, groping, we found one which, with all its defects and bizarre, seems to sweep into its net every writer in whom is greatness, or the seed of greatness: a definition adapted from Coleridge:

He writeth best who loveth best
All things both great and small,
For the great God who loveth us
He made and loveth all.

Things Seen.

A Harvest Home.

WE went into the kitchen when the men had taken their tea, and found them sitting round the room on benches against the wall—Angus, Murdoch, Echan, Duncan, and Ian, the boy. Their dogs, collies of uncertain breed, lay about the stone floor at their feet—Old Smart, the amiable and talented shepherd; Tweed, the one-eyed and dour, who detested strangers; Gloun and Sirdar, the boisterous friendly youngsters; and Chairl, the house-dog. All had done justice to the meal; and the men, having been awarded a wine-glass of neat whiskey with their pipes, were as silent and somnolently blissful as their dogs. They had three meals a day in this kitchen the year round, but the whiskey and tobacco were harvest extras. A glowing peat fire and one small misty lamp provided a sleepy light. On the huge dresser stood the "maiden," a last gleanings of corn, decorated and cherished till next year, when it would be given, for luck, to the first horse taken out to "shear" (reap). A grey parrot in a cage by the window cried "Thugad!" at intervals, the Gaelic for "Get out!"

We suggested a reel, and the apathy of the Highlanders vanished. Our farmer host brought out his pipes, and we danced like maniacs to the weird stimulating music, two of the men taking off their boots to do their steps the better. How they flung up their arms and yelled! It was hard to believe they had been shearing since five a.m.; the firelight flickered on such ecstatic faces! Then, exhausted, we sat down while Angus, the bard, sang Hò-ro mo nighean dhonn Bhoidheach and songs of his own composition. Once started, there was no stopping him, until someone remarked that Mrs. Angus might be sitting up. The effect was electrical. He rose and shook hands all round several times.

"I will no be keeping the leddies up," he said gallantly, "but I will be thinking this was the bonniest harvest night I will effer be had."

The rest concurred. All but the parrot, who wanted to go to sleep.

"Thugad!" she croaked peevishly, and the dreaming collies round the fire rose, stretched, and followed their masters out into the night.

Juggernaut.

THE setting sun shone right down the village street: it lent the white road a dusty radiance, and glowed on the red roofs of the houses. It was Sunday evening, the first warm Sunday of the year. Cheerful groups stood in every doorway, shy youths and maidens lingered in dim corners, clean and uncomfortable children roamed restlessly from house to house. It was the hour of gossip, courtship, and tobacco. Suddenly someone cried "Here comes a motor." In an instant the road was empty.

It came from the west, the golden sunset behind it. One moment it was a speck on the road, the next it was in our midst. As it tore through the twilight, this strange misshapen monster from an alien world seemed some horrible uncanny thing, the living chariot of an evil god. With a hoot and rattle it was past; but as it fled a boy, struck with a sudden passion for brute powers, cried out: "I would like to go to heaven on that motor."

Beyond the village, where the fields come down to the highway, a flower had chosen to blossom in the very road. It was an extremely nice flower—upright, individual, impertinent.

But the motor passed by—rapid, relentless, unswerving: and the flower was gone.

Presently a vague scent of petroleum drifted slowly down to the village.

Two "Punch" Books.*

WEEK after week the remark, "Another poor number of Punch," may be made; but it matters nothing. In the aggregate—in the "loomp"—Punch always scores, is always satisfying. As one turns over the leaves of a bound volume the inferior recedes into the background, the genuine holds the eye.

The little volume entitled An Evening with "Punch" has been very well prepared by its anonymous editor. We cannot agree with everything he says—we must demur, for example, to his description of Mr. H. W. Lucy as the "greatest of diarists"—but his taste in humour is fairly satisfying, although, by the necessities of the case, he has been compelled to include a great deal of rather thin and excessively out-of-date padding, not because it is first-rate, but because it was needful to illustrate the manner of such venerable jokers as Albert Smith and Gilbert à Beckett, to name only these. A paper like Punch must always have a permanent bodyguard of writers ready to supply, not humour itself, but that which stands for humour. It is, indeed, one of the secondary uses of a comic journal to bring home to each generation the symbols of humour. Now and then the real thing is supplied, as when Punch had the good fortune (to keep the illustrations to our own day) to stimulate Mr. Anstey to study the "voces populi," or when Mr. Burnand's "Happy Thoughts" began. But, for the most part, Punch, together with its journalistic companions, uses counters rather than current coin. The printed pun, for example, unless it is as good as Hood's, has not the true ring; and Punch has latterly loved puns far too well. The younger generation to-day cares nothing for the printed pun, and not much more for the spoken. It does not, however, suit the book of the bodyguard of a comic paper to recognise this, and the tiresome old convention therefore goes on.

But we are drifting into an indictment of Punch, while all the time we are in the best possible humour with it. For the Evening with "Punch" has left us smiling and happy, so full-flavoured is it—so ripe and wise and shrewd, and now and then so gloriously comic. Whoever acted as editor holds the right opinion of Charles Keene—that penetrating humorist and humanist and magnificent artist. What a pencil was his! Look at its superb, dashing strokes. Another man would toil all day at a turnip field: Keene's hand made a score of rapid movements, and behold! not only a turnip-field, but an October breeze that you can sniff and tingle under, blowing across it! Look on p. 89 at the miserable street scene which Leech considered good enough to stand above his joke, and then recollect how Keene transferred horses and traffic to paper. There are great examples of black and white in this book; there is Sir John Tenniel's "Mose' in Egitto" (on p. 165); there is Doyle's "Napoleon of Peace" (on p. 127); there is a field scene by Randolph Caldecott, full of atmosphere (on p. 43); there is Mr. Sambourne's beautiful naiad (on p. 41). But the greatest master of the medium was Charles Keene. On laying this book aside it is Keene's strokes that dominate the memory. And his gift for character, within his boundaries, was perfect. Look at the soldier's face on p. 177; look at the submissive husband on p. 145; look at the struggling Scotsman on p. 101; and at the old gentleman on p. 37 starting at the mandate "Let loose the gorgonzola"; and look at the Economist describing the horrors of London in the "Bang went saxeppence" picture on p. 27. Keene was so fine a judge of a joke. He worked at them so lovingly, with so rich an appreciation. Some of the best are here.

In A Peep into "Punch" Keene is even better represented, but unfortunately the pictures are reduced to so small a scale—almost to postage-stamp size—that the merits of the draughtsman evaporate, and only the joke remains. The jokes are well selected, and we must be grateful for small mercies; but it is a hard thing to lose Keene's lines. Still Keene's pencil was only the half of him; his sense of fun was the other half, and his joy in the humours of volunteers, of Scotchmen, of parsonages, of rustics, and of inebriety is here. It speaks volumes for the spirit of England's martial amateurs that they survived Keene's delicious ridicule. On p. 286 of A Peep into "Punch" is one of his most acceptable volunteer jests—the excited appeal of Capt. Wilkinson to Major Walker, of the firm of Wilkinson, Walker & Co., Auctioneers and Estate Agents: "Don't you think we'd better bring our Right Wing round to attack the Enemy's Flank, so as to prevent them occupying those empty houses we have to let in Barker's Lane?" The author of A Peep into "Punch", by the way, is Mr. J. Holt Schooling, the ingenious statistician, who month after month instructs the readers of the popular magazines in such curious and valuable matters as the distance which would be covered by all the cigarettes smoked by Mr. Labouchere in a year were they placed together in a line. Mr. Schooling for the time being has forgotten his statistics, and has presented instead a very clear and informing account of the birth and career of the Fleet-street sage and of all his colleagues. A Peep into "Punch" is a book into which one dips and dips again, to the complete rout of the duties of the day.

Another humorist to whom justice is done in An Evening with "Punch" is Captain Howard. It gave us almost a thrill to come again upon the Captain's contribution of December 6, 1856 (p. 49), entitled "Mysterious." Even without the picture it is good:

Omnibus Driver. Have you set down that party as got in at the Crescent, Jim?

Conductor. Yes.

(An interval of five minutes.)

Omnibus Driver. You recollect that there wet Sunday I druv you down?

Conductor. Ah!

Omnibus Driver. Well, do you remember a werry remarkable surprisin' circumstance I was a relatuv' of to you that afternoon?

Conductor. To be sure I do.

(Another pause)

Omnibus Driver. Well, then—

Conductor. What! you don't mean to say as that—

Omnibus Driver (definitively). That's the party, sir!

(Inquisitive old Gent on the Box, who has arrived at his destination, is upset for the rest of the day.)

Barring the conclusion of the story—which is enfeebled by the exaggeration that comic journalists always seem to feel needful—the thing is perfect. And it is inspired by a kind of humour now passing away. Dickens, Leech, and Keene were the great masters of this method. One wonders sometimes whether London had more of comic material in those days, in the shape of quaint 'bus drivers and conductors, cabmen and so forth, than it now has, or whether these genial middle Victorians invented them.

Genuine fun is always rare, even in a selection from fifty years of a leading comic journal. Somehow the English mind does not incline much to fun. Lamb had it, Hood had it, Sydney Smith had it, Mr. Burnand (in THE Ride to Khiva, for example) had it, Lewis Carroll and Edward Lear had it; but there is little enough in ordinary comic journalism. Mr. Priestman Atkinson's "Three-volume Novel at a Glance," on p. 163 of this book, is full of fun; so is Doyle's picture of the Grenadier Guards, on p. 63; and so are many things by Keene and Leech. But these are pictures. In the prose and verse there is little that is lightheartedly frivolous. For the most part Mr. Punch takes himself seriously. The "Song of the Shirt" is here, and Tennyson's verses against Bulwer Lytton: "The padded man that wears the stays."

Correspondence.

"The Man Who Tramped."

SIR,—I have not a copy of The Wrecker beside me at the moment, but I believe the man of whom your correspondent "R. M." writes, "who tramped and toiled and had such a profit of his life among the Islands," is Mr. C. A. Stoddard, author of Summer Cruising in the South Seas. Let me draw the attention of "R. M." to letters addressed to Mr. Stoddard in The Letters of R. L. Stevenson (Vol. I., page 173, and Vol. II., page 18), and to Mr. Colvin's notes on them. Probably these will solve the difficulty.—I am, &c.,

A. R.

Glasgow: June 16, 1900.

"Drift."

SIR,—Five or six years ago I produced in this country and on the other side of the Atlantic a volume of poems. I had intended to call my volume Drift; but some weeks before publication a lettered friend (whom I note is still an honoured contributor to the Academy), to whom I had explained this intention, sought to dissuade me from it, inasmuch as drift had no status as a noun and did not mean, as apparently I held it to mean, flotsam. But I was headstrong, and, by way of justifying my title, I added a few introductory stanzas, in which I spoke of

Spray from Huron, cones from Erie,
Hemlock from the Gattineau;
Grasses quaint from prairies dreary,
Mocking at the cbb and flew.
Drift of weeds and drift of branches
Odd wisps from the blue-birds' nest,
Yellowed stalks from distant ranches, Sumac from the Golden West.

and in conclusion:

There are green and humble pages
Of Love's making which do sift
Life's grey river as its rages,
And leave hidden yonder—Drift.

When the book came to be published, one or two critics, who took note of the title, fell foul of it at first, but finally held it to be justified by these same verses.

Three days ago a book was placed in my hand; it was a collection of poems; it was entitled Drift, and the author Mr. Horatio F. Brown. Were I a dead poet my friends, relations, and executors would be foolish to complain; but I still live, and I treasure the hope of bringing out a second and enlarged edition of Drift: and, moreover, I hold I have as good a title to Drift as Mr. Swinburne has to Atalanta in Calydon. And may I ask Mr. Brown, since I cannot discern the fact in his book of poems, what he means by Drift?—I am, &c.,

Misquotations.

SIR,—I have not seen the Pall Mall Gazette list of misquotations. The commonest of all is, undoubtedly, the line from Lycidas, which, oddly enough, not long ago occurred in a lecture given here.

May I suggest these "howlers" as being only too common: "Cribb'd, cabin'd, and confined," instead of "cabin'd, cribb'd, confined" (Macbeth, III. iv.); "Like angels' visits, few and far between," instead of "Visits like those of angels, short and far between"—perhaps the only lines of Blair that anyone remembers (Did Campbell honour them, I wonder, in "The Pleasures of Hope?"—"Like angel visits, few and far between"); and worst of all: "Water, water everywhere, and not a drop to drink," instead of "nor any drop to drink"?—I am, &c.,

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

A HISTORY OF BRADFIELD COLLEGE.

BY OLD BRADFIELD BOYS.

How do publishers time these things? Just when the performance of "Agamemmon" is filling the papers with notices of Bradfield College comes this history of the school, written by old Bradfield scholars, and edited by Mr. Arthur F. Leach, the author of a History of Winchester School. "Bradfield, like Lancing and Radley," says Mr. Leach, "was an outcome of the religious revivalism of the second quarter of the nineteenth century, known as the Oxford Movement." It was on the oldest model of a public school, that of Winchester, that Bradfield was founded by Thomas Steevens, rector of Bradfield, and lord of the manor. (Frowde. 10s. 6d. net.)

BY MAJOR A. F. MOCKLER-FERRYMAN.

ANNALS OF SANDHURST.

No apology is needed for this history of our great training college for army officers. The Royal Military College for future officers of the Army was established in 1802. Previously, the Royal Military College was maintained for the improvement of officers already commissioned. The Staff College—the senior department of the institution—is also fully described by Major Mockler-Ferryman, and the great changes which have come over this highest branch of military training are duly recorded. There is significance in the fact that two-thirds of the book is devoted to statistics of Sandhurst athletics. (Heinemann.)

SOME NOTABLE HAMLETS.

BY CLEMENT SCOTT.

Having given us his somewhat inchoate recollections in The Drama of Yesterday and To-Day, Mr. Scott has collected his "Hamlet" reminiscences in this volume. Strictly speaking, the collector is Mr. L. Arthur Greening, who writes an appreciation of Mr. Scott as "a clever and often misjudged man." The Hamlets are those of Sarah Bernhardt, Sir Henry Irving, Mr. Wilson Barrett, Mr. Tree, and Mr. Forbes Robertson. (Greening. 2s. 6d.)

IN DWARF LAND AND CANNIBAL COUNTRY. BY A. B. LLOYD.

Mr. Lloyd has been for four and a half years engaged in the Church Missionary Society's work in Uganda. When, last year, his time of furlough arrived he struck out to the West Coast through Belgian territory, and through the Pygmy Forest of which Stanley was the first to give an account. The book is profusely illustrated. (Unwin. 6s.)

WHERE AND HOW TO DINE IN PARIS.

BY ROWLAND STRONG.

A very agreeable and helpful little book with a somewhat wider scope than its title indicates. "With the information here conveyed it will be possible for the Englishman to live much the same humdrum existence as the born Parisian." (Richards. 2s. 6d.)

In addition to the foregoing, we have received:

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 39 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best quotation to be inscribed over the door of a London house from which the residents have temporarily fled for a country holiday. Some felicitous suggestions have been made. We award the prize to Miss or Mrs. Winifred Parnell, 97, Oakley-street, Chelsea, S.W., for this line from Pope :

Dear, damn'd, distracting Town, farewell !

Other replies are as follows :

Deserted is my own good hall,
Its hearth is desolate ;
Wild weeds are gathering on the wall,
My dog howls at the gate.
(Byron.) [T. K., Newcastle-upon-Tyne.]

Come away—no more of mirth
Is here or merry-making sound.
(Tennyson.) [E. B., Liverpool.]

A bright adieu,
For a brief absence, proves that love is true ;
Ne'er can the way be irksome or forlorn
That winds into itself for sweet return.
(Wordsworth.) [S. B., Great Malvern.]

In the hope to meet
Shortly again, and make an absence sweet.
(Ben Jonson.) [H. E. M., Edinburgh.]

From all his wearisome engagements freed,
Shakes hands with business, and retires indeed.

And all impatient of dry land, agree
With one consent to rush into the sea.
(Cowper.) [J. L., London.]

Brother, had we but time to live,
And fleet the careless hours together,
With all that leisure has to give
Of perfect life and peaceful weather.
(Andrew Lang.) [H. P. B., Glasgow.]

Being holiday, the beggar's shop is shut
("Romeo and Juliet," Act v., sc. 1.) [A. W., London.]

He that hath found some fledg'd bird's nest may know,
At first sight, if the bird be flown ;
But what fair dell or grove he sings in now,
That is to him unknown.
(Vaughan.) [E. P., London.]

Shall I not take mine ease in mine inn ?
("Henry IV.," Part I., Act iii., sc. 3.) [T. B. D., Bridgwater.]

We are blessed in the change.
("Henry V.," Act i., sc. I.) [C. B., Bristol.]

Fresh woods and pastures new.
(Milton.) [H. J., London.]

Away, away, from men and towns.
(Shelley.) [M. A. C., Cambridge.]

At this hour the house doth keep itself,
("As You Like It," Act iv., sc. 3, line 82.) [J. C.-S., Bristol.]

Where'er I roam, whatever realms to see,
My heart untravell'd fondly turns to thee.
(Goldsmith.) [A. A., Birkdale.]

Tired of the Senate's barren brawl
An hour with silence we prefer,
Where statelier rise the woods than all
Yon towers of talk at Westminster.
(William Watson.) [F. C. N., London.]

At this hour the house doth keep itself,
There's none within.
("As You Like It," Act iv., sc. 3.) [K. K., Dublin.]

All within is dark as night :
In the windows is no light :
And no murmur at the door,
So frequent on its hinge before.
(Tennyson.) [E. M. H., London.]

All hope abandon ye who enter here.
[A. M. P., London.]

Other replies received from : M. I. C., Ealing ; Rev. W. A. S., Manchester ; Mrs. S., London ; A. S. H., Dalkeith ; M. M., Ramsgate ; H. F. H., Nottingham ; T. C., Buxted ; J. J. B., Glasgow ; Z. McC., Whithy ; C. R., Redhill ; E. V., London ; G. M. Bedford ; J. C., London ; R. F. McC., Whithy.

Competition No. 40 (New Series).

WE offer a prize of One Guinea for a "Thing Seen" written in verse and not exceeding eight lines. We need scarcely remark that all or nearly all the poem should be devoted to the Thing Seen ; comment should be inferential, or come briefly at the end.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, June 26. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon ; otherwise the first only will be considered. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

MR. ARCHIBALD LITTLE'S THROUGH the YANGTSE GORGES

This Cheap Edition has been so Revised and brought up to date and newly illustrated throughout as to be practically a new book. With a Map and 35 New Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

* The Yangtse region is the heart of China, and comprises an area of six hundred thousand square miles, inhabited by about one hundred and eighty millions of the most industrious and peaceable people in the world. It opens up a magnificent prospect for British enterprise.

* All those who want to know about the Yangtse should read Mr. Little's book, for there is no one who can compare with him in knowledge of the facts; while Mrs. Little's photographs are a charming feature of the volume. — St. James's Gazette.

BOOKS ABOUT CHINA AND JAPAN Published by the RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY.

SOUTHERN CHINA. By Rev. J.

MAGGOWAN, of the London Mission, Amoy. With 77 Illustrations. 8vo, 10s. 6d., cloth, gilt top.

"He who has lived beyond the China seas is made to feel the East a call to a painful degree by the Rev. J. Macgowan's 'Pictures of Southern China.' The description of the scenery round about Hong Kong and the open ports of Amoy, Canton, and Foochow is delightful, the sketches of European life faithful, and the appreciation of Chinese character just. A feature of the book is its many high-class illustrations." Pall Mall Gazette.

AMONG the MONGOLS. By James

GILMOUR, M.A., of Peking. With Engravings. 2s. 6d., cloth gilt.

"No one who begins this book will leave it till the narrative ends, or doubt for an instant that he has been enchained by something separate and distinct in literature, something almost unaccountable in the way it has gripped him, and made him see for ever a scene he never expected to see." — The Spectator.

MORE ABOUT the MONGOLS. By

JAMES GILMOUR, M.A., of Peking. Crown 8vo, 5s., cloth boards.

"The experiences of a devoted missionary, whose gift of circumstantial narration has not inaptly been likened to Defoe's." The Times.

OLD WANG: the First Chinese

Evangelist in Manchuria. A Sketch of his Life and Work, with a Chapter on Native Agency in Chinese Missions. With a Portrait and Illustrations. By JOHN ROSS, Missionary of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland. 1s. 6d., cloth boards.

RAMBLES in JAPAN: the Land

of the Rising Sun. By Rev. Canon TRISTRAM, D.D., LL.D., Author of "The Land of Moab," "The Natural History of the Bible," &c. With many Illustrations by Edward Whymper, from Photographs and Sketches. 8vo, 1s. 6d., cloth, gilt top.

"Dr. Tristram is an experienced traveller, keen in observation and kindly in appreciation, an accomplished field naturalist, and an enthusiastic collector of things rare or beautiful both in nature and art. These qualities have stood him in good stead during his visit to Japan." — The Times.

GILMOUR and his BOYS. By

RICHARD LOVETT, M.A. With Map, Facsimile Letters, and many Illustrations. 2s. 6d., cloth, gilt.

This book is largely made up of the letters written by James Gilmour to his two boys, between 1888 and 1891. They describe many of his self-denying labours in Mongolia, they are full of strange and interesting incidents, and they tell, in his own graphic style, the story of his life and work from day to day.

FOR HIS SAKE. A Record of a

Life consecrated to God, and Devoted to China. Extracts from the Letters of ELSIE MARSHALL, married at Hwa-Sang, China, August 1, 1893. With Portrait. 8vo, 2s., cloth boards.

"A more fitting title could not well have been chosen for the intensely interesting volume of letters of Miss Elsie Marshall. They breathe a deep devotional spirit, and it is impossible to read them without reverently thanking God for her life and work." — The Record.

THE AINU of JAPAN: the Religions, Superstitions, and General History of the Hairy Aborigines of Japan. By the Rev. JOHN BATCHELOR, C.M.S. With 80 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s., cloth boards.

"Mr. Batchelor's book is valuable as being the first which treats at any length of this strange people." Pall Mall Gazette.

GILMOUR of MONGOLIA: his

Diaries, Letters, and Reports. Edited and Arranged by RICHARD LOVETT, M.A. With Portrait and other Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, 2s. 6d., cloth boards.

"We gladly welcome another notable addition to the number of impressive and fascinating missionary books—a volume fit to stand on the same shelf with the biographies of Paton and Mackay." — British Weekly.

AMONG the DARK-HAIRED

RACE in the FLOWERY LAND. By SAMUEL B. DRAKE, of the Baptist Missionary Society. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 2s., cloth boards.

This book, from the pen of one of the Missionaries in North China, gives a very realistic and vivid picture of the conditions under which Christian work is carried on in his district.

GLANCES at CHINA. By the Rev. GILBERT REID, M.A., of the American Presbyterian Board. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 2s., cloth.

Published by the RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, INCORPORATED, 56, Paternoster Row, London.

PRESS OPINIONS.

"The author traces the military career of this famous General in an attractive manner, every ear apparently having been taken to make it accurate."—Morning Post.
"So clear a narrative of so fine a life can be welcomed as something better than a piece of book-making."—Academy.
"Mr. Groser's book seems to us a marvel of cheapness, and is written with great care and considerable literary effect."—Cutlook.

"Worth re-reading.... A rousing little book."—M. Jam's Gazette.

"A well-told story of the famous soldier's career."—Navy and Army Illustrated.

"Admirably welded together into a stirring and dramatic story."—Literary World.

OUR LIVING GENERALS. Twelve

Biographical Sketches of Distinguished Soldiers, including Lord Kitchener, of Khartoum. By ARTHUR TEMPLE, Author of "The Making of the Empire." With Portraits. Large imp. 16mo, art vellum, gilt top, 3s. 6d.

"The Commander-in-Chief heads the gallery of portraiture—portraiture in the pictorial sense is an additional attraction to the book—and Lord Kitchener fits close the gallant array. Altogether the book is pleasant and proud reading."—Saturday Review.

"A capital book, breezily and brightly written."—St. James's Budget.

"No one will deny that the list is well chosen. Wolseley, Roberts, Buller, Wood, Kitchener, are all men of whom the nation is justly proud, and the simple record of their services cannot but be well worth the reading."—Naval and Military Record.

Book of Daily Meditations for a Year. By ALEXANDER SMELLIE, M.A. With Special Poems for each Month, by KATHARINE TYNAN HINKSON, LOUISE IMOGEN GUINEY, and "M. M. R." Imp. 16mo, cloth boards, gilt edges, 5s. Also an Edition with white back, full gilt.

"All is original and all of choicest quality.... The thought is never abstruse, but in touch with the simple realities of our spiritual life, yet it is always fresh.... We have not had a book of daily meditations so near to what it ought to be as this, though many have tried to furnish one."—Expository Times.

"The papers here collected.... are brief, wise, unpretentious, striking. Mostly on some aspect of the Christian life which appeals to the contemplative mind, they are excellently adapted for devotional reading. They are at once very pleasing and suggestive."—British Weekly.

"Books of devotion are numerous, but there is yet room for 'In the Hour of Silence'.... The writer's aim is writ large over every page; it is to take the mind of the reader off himself and to centre it upon a Higher Power."—Record.

SECOND EDITION.

The Literary Week.

SIR E. MAUNDE THOMPSON, in his report on the general progress at the British Museum for the year ending on March 31 last, records a slight decrease in the number of visits of students to the reading room—188,554 as against 190,886 in 1898. The daily average was 624. The number of volumes, &c., supplied to readers was 1,306,078, as against 1,397,145 in 1898. Mr. G. K. Fortescue, in his report on the Department of Printed Books, says that the printing of the entire catalogue, which was begun in 1881, is now almost complete; there now remains unprinted only a portion of the heading "England." The number of readers in the newspaper room was 19,090, giving a daily average of over 63.

THE story of action, or romantic novel, still holds the field in America. The Century magazine, which is not given to hasty statements, acknowledges in the current issue that "after sporadic advances, over a considerable space of time, it has finally carried the citadel of public fancy with a rush." But in this country the citadel has not been carried by the historical novel. It would seem that that honour is destined for what is known as the society novel, the account—smart, witty, and sentimental—of a circle of people whose objects in life are mainly social ambition, and falling in and falling out of love. An excellent example of this type of fiction is Mr. Percy White's amusing and interesting story called The West End.

IN the future, no doubt, the military story will dominate our magazines and circulating libraries. We could wish that these onrushing pages of fiction could all have the purpose and the meaning behind the tale that characterises the striking stories of the war by Mr. Rudyard Kipling that are now appearing in the Daily Express. "The Way That He Took," which appeared on June 12th, 13th, and 14th, and "The Outsider," which appeared on June 19th, 20th, and 21st, should be printed as an appendix to General Baden-Powell's Aids to Scouting. We hope Dr. Conan Doyle will bring his ingenious brain to bear on the medical arrangements, as Mr. Kipling has thrown the flash-light of his intelligence on military matters.

NEXT week Mrs. Craigie's latest novel, Robert Orange, will be published. It is a sequel to The School for Saints, and the two books together represent five years' work. Disraeli again is a prominent character. A sixpenny edition of The School for Saints is ready for publication. It is printed in the same style as the six-shilling book, and is, perhaps, the largest sixpenny novel ever offered to the public.

THE publication of Mr. Churton Collins's essays, Plain Truths about Current Literature, has been deferred till the autumn.

S. G., the writer of the Literary Notes in the Pall Mall Gazette, has the courage of his convictions. Commenting on the announcement by Messrs. Macmillan of the issue of a complete edition of the writings of Mr. Walter Pater "uniform with the édition de luxe of Mr. Kipling's work," he says:

I have never been able to realise the fascination of Pater's style, except, indeed, in passages like the famous one about Leonardo's lady in the Louvre, nor to understand the influence of his thought. Marius the Epicurean always seemed like the dry bones of "Greats" lectures dressed up in togas, but there is no doubt that the presentment of ancient Rome had a peculiar charm for many people who cared for literature, particularly for those who knew no Latin.

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW announce the publication of the Times' History of the War in South Africa. This History, which has been in course of preparation for some months, will be the joint production of several of the Special Correspondents of the Times in South Africa. It will be edited by Mr. L. S. Amery, and will be completed in five volumes.

MESSRS. CECIL AND HILDEBRAND HARMSWORTH, who will jointly edit the new monthly magazine, the New Liberal Review, have furnished us with some particulars about their forthcoming venture. In size and shape the New Liberal Review will resemble most of the other great monthly reviews, and, like them, it will include many articles of literary and general interest. But these resemblances soon fade away into differences. The New Liberal Review will answer to its name, in that it will have a distinct political trend of thought. It will be the monthly organ of Liberal Imperialism, and will print articles by the leaders of this political division. Secondly, it will endeavour in a general way to attach clever young writers to the Liberal cause. Literary and general articles will be accepted from any writer, whether he is known or not, who can furnish originality and style. Known writers whose style is dull, or whose views can always be anticipated, will be left in the cold by the New Liberal Review. An amusingly characteristic fact, elicited by our representative, is that whereas no definite list of contributors to the New Liberal Review has yet been drawn up, a list of writers who will not write for it has been made. Articles will rule shorter in the New Liberal Review than in most of the reviews; a length of 3,000 to 4,000 words will be the standard as against the 5,000 to 6,000 words favoured by other editors. The political articles will, of course, be in general accord with the policy of the New Liberal Review, and this granted they will undergo little editorial treatment. But a strong editorial hand will be kept on the rest of the Review; and a general control over the whole of it will be exercised in a few pages of editorial notes, somewhat in the style of the Spectator's weekly summary. The price of the New Liberal Review has not yet been definitely settled, but we shall not be surprised if a review edited within the walls of the Harmsworth Buildings is characteristically venturesome in giving large measure for little money.

WE did not express a decided opinion on the Parliamentary proposals of the British Museum Trustees with regard to the disposal of provincial newspapers and "superfluous" literature. The subject is a difficult one, and we have little doubt that "best wisdom"—to use an old Quaker expression—will be vouchsafed to the few on whom the decision really rests. Mr. Leslie Stephen, a British Museum student of the highest type, wrote on the subject in last week's Speaker, but his views have hardly his characteristic definiteness. One scarcely gathers what he would himself propose. He points out that a superstitious regard for facts as facts is apt to fill the minds of museum directors:

Because any fact may be important, they speak as if every fact must be interesting. A single observation may clear up a scientific difficulty. Millions of years ago an insect happened to be stuck in a clod of earth. Its "mortal remains" when dug up may give a decisive solution of some problem of evolution. The one specimen was priceless. But if we afterwards found a whole stratum composed of similar remains they might tell us nothing more. A single locust would be as instructive as a countless swarm. So a single ancient document found in a mummy may reveal something of deep interest as to the remotest civilisation. If similar documents were discovered their value would decline in a rapidly accelerating ratio. They would only repeat what we knew already.

On the other hand, "as we . . . are not yet quite infallible, we must keep everything that we may be sure of not destroying just what our posterity will desire." The "only moral" which Mr. Stephen wishes to draw, and he merely draws it—he does not elaborate it—is that "the demand for the preservation of the material should be accompanied by a demand for its organisation. Our huge storehouses should be arranged with a view to their accessibility." This, however, has been said already by those who object to the Trustees' proposals. There has been organisation as far as space permitted. The cry is for space. The Trustees propose to secure it by throwing out "superfluous" material. The objectors ask: "When did you discover that it was superfluous? Your business is to pull down your old barns and build greater." But—mirabile dictu—it has now been discovered, through Mr. Morley's inquiry in Parliament, that these "Trustees' proposals" do not represent the mind of the Trustees at all, but have been brought about by Government pressure. The Trustees wish to hold what they have, and extend their space; and the Government is thrifty! Probably the evaporation of the proposals has begun.

MEANWHILE, however, a correspondent writes to us:

Instead of scattering the provincial papers to the four corners of the kingdom, the British Museum authorities ought to consider whether they could not better set free a lot of space by distributing their superfluous books among the free libraries. A glance through the catalogue shows that there are dozens of copies in the library of many books, and, probably, in a majority of cases not a single copy is used from year's end to year's end.

Of Robert Hall's "Modern Infidelity," for instance, first published in 1800, there are sixteen editions; of "The Sunday Friend," thirteen editions; of a sermon by a certain Archbishop of York, nine copies; of the "Collected Sermons of Master Henrie Smith (year 1592, &c.)," twelve editions; of his sermons on "Jonah's Punishment," six copies; on "God's Arrows against Atheists," six copies; on "Contentment," six copies, and so on. Probably religious writers take up more room than all other writers put together. One Baptist minister has no less than six pages of the catalogue to himself with writings on "Pleasant Things from the Everlasting Hills or Pleasant Truths for all Peoples," "Pearls from the Ocean, or Wealth for Souls," and things of that kind. Perhaps the worst offenders are the writers of school books. Of Hamblin Smith's "Arithmetic for Junior Classes," "Arithmetic for Senior Classes," and "Answers" to each, there are, in all, thirty-three copies. Of his "Algebra" "Trigonometry," "Geometry," and "Treatise on Arithmetic," there are altogether forty-two copies. There is a book on botany by another Smith, written in 1807, and almost of no value now, but it is represented by no fewer than nine copies. Then the poets are certainly given too much space. Of Longfellow's "Poetical Works" there are seventy-four editions, besides scores of volumes of "Selected," "Early," "Later," &c., poems. In addition there are thirteen editions of "Miles Standish," twenty-six editions of "Evangeline," twelve editions of "Hiawatha," &c. All the readers of all the ages to come will not wear out a tithe of these, and they could be distributed with great advantage.

ACCORDING to a daily paper (from which we condense the following account), a strange literary lawsuit is amusing Rome. Some time ago Prof. Cugnoni, of the Rome University, came into possession of a copy of some MSS. alleged to have been written by Leopardi. He published them as a contribution to Leopardi literature. Soon afterwards a Government librarian, named Tacchi, declared himself to be the author of the MSS. Prof. Cugnoni maintained that it was impossible for any living Italian to counterfeit Leopardi's style, and refused to entertain Tacchi's claim. Thirteen years passed, when, on the occasion of the Leopardian centenary, Abbot Cozza Luzzi, vice-librarian of the Vatican, published certain MSS. of Leopardi which had found their way into the Vatican Library, and which the abbot declared to be authentic. Some of the MSS. contained passages identical with those published by Prof. Cugnoni. On the strength of this confirmation of his theory Prof. Cugnoni accused Tacchi of literary dishonesty. Hence the present trial. Feeling is running high not only between Cugnoni and Tacchi, but also between their respective advocates. Signor Ferri, the Socialist leader, is hot on one side, and Signor Bonacci, a well-known Zanardellian, is hot on the other. These two worthies recently came to blows over the question of the authenticity of Cugnoni's copy of Leopardi, and had to be separated by the Carabineers. Meanwhile Italian justice is putting on its spectacles.

THE present season of the Monday dinners of the Authors' Club will conclude on July 2. During the past year the club has entertained a number of distinguished guests, among whom may be mentioned Lord Wolseley, the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Mayor, the Bishop of London, Sir George Trevelyan, Mr. Leslie Stephen, Mr. James Bryce, General Sir Evelyn Wood, Sir Herbert Maxwell, the French Ambassador, the American Ambassador, the Chinese Minister, the Swedish and Norwegian Minister, Sir Walter Foster, Sir D. Mackenzie Wallace, Sir L. Alma-Tadema, R.A., Sir E. J. Poynter, P.R.A., Lord Strathcona, Mr. E. F. Knight, and Sir Robert Ball.

WE do not quite follow Mr. Heinemann in his argument in last week's Literature that fashion in fiction does not exist, or is of small account. He says: "The only justification I have ever found for the assumption that fashion favours one class of novel to-day and a different class to-morrow is that every striking work of literature or art engenders in the lazy writer the vision of a welcome pons asinorum, and with the unthinking reader a comfortable wish for more of the same." Mr. Heinemann proceeds to give instance after instance of the imitation of successful novels by inferior writers. Well, in the world of dress this is the state of things which we call fashion. What is fashion there but the "pons asinorum" of people without original taste? Fashion is the refuge of the unthinking in dress; and so it is in literature. Mr. Heinemann seems to quarrel greatly with the word, but to supply overwhelming evidence of the fact. We regret the phenomenon as much as he does; but we should say that there is undoubtedly, in these days, such a thing as fashion in fiction. It is happily more easily changed than fashion in dress, and we are glad that Mr. Heinemann thinks that "the success of to-morrow may grow on any branch of the tree of fiction"; adding, for emphasis: "Let any new author offer me a novel that excels in any particular—let his work be of any school—he will not find me difficult to convince that his, and his only for the nonce, is the novel towards which the tendencies and the taste of the day are gravitating."

INCIDENTALLY Mr. Heinemann has this severe word on the historical novel of the moment:

If I were asked whether the novel of an unknown author dealing with daily life in an everyday way would be as likely to "catch on" as an historical romance, I think I should favour it, because it would in all probability be nearer to human actuality, and might possibly be based on observation and insight, if not even on experience or knowledge. To make living and real personages of past ages, hampered as the writer must be with the necessity of creating a remote atmosphere and a strange milieu, is the task of the master, and that is why, at a moment devoted to the apotheosis of the incompetent, it becomes the favourite ambition of every bungling amateur.

SOME of the philological asides which occur in Dr. Murray's Romanes lecture, which we deal with elsewhere, are extremely interesting. He shows how Dr. Johnson corrupted the spelling of the word "dispatch." This word had been in English use for some 250 years when Johnson's Dictionary appeared, and had been correctly spelt by everybody (that is, by everybody but the illiterate) with dis-. This was Johnson's own spelling both before and after he published the dictionary, as may be seen in his Letters edited by Dr. G. Birkbeck Hill. It was also the spelling of all the writers whom Johnson quoted. But, by some inexplicable error, the word got into the dictionary as despatch, and this spelling was even substituted in most of the quotations. I have not found that a single writer followed this erroneous spelling in the eighteenth century: Nelson, Wellesley, Wellington, and all our commanders and diplomatists wrote Dispatches; but since about 1820, the filtering down of the influence of Johnson's Dictionary has caused this erroneous spelling despatch to become generally known and to be looked upon as authoritative; so that at the present time about half our newspapers give the erroneous form, to which, more lamentably, the Post Office, after long retaining the correct official tradition, recently capitulated.

New and recent books relating to China and Japan are pretty sure of a sale now that the Far East horizon is beset with threatening clouds. A book which comes very opportunely will be The "Overland" to China, by Archibald R. Colquhoun, F.R.G.S., the author of China in Transformation. This is an account of the building of the Trans-Siberian Railway, and a study of the rapid ascendancy of Russian Influence in China during the past few years; together with speculations as to the political significance of the completion of this great undertaking. Messrs. Harper Bros. will issue the book next Tuesday.

ANOTHER imminent publication is Feudal and Modern Japan, by Mr. Arthur May Knapp, which Messrs. Duckworth announce. Mr. Knapp has frequently visited, and for a long time resided in Japan, thus enjoying peculiar advantages for observation. The book includes a study of the history, religion, art, life and habits of the Japanese. While avoiding that indiscriminating praise which has characterised so many works on Japan, it presents fresh points of view and furnishes information which is difficult of access. There will be twenty-four photogravure illustrations of Japanese life, landscape, and architecture.

THAT the effect of the American law of copyright as it now stands may be to discourage the production of serious literature is very clearly brought out by Mr. Alfred Austin in his article on Anglo-American Literary Copyright in the Pall Mall Magazine. Copyright in America can be secured only by simultaneous publication on both sides of the Atlantic. This means a double production and expense, and it is easy to see that in the case of a "non-popular" book this double expense may frighten an English publisher or author. But if they once publish the book on this side only, the American copyright is lost for ever. What regrets and anomalies may then arise is seen in the following fragment of a conversation between an author and a publisher, which Mr. Austin reports as an actuality:

"I quite understand," said my friend; "but, had I thought the book would have the circulation here it seems to be having, I should willingly have incurred the additional expense of simultaneously producing it in America. As you say, it is now too late to do that. But I observe, from the statement of sales you have just shown me, that the book—that is to say, the English edition of it published by you—finds a certain number of purchasers in America, where so far, roughly calculated, as many hundreds of copies have been sent and sold as there have been thousands sold here. Can you not, therefore—for this is the point I wanted to urge—do something to stimulate the sale there still further?"

"Possibly," said the publisher. "But just consider whether that would be wise, from a business point of view. The book seems to be much appreciated in this country, and therefore we have been able to dispose, as you say, of a certain number of copies in America. But, if once the impression arose there that the book is what in trade parlance is called a great success with the English reading public, it would at once be pirated, and we should be able to dispose of no more copies to American readers. As soon as it was believed that there is 'money in it,' it would at once be reprinted there, and your share in that money would be reduced to nil. As it is, you will receive something, at least, from the sales in America."

From which it appears that under the above circumstances—which could arise in connection with no European country—an author may find that it is directly against his interest to bring his book prominently before a public eager to read it.

THE New Battle of Dorking, by a writer whose name is represented on the title-page by a row of six asterisks, is like the old Battle of Dorking in its aim to arouse Englishmen to a sense of the danger of a French invasion.

There are three months in every year—July, August, September—during which the French army is fit for immediate warfare. And every year during these months there is a constantly recurring probability of a surprise raid on London by the 120,000 men whom they could without difficulty put on board ship, land in England, and march to within a dozen miles of London in less than three days from receipt of the order to move.

The story tells how a French army landed at Horsham, after a torpedo attack on Portsmouth, while the Channel Fleet was off the Irish coast. An immediate advance to London was met with fair promptitude by the volunteers and reserves. After terrible bloodshed in Surrey, and panic in London, the French army surrendered. But a new necessity to defeat France on her own soil, and quench her passion for revenge, was created, with corresponding needs for army reform. The writer is strongly opposed to those "humanitarian" methods in war which endanger results by excessive economy in human lives. He does not believe in "extended order" except in skirmishing. In battle he advocates "the decisive, rapid advance, ending in the relentless bayonet attack, when having located your enemy's position it is absolutely necessary to shift him bodily out of it. Our fellows did this the other day in those two wonderful bayonet duels with the French near Dorking and at Chaldon." Larger lessons are enforced.

MR. DONNELLY is ever with us. War cannot stale, nor Presidential elections wither, the infinite variety of his attacks on Shakespeare. Mr. Donnelly is now Populist candidate for the Vice-Presidency of the United States. But neither Populism nor popularity can turn him from his purpose of inducing us to spell Shakespeare's name B-a-c-o-n. He now tells us that the very inscription on Shakespeare's tomb bears witness against his authorship of the plays. Mr. L. F. Austin makes short and sanguinary work of this suggestion in the Illustrated London News:

He [Mr. Donnelly] applies to the rhymes that served so well to frighten illicit bone-disturbers the test of what he calls Bacon's secret cypher. This produces the disclosure that "Francis Bacon wrote the Marlowe, Greene, and Shakspeare plays." . . . Mr. Donnelly must have expected more than this. If in the intervals of writing the works that bear his illustrious name, and of discharging the duties of a somewhat laborious office in the State, Bacon could find time to write Shakspeare, Marlowe, and Greene, I see no reason why he should not have written Ben Jonson, Beaumont and Fletcher—in short, the whole Elizabethan drama. Nothing in the shape of toil is impossible to such a prodigy. Not only did he pile Pelion on Ossa by writing Shakspeare, but with sheer wanton riot of intellect he introduced the cryptogram into the plays for the Populist candidate to find out. Whilst his imagination was in the throes of "Lear," "Hamlet," and what not, his historical conscience was penning a veracious narrative of the life and times of Elizabeth, and interweaving it with the blank verse. The Baconian theorists say it is incredible that a man of Shakspeare's education could have written his poetry; but they offer us in their imaginary Bacon the most astounding miracle in human history.

APPROPOS of our recent remarks on the clashing of novel titles, the following statement is interesting. It appears on a slip of pink paper in a book of two stories, by Dr. G. H. R. Dabbs, entitled Before Good Night and From Door to Door, the second story being a sequel to the first:

The author regrets that the similar title of this sequel-story to that of Mr. Capes's lately published book has arisen by one of those accidents of coincidence which need only to be acknowledged to be understood. Mr. Capes had inadvertently adopted the identical title used in a serial story by the author of Before Good Night, and it was not brought to his notice until his novel was published and reviewed. The author of this version of From Door to Door, while fully exonerating Mr. Capes, cannot surrender his title.

MR. HEINEMANN has in preparation a series of translations of the novels of Matilde Serao, to be published uniform with the works of Gabriele d'Annunzio, the first volume to appear in the autumn.

OWING to pressure on our space we have been unable to quote so many verses in the "Things Seen" (metrical) competition as we could have wished. We shall quote a few others next week.

Bibliographical.

THE continued vitality of the late Mrs. Edwardes's story, Ought We to Visit Her? is shown in the fact that Messrs. Macmillan have just reissued it in two-shilling form. It is by this novel and by Archie Lovell that Mrs. Edwardes in all probability will be remembered. The former had the distinction of being adapted to the stage by Mr. W. S. Gilbert, at a time—a quarter of a century ago—when dramatisations of novels were not so frequent or so popular as they are now. Mrs. Edwardes's last published work was posthumous—A Plaster Saint, which came out last year, apparently without the advantage of the author's final revision. It had been preceded in 1890 by Pearl Powder, and in 1885 by A Girton Girl. Of Mrs. Edwardes's Leah and Susan Fielding there were new editions as lately as 1899 and 1893, but they have been outdistanced in popularity by Archie Lovell. In Ought We to Visit Her? we have, no doubt, the survival of the fittest.

"Bibliographers of Thackeray," wrote Mr. F. G. Kitton in last week's Literature, "are apparently unaware of the fact that the author of Vanity Fair, in his early days, was responsible for the libretto of a little musical opera called 'The Mountain Sylph,' first performed at the Royal Lyceum Theatre on Monday, August 25, 1834." I beg Mr. Kitton's pardon. If the bibliographers of the author of Vanity Fair do not ascribe to him the authorship of the libretto of "The Mountain Sylph," it is simply because he has no claim thereto. The said libretto was the work, not of W. M. Thackeray, but of T. J. Thackeray, his cousin, some references to whom may be found in Planché's Recollections. The two Thackerays have frequently been confounded in regard to theatrical productions, but it is really high time that the truth prevailed. No dramatic work by W. M. Thackeray was ever performed in public, whereas T. J. Thackeray made several appearances of that sort, in addition to "The Mountain Sylph."

I see it stated that along with the text of The Mesmerist, a new novel by Mr. B. L. Farjeon, will be published that of a play which Mr. Farjeon has himself based upon the story—"for the purpose of forestalling any raids that may be made upon it for theatrical purposes." I doubt very much if the said raids will have been successfully averted by this latest device of the self-defending novelist. The decision in the Little Lord Fauntleroy case appears to render it possible for any raider to annex the entire plot and characters of The Mesmerist, and make them into a play, so long as he does not use any of Mr. Farjeon's dialogue. Even Mr. Farjeon's title, I believe, could be taken by anyone sufficiently unprincipled. I do not think it has been used as a play-title, and it would, therefore, be proportionately valuable.

Talking of printed plays, that sort of literary product is becoming quite familiar. It was only the other day that Mr. Haddon Chambers followed in the wake of Mr. Pinero, Mr. Henry Arthur Jones, and Mr. Bernard Shaw, by giving to the world the text of his comedy, "The Tyranny of Tears." Of course, Mr. Shaw and Mr. Jones and Mr. Pinero did but follow the example of Mr. W. S. Gilbert, most of whose dramas have attained the dignity of print. (He has refrained, by the way, from including his burlesques of opera—"Dulcamara," "The Pretty Druidess," and so forth—in his volumes of plays.) But, in truth, the extent of printed plays is very considerable—the dramas of Westland Marston, the comedies of T. W. Robertson, the plays of Knowles and Lytton and so on, being all accessible in volume form. Then, what a mine of dramatic matter is to be found in the current list of Mr. French's publications!

It is understood that the Two Stage Plays of Lucy Snowe, announced by Mr. Heinemann, have never been offered to managers for stage representation. They are called "Denzil Herbert's Atonement" and "Bondage." If the latter piece had been accepted for production, the title would probably have had to be changed, for a play called "Bondage" was performed in London in 1883, and the proprietor thereof might claim priority of choice. The title of Lucy Snowe's other play is not likely to be challenged.

In reply to a correspondent, I may mention that Mr. Bernard Shaw's Cashel Byron's Confession was published by the Modern Press in 1886 (price one shilling), and that a revised edition of it appeared in 1889. Mr. Shaw's Unsocial Socialist appeared in 1887 (six shillings) and in 1888 (two shillings).

Grant Allen.

Grant Allen. By Edward Clodd. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

Taine says somewhere that a certain philosopher secured for himself the devotion of the British public by discovering the English God in the sacred writings of the Hindoos. Though gifted beyond most men, and catching at times glimpses of profound truths, Grant Allen made no discoveries of this type; quite the reverse.

To accept nothing unless it commended itself to his own reason and conscience was Grant Allen's fixed and invariable rule, and as that is not the way of the world he came sharply into collision with much that is dear to the orthodox heart. He hated shams and conventions, and he took every opportunity of saying so. He disliked those vulgar superstitions which usurp the name of religion, and he was at times outspoken in declaring his preference for a religion of essentials—truth, justice, pity, love, gratitude and sympathy. He hated war and everything leading to it. Napier, "Peninsular War Napier," declared that soldiers were licensed murderers; but Grant Allen dispensed with qualifications, and bluntly avowed his belief that military enthusiasm meant enthusiasm for killing people. He was an evolutionist, not of the limited, but of the unlimited kind; and he believed in the orderly unfolding of everything from cosmic dust to man, body and soul. He wrote a book on The Evolution of God, and was with difficulty persuaded to modify the title to The Evolution of the Idea of God; but even the modified title was all too shocking for the British public; albeit that it had the approval and had, in fact, been suggested by Mr. Herbert Spencer. Finally, he unbosomed himself on the relations of the sexes in The Woman Who Did.

Obviously, Grant Allen needs a biographer who sympathised with him, and who can put him right with the court of appeal—the coming generations. And the majority of people who take an interest in the matter will be of opinion that Mr. Edward Clodd is eminently well suited to accomplish this task. Mr. Clodd is an evolutionist; he understands the work accomplished by the pioneers of the doctrine and, as he tells us himself, he enjoyed Grant Allen's friendship for well nigh twenty-eight years. Besides, he had something to pour into the ear of the public of potent effect with the vast majority of folks—to wit, a deeply pathetic tale, and on a scaffolding of deep feeling he could have erected a solid edifice of reason. For Grant Allen's life was charged with tragic interest. After a period of sunshine in the land of his birth—Canada—and at Dieppe and Birmingham, he matriculated at Merton College, Oxford. While at Oxford changes occurred in family circumstances and he was thrown on his own efforts, and from that time till his death he never knew the peace which comes from possessing a good banker's balance—a peace which truly passeth all understanding—and he was never wholly free from some measure of anxiety about financial ways and means. He had one bit of good luck in being appointed a professor at the Government College in Jamaica, but that only lasted three years, and was a mere passing glimpse of the comfortable side of life. He had to live by his pen, and he soon learned that living by his pen, in the regions he was specially equipped for—namely, science and philosophy—meant starvation. Then he tried his hand at every branch of literature, and displayed a versatility which was truly marvellous. He achieved success; he became a known man, and commissions poured in. But success came too late. He had been constantly thinking, planning and scheming to produce wares to catch the literary market, and this ceaseless mental activity and worry wore him out, and cut short his life at a comparatively early age. He was never robust, and his burden was too much for him.

"What place is to be assigned to this versatile well-equipped worker?" Mr. Clodd asks this question in his closing pages; but he contents himself with some melancholy reflections about the short memory man has except for the few immortals, and leaves the answer to his question to time. He forgets that it was his bounden duty to assign a place to this hero and martyr, and to help time to form a correct verdict about him. We must say frankly that we expected much from Mr. Clodd; we thought him the right man for the task he had undertaken; but we must with equal frankness declare that we finished his book with feelings of utter disappointment. He has given us many good things—letters and sketches by Mr. Herbert Spencer, Darwin, Huxley, Mr. Andrew Lang, Mr. Alfred Russell Wallace, Prof. Powell, and Miss Bird (sister of Dr. George Bird), but he has relied too much on the good things supplied to him by others. His connecting narrative is at times singularly weak. He is apt enough about Grant Allen's ancestry, his "grand forebears o' auld lang syne," and he gives us a good background from which to trace this gifted man's physical and mental constitution. But there is another background even more important than that of the family—namely, one of the social and intellectual antecedents of our time, so as to enable us and those who come after us to understand exactly where Allen took up "the burden and the lesson," and what he has actually accomplished as a pioneer of evolution. Grant Allen himself thought he had done something for evolution, his dying words to his son being: "I want no memorial over my remains. Tell those who care for anything that I may have done to buy a copy of Force and Energy." But the evolution he did something for was the Spencerian form of that doctrine, and that form has never kindled in Mr. Clodd the enthusiasm of an adherent.

Mr. Clodd's method, or rather want of method, is glaringly evidenced in his bibliography of the writings of Grant Allen. The bibliography is a complete misnomer. The writings are given in chronological order, which would be all very well for an author who kept to a definite pathway, and to whom dates were of consequence in order to establish his claims to originality. But Grant Allen did not keep to a definite pathway, but was philosopher, naturalist, physicist, historian, poet, novelist, essayist, and critic. The efforts of a many-sided man like him ought not to have been given indiscriminately according to dates, but should have been tabulated according to subject-matter, and the tabulation should have been done in such a way as to show a definite purpose and a definite unfolding of a distinctive gospel. The bibliography is limited to writings published in book form, and it is well that that limitation is distinctly stated, otherwise we should have been obliged to mention several omissions.

The Spencer-Allen correspondence forms the most interesting and, at the same time, the most valuable portion of the book. The letters are, however, given in chronological order, and are consequently scattered throughout the volume. In adopting this method Mr. Clodd allows an opportunity to escape him of doing a signal piece of service to two distinguished men. Mr. Clodd contents himself with saying that Grant Allen made an early profession of the faith as it is in Herbert Spencer, and that, with some modifications hardly affecting the fundamentals of that faith, his attitude remained unchanged to the end. This would be all very well were Mr. Clodd writing for philosophers; but as he was writing for the public, and the public, according to Lord Beaconsfield, are largely doctored with nonsense, and much require books which refute that nonsense, a very different statement was called for. Grant Allen diverged from Mr. Spencer on three points. The public were told that Mr. Spencer keenly resented the modified falling-off in his gifted adherent, and showed his resentment in such a way that, had it been true, would have reflected lasting discredit on that philosopher. But it turns out that the public have been misinformed, and that from first to last, for a period extending to a quarter of a century, there existed unclouded friendship between Mr. Herbert Spencer and Grant Allen. Only in one letter does Grant Allen put in a very mild caveat for his way of looking at the land question, which probably caused Mr. Spencer to smile and reflect on the Celtic form of Grant Allen's hereditary make-up. Mr. Spencer's letters are charmingly written, and his epistolary touch has a freshness about it that reminds one of Hume's playful style of addressing friends. Clearly this correspondence ought to have had separate treatment, so as to enable readers to understand the exact nature of Allen's divergences, and adequately to appreciate the solid ground he occupied in common with Mr. Spencer, while the devoted friendship of the two ought to have been specially emphasised. But in this as in the other instances we have mentioned Mr. Clodd gives his readers no assistance whatever.

The Byron of Tinsel and Splendours.

THE WORKS OF LORD BYRON.—Poetry. Vol. III. Edited by Ernest Hartley Coleridge, M.A. (John Murray.)

THIS volume of the new Murray Byron deals principally with the Eastern tales—the "Giaour," the "Corsair," ending feebly with the "Siege of Corinth," "Parisina," and the "Bride of Abydos." Among its many illustrations is a strikingly beautiful drawing of Augusta Leigh, Byron's beloved half-sister, beautiful as regards the face presented. Mr. Ernest Hartley Coleridge here, as always, fulfils his work of editor and commentator with quiet thoroughness, though he has no new matter to lay before the public.

"The whirligig of time brings about its revenges," but never a stranger one than that which makes the descendant of Coleridge a leader in the rearguard fight that covers the retreat of Byron's reputation; Byron, who damned Coleridge with imperceptive condescension concealing itself praise (the adolescent satire of "English Bards" should not be laid to his count). Coleridge, on his side, was not Byron-bitten. But all this is nothing to the gulf between the most perfected (though, alas! most capricious) inspiration of that day and the most tinsel splendours in English poetry. Nothing more antithetic in heredity could happen, unless a descendant of Byron should approve himself a poet. Mr. Coleridge has the task of defending Byron's most Byronic poems (which are far from equivalent to Byron's best poems). His tactics involve him in certain dashing advances of principle, which are magnificent, but are they criticism? They come in such a questionable shape that some will challenge them. We must, he says, assimilate ourselves to Byron's accidents of environment. "Unless we are ourselves saturated with his thought and style, unless we learn to breathe his atmosphere by reading the books which he read, picturing to ourselves the scenes which he saw—unless we aspire to his ideals and suffer his limitations, we are in no way entitled to judge his poems, whether they be good or bad." In other words (though Mr. Coleridge may not intend it, may not realise his own contention), poetry is to be judged by what is impermanent, transitory, of the hour, not by what is permanent, what remains when the detritus, loosened from immediately circumjacent interests, has been precipitated in the on-flow of the stream. Wagner (who was more than solely a musician) maintained that the value of any masterpiece, in whatsoever form of art, was precisely to be gauged by that in it which survived unsubmerged, indestructible, after the temporary and accidental had been borne under by time. The musician here was surely the sounder critic. Because these poems, not in detail but integrally, are unvital and moth-eaten unless you contemporise yourself (pardon the coinage) with Byron, they lack that unsubmergible essential quality which belongs to all true poetry. Poetry is a lifeboat; overset for the moment by the rough seas of time, it finally rights itself through its own structural buoyancy. That is the case with some verse (scarce or seldom poetry) in Byron, but not with this. His contemporaries (says Mr. Coleridge) "being undisturbed by ethical or grammatical or metrical offences, . . . understood enough of what they read to be touched by their vitality, to realise their verisimilitude." But vitality, verisimilitude, is precisely what we feel lacking in these "Giaours" and "Corsairs." As for the metrical offence, it is not a thing of technical detail, incidental and unconsidered lapse; it is an organic disease, a congenital weakness, one with the very flesh of the poetry. "Bold and rapid and yet exact presentments of the 'gorgeous East'" Mr. Coleridge finds in these Oriental poems. Their exactitude is a traveller's trick of "local colour," superficial enough; but where is the soul of the East? It is not in them. They are Western melodrama, in "correct costume," taken from Byron's notes of Turkish travel.

For their style, it is beguiling enough to make us wonder they are not still popular. Take a not undeservedly celebrated passage:

He who hath bent him o'er the dead
Ere the first day of Death is fled,
The first dark day of Nothingness,
The last of Danger and Distress,
(Before Decay's defacing fingers
Have swept the lines where Beauty lingers,)
And marked the mild angelic air,
The rapture of Repose that's there,
The fixed yet tender traits that streak
The languor of the placid cheek,
And—but for that sad shrouded eye,
That fires not, wins not, weeps not, now,
And but for that chill changeless brow,
Where cold Obstruction's apathy
Appals the gazing mourner's heart,
As if to him it could impart
The doom he dreads, yet dwells upon;
Some moments, aye, one treacherous hour,
He still might doubt the Tyrant's power.
So fair, so calm, so softly sealed,
The first, last look by Death revealed!
Such is the aspect of this shore;
'Tis Greece, but living Greece no more!
So coldly sweet, so deadly fair,
We start, for soul is wanting there.
Hers is the loveliness in death.
That parts not quite with parting breath;
But beauty with that fearful bloom,
That hue which haunts it to the tomb,
Expresses its last receding ray,
A gilded Halo hovering round decay,
The farewell beam of Feeling past away!

Eloquence here treads illusively close on the heels of poetry, almost overtakes it in "'Tis Greece, but living Greece no more!" &c. So with some of the descriptions: we have to collect ourselves before we discern that (as an excellent critic once put it) they are not paintings, but oleographs. For the minor poems, you will find that typical Byronism,

Fare thee well, and if for ever, &c.

Byron related how he wrote it with the tears dropping on the page, and so forth. But on what is obviously the original (Mr. Coleridge confesses) there is no trace of these tears which once excited the lachrymal glands of so many English schoolgirls—though there is of elaborate corrections and erasures. Byron's evil genius moved him to head it by the exquisite lines of Coleridge on broken friendship; that all succeeding generations might have a monumental collocation of the false and the true. For the immortal Byron we await a future volume, with "Don Juan," "Beppo," and the "Vision of Judgment." That is the Byron of profuse and surprising genius.

The Spirit of Paris.

Paris. By Hilaire Belloc. (Edward Arnold. 7s. 6d.)

THIS book is neither a history nor a topography, or it is both in a personal, eclectic way. That it may not be read on a wrong mental plane, Mr. Belloc explains exactly how he came to write it. Loving Paris, and feeling Paris, he desired, as a man must who "has felt keenly the modern impression of a place he loves," to know "its changing past, the nature and experience that it draws from the centuries, and the platform upon which there can be constructed some little of that future he will never see." And so Mr. Belloc began to read books and gather old prints. He allowed Paris to possess him more than ever, until at last he "shaped the city's legend" into nine long chapters of appreciation of the past of Paris, seen through its present. This mingling of past and present is raised to a sort of luxury that is the main charm of the book. The author has, indeed, no more serious aim than to bulwark his day-dreams, and justify his veneration. To do this he uses the suitable and suggestive facts, and leaves the others gloriously alone. Hence this is the very last book in which to seek a first acquaintance with the history and character of Paris. It is neither a text-book nor a laborious history. It is a personal appreciation, often learned with the learning of formal accounts, but wayward in its own operations. Criticism has little to do with the plan of the work or the authenticity of its details. We can ask whether imagination, insight, and sensitiveness are brought to the contemplation of Paris old and new, and whether a book so little set on formal narrative has style and intuition. With a few reservations, to be noted, we can say that these virtues, so necessary to such a book, are here. Still, the book is not quite right. It would have been improved by division into detached essays (instead of chapters), with some corresponding changes of treatment, and by the rejection of enough of its heavier material to reduce its 476 pages to about 350 pages. The book is something too solid, a little stiff and forbidding to weak brethren. Its Table of Contents wants fancy and allurements; it does but promise a procession through "Lutetia," "Paris in the Dark Ages," "The Early Middle Ages," "The Later Middle Ages," &c., &c., whereas Mr. Belloc is not writing that kind of book. It is a book of felicitous generalisations, interpretations, and associations. Take this about the Paris students:

They keep it fresh with a laughter that is lacking in the centres of the modern world, and they supply it with a frank criticism bordering on intellectual revolt, which is the self-satisfaction of less fortunate capitals, mere seaports, or military centres, fatally ignores. The young men, from their high attic windows on the Hill, interpret her horizons; and, as they grow to fill the places of the old, such a youth helps them to keep the city worthy of the impressions with which she delighted their twentieth year.

We are not going to follow Mr. Belloc through a work which is interesting for its spirit rather than its performance. We will be as eclectic as himself, and remark that the dim weird Paris of the later Middle Ages has a real lodgment in his dreams, and is not weakly projected in sentences like these:

Paris, whose mind was changing, yet kept her form. Had you passed through Paris in the night in one of those winters you would have had everywhere about you the narrow mystery of Gothic streets. The houses, overhanging and timbered, would have hidden the sky, and the spirit in which Europe had attempted to reach heaven would still be mournfully with you in decay. You would have seen spires beyond the roofs, and here and there the despairing beauty of the flamboyant in its last effort, the jutting carved windows of the rich, or the special accretion of porches at St. Jacques or at the Auxerrois. . . . All those who have well described the end of the Paris of St. Louis have made their descriptions fall in with the spirit of night. Victor Hugo shows you Paris moonlit in the snow from the towers of Notre Dame; its little winding streets like streams of black water in breaking ice, its infinite variety of ornament catching the flakes that had fallen. Stevenson shows you Paris moonlit in the snow from the eyes of Poor Villon waudering after the murder, and afraid of wolves and of the power of the king.

One more quotation. We recognise the truth of this lingering farewell passage—this summary of Paris when Paris is known.

All the streets are noisy with an infinite past; the unexpected turnings of old streets, the reveries that hang round the last of the colleges and that haunt the wonderful Hill are but a little obvious increment to that inspiring crowd of the dead; the men of our blood and our experience who built us up, and of whom we are but the last and momentary heirs, handing on to others a tradition to which we have added very little indeed. Paris rises around any man who knows her; her streets are changing things, her stones are like the clothes of a man; more real than any present aspect she may carry, the illimitable company of history peoples her, and it is in their ready speech and communion that the city takes on its dignity. This is the reading of that perplexity which all have felt, of that unquiet suggestion which hangs about the autumn trees and follows the fresh winds along the Seine; the riddle of her winter evenings and of the faces that come on one out of the dark in the lanes of the Latin quarter. She is ourselves; and we are only the film and edge of an unnumbered past. There is nothing modern in those fresh streets. The common square of the Innocents is a dust of graves and a meeting place for the dead; the Danse Macabre was too much of a creation to pass at the mere falling of the wall. The most recent of the ornaments make a kind of tabernacle for the memories of the town—Etienne Marcel before his Hôtel de Ville, Charlemagne before the Cathedral. The Place de la Concorde is not a crossing of roads for the rich, it is the death-scene of the Girondins; the vague space about the Madeleine is not only a foreground for the church, it is also the tomb of the Capetians. Wherever the town has kept a part of her older garment—in the Cathedral, in the Palais, in Ste. Chapelle—you may mix with all the centuries.

This and the preceding passages will show that Mr. Belloc has written Paris with the brilliant pen that wrote Danton. But we must express our opinion that the book before us is poised somewhat awkwardly between the essayist's sphere and the historian's. It is lavish of generalisations which demand rather than win acceptance. A certain fatigue overtakes the reader, who remembers that he was told to expect a book of private interpretations and finds often a solidity proper to a book of general usefulness. Facts are too allusively handled, and the reader looks round for a text-book to aid him. In short, Mr. Belloc seems sometimes to forget his part, and become strenuous. The book does not strike a clear note. But it is full of educated thought; it opens and shuts many doors to learning, and in its pages knowledge and sentiment meet and say fine things.

The Red Rags of Politics.

An Introduction to English Politics. By John M. Robertson. (Grant Richards. 10s. 6d. net.)

THIS book contains five hundred pages of humdrum, indifferent journalism and two pages of fine prose. The journalism is speckled with hideous verbs, such as "to subsume," and still more adjectives, of which "viable" and "demotic" are the least objectionable. Purity of language, grace, energy, and inimaginativeness distinguish the small oasis of good writing to be found on pp. 500 and 501. In it the author describes the intolerable disappointment generated by his studies of history, where the known and the unknown alike appear to be only "fruitless, purposeless moments in some vast eternal dream." Through aeons of time "morning and evening wove their sad and splendid pageantries" above a moiling race of men who, in Mr. Robertson's estimation, have acted with extreme folly; so that the record would fill one with despair but for the hope that in the future "social science," working with the weapons of reason and persuasion, will effect a transformation. A slender consolation to temper a judgment so pessimistic! It makes one ask if the reading can be correct, the conclusions wisely drawn.

There is a personal question not without bearing on the wider one. Our moralist, in a too brief passage, affords proof of rare mental qualities—insight, poetry, thought, passion. In toiling through the annals of Rome, Greece, Spain, Belgium, and so on, he is dull and prosy, his language a jargon; he writes like one out of his métier. Analysis, going a little deeper, finds further reasons for distrusting him as a political guide. The subject is so apt to engender controversy and attract prejudice, that it ought, in the first place, to be presented impartially; secondly, with more light than heat; and, thirdly, in a form as clear, definite, and concrete as possible. Mr. Robertson begins with a vague definition. "Politics," he says, "is the strife of wills on the ground of social action. As international politics is the scene of the strifes and compromises of States, so home politics is the scene of the scrives and compromises of classes, interests, factions, sects, theorists." As will be noticed, there is no etymological relationship between the word and this interpretation. Compare the latter with the opening sentence of Mr. Jenks in his exceptionally able Short History of Politics: "By politics we mean the business of government—that is to say, the control and management of people living together in a society"—a meaning at once practical and scholarly. The object of Mr. Robertson's survey of the politics of the past is to obtain guidance for the future. We do not hesitate to say that he ought to have done it in the dry, hard manner of a shopkeeper taking stock and surveying his past transactions.

War is a red rag to Mr. Robertson; another red rag to Mr. Robertson is patriotism. He is no believer in dying nations, but appears to think that race is nothing; that not proclivity, but suitable conditions, made antique Greece artistic, Rome a conqueror, England a coloniser. But the analogy of nature is against him. Tribes of birds and beasts and insects grow and die as if they had a corporate individuality. They differ immensely, too, in their potentialities, and it would be easy to show that among them are races that are as expanding and aggressive as Russia is; others are in decay, as is the case with China and Spain. The most unsatisfactory feature of Mr. Robertson's book is that it does not introduce us to the issues now being shaped. It is a résumé of dead controversies, a mumbling of the remainder biscuit. On a thousand points he is ready to fight, but why wrangle over the past? Those dead empires that he cites as warnings for England were different. They were, so to speak, advance guards thrown forward before the great army of mankind. But the whole world has now made progress, so that as pioneers we are not more than a handbreadth in front. And the points of interest to-day are not in the past, but in the future. The end of the century, by a curious coincidence, sees the end of many movements. Most of its luminaries achieved their aim. Free Trade rewarded Bright and Cobden, universal education followed on the steps of Forster, manhood suffrage has practically been adopted, and the early Victorian Chartists are justified. Mr. Gladstone's work lives in the well-arranged taxation, the financial prosperity of the country. Yet all these are but preparation and equipment for another onward rush. Parliament, political discussion, politics generally, are dull and stale just because they are still wrangling over the dry bones—the fresh, bright movements of the coming years are only felt by a few thinkers. But Mr. Robertson has not grasped the situation; his eyes are all on four red rags—Religion, War, Patriotism, Imperialism—and they see neither around nor beyond.

A Prophet of National Life.

Charles Henry Pearson: Memorials by Himself, his Wife, and his Friends. Edited by William Stebbing. (Longmans.)

THE author of National Life and Character was born at Islington Church Missionary College, of which his father was principal. The early years of his life were passed in a grey atmosphere of rigorism into which a Bible Society meeting threw occasionally a gleam of sunshine. "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" the little boy was once heard to moan; and it is not easy to confine the scope of the lament to the physical pain which was its immediate occasion.

At the age of six, in accordance with the rule of the house—he was one of an innumerable brood—he was introduced to the Latin Grammar; and he was sent to Rugby the year after the death of Arnold, whom Dr. Tait had succeeded. It is from his own unfinished "Story of my Life" that we learn the impression that those days left upon his mind. In spite of a half-smothered kindness for the traditional system of English education—"the best in the world and very bad," as Talleyrand called it—he is alive to its faults, and particularly to the neglect of modern languages and mathematics. There is a picture of the present First Lord of the Admiralty, who had lately come back from a preparatory school at Meinigen, surrounded by a group in the quadrangle, and invited, at the critical moment before the weekly German lesson, to give a swift and sound rendering of the day's task. So much for Arnold's boasted reforms in that matter. As to the beneficial consequences of Arnold's system of moral influence, Pearson evidently was inclined to be sceptical. One gathers that in his judgment the Rugby men of that generation were neither better nor worse than men from other public schools, only more self-conscious. The four years he spent there he considered in a great measure wasted, though he read all the books in the school library, and learned to write correct Latin verses at the rate of fifty an hour. Among his contemporaries were Waddington, afterwards Foreign Minister of the French Republic; Lawrence, the author of Guy Livingstone; and John Conington. Bonamy Price was one of his masters, another was Congreve, the disciple of Comte, and the founder in England of the church which has been described as consisting of "three persons and no God."

In 1847, having been removed by the headmaster's request as unmanageable, he was sent to King's College, London, to which, says he, "I owe everything that can be derived from a place of education." While there, on the occasion of the Chartist danger he shouldered his constable's staff like a man, and incidentally laid seeds of lung mischief which in the end was fatal. In the midst of his lectures and studies at King's College he found no opportunity for the study of mathematics; so that when it was time for him to proceed to Cambridge he was able joyfully to point out that his acquirements in this branch of study were hopelessly defective. There was nothing for it but to send him to Oxford, and a place was found for him on the books of Oriel.

But Oriel was not in good form: the discipline was lax, the moral tone was low, the lectures were poor. Men like Pearson and the present Bishop of Lincoln were forced to withdraw themselves in a measure from the society of the college. Election to a scholarship at Exeter transferred him to a more congenial sphere.

Its principal figure at this time was the sub-rector, William Sewell, whom, although at one time he had been looked upon as a possible rival of Newman, Pearson seems to have regarded with such scorn as only an undergraduate is capable of. Indeed, the man was by that time pretty generally discredited: Suculus—Little Pig—they named him, because he would not go the whole hog. For the sake of Grant Duff's daring, but perfectly pertinent, parody of an amateurish misstatement of a sound argument imperfectly understood, we transcribe here an incident related by Pearson :

On one occasion Sewell contrived to diverge from some classical text into a justification of the damnatory clauses of the Athanasian Creed. "I dare say you think it very strange that God should condemn a man to eternal torments; to the worm that never dies and the fire that is never quenched; to the fellowship of the bad for all time; to the horrible companionship of his own thoughts, simply because he hasn't believed certain abstruse dogmas, which perhaps were presented to him in such a way as to revolt his natural feelings, which, perhaps, he never heard of. But just consider. If anyone writes to us and misspells our name, or designates us by a title inferior to what we may claim, are we not very angry with him? And, arguing from the creature to the Creator, shall we not suppose that God will be much more angry with those who confound or refuse to recognise His attributes?" "If the creature is a fool, what must the Creator be?" was Grant Duff's pithy comment.

Pearson gained his first class in 1852, and two years later was elected a fellow of his former college. Then came the question of a profession. He had scruples about taking Orders; and on the surely rather hollow ground that "the better the advocate is the worse is the chance of justice being done," doubted the morality of the legal profession. So, "hungry for facts after the dry husks of scholastic logic and metaphysics," he took to medicine. Then his old love, King's College, called him to a professorial chair, and finally to the chair of modern history, during his occupancy of which he writes: "I am afraid in one or two instances an emulous or delicate student really died of excessive mental strain."

His career as a journalist began in 1856 with a review of Miss Strickland's Mary, Queen of Scots, which he contributed to the Saturday. Thenceforward he wrote regularly for that paper till 1859, when he found himself out of touch with it on the question of Italian Unity. Afterwards he worked for the Spectator, and in 1862 succeeded Hutton as editor of the National Review. His sketches of colleagues and rivals during this season are by no means the least entertaining part of his personal narrative. But the strange thing is this half-blind dandiacal dyspeptic, this mediator and self-communer, this winner of poetical competitions on set subjects, this churner of elegiacs, should have been all the time athirst for savagery. Europe he knew; the Antipodes called him—whither, before the end of the next century, it was his prophecy the centre of fashionable society shall be transferred. Of his life there as farmer, as politician, and as educational reformer we have left ourselves no space to speak, having preferred to confine ourselves to the sprightly and simple "Story of my Life," which is the principal charm of the book. But for the convention which would seem to regard compression and conciseness as an insult to the defunct, we should be inclined to doubt the wisdom of printing at length the appreciations of friends which fill a quarter of the volume.

On religious questions he seems never to have thought to a conclusion, and the things he is reported from time to time to have said do not rise above the level of commonplace.

Literary Hampstead.

Sweet Hampstead and its Associations. By Caroline A. White. (Eliot Stock.)

MRS. WHITE is in her eighty-ninth year, and her memories of Hampstead are as vivid as they are long-reaching. Accustomed during a great part of her life to "coin her brain for drachmas," she now dedicates the last of her strength and talent to the place she has loved longest.

No writer can read untouched her quotation of a sixteenth century poet :

Now cease my lute : this is the laste
Labour that thou and I shall waste,
And ended is that we begun :
Now is this song both sung and past,
My lute, be still, for I am done.

A tender, truthful book is the result—the book of a dear old lady. The sweetness of many summers seems to be gathered into its pages. We are in the lovely hill-suburb that sees London on one side and England on the other; that has heard Shelley shout like a boy in his poetic glee, and has seen Constable's eye grow dim with rapture as he looked at St. Paul's from his bower, or watched a rain-cloud pass over fir and hillock and gleaming gorse. In nearly four hundred pages of lingering gossip Mrs. White takes us through all the Hampsteads (for there are many), and the air seems always murmurous with new songs of Nature or old talk of men. With eighteenth-century Hampstead Mrs. White is thoroughly well acquainted. And while, in her pages, we follow Steele and Addison, Arbuthnot and Gay, Romney and Mme. D'Arblay, in and out of the old sunny intricate streets and lanes, we know them the better because Mrs. White can recall a Hampstead so like to theirs. Even forty years ago the place wore a stationary calm.

Then Hampstead was a street of village shops upon the slope of the hill, with a broken sky-line of red-roofed, one-storied, brown-brick or weather-boarded houses, with small windows, often glazed with glass that darkened light. Some of the shops had still hanging shutters and open shop-boards, and many of them half-hatch doors, a few of which, with a fine vein of what was called independence, were comfortably bolted against all comers during meal-times.

In nothing has Hampstead more changed than its outskirts and approaches. Its heart of warm red brick and loamy gardens endures well; but Mrs. White can tell you of a time when the South End, now a congerie of third-rate streets, was a little hamlet of red-roofed houses embosomed in green trees, and when the Conduit Fields and Shepherd's Well might be enjoyed where Fitzjohn's-avenue and its tributaries now spread their villas. Here is a picture of old Haverstock Hill :

As recently as 1859 the road to Hampstead was a charming one, especially if one drove there; for there you had the advantage of seeing beyond and above the pedestrian. No sooner did you cross the Canal Bridge than your pleasure in the prospects began. Leaving Chalk Farm on the left, where in some one or other of the effaced fields Tom Moore and Jeffrey (afterwards Lord Jeffrey) met to fight their intercepted duel, and Primrose or Barrow Hill, in a ditch on the south side of which (1678) the body of the murdered Sir Edmondbury Godfrey was found . . . and upon the summit of which, with sublimated vision, William Blake, pictor ignotus, saw the spiritual sun, "not like a golden disc the size of a guinea," but like an innumerable company of the heavenly host, crying, "Holy, holy, holy!"

If we turn to the Hampstead humanities, whom shall we select? Mrs. White delights in Leigh Hunt, in Constable, and in Erskine—in a hundred others. There is something about the old Lord Chancellor that rivets attention. His residence, Erskine House, is familiar to all who know the Spaniard's Inn and the Spaniard's-road. The house and grounds had not much to commend them to a Lord Chancellor, but Erskine found their possibilities of improvement delightful. His garden lay on the opposite side of the road, and was reached from the house by a subway. To-day the garden is incorporated in the grounds of Mansfield House. Here Erskine, after his labours at Westminster, worked with his gardener, planting so diligently that the place was soon named Evergreen Hill. In the neighbourhood he was known as an amiable man, who loved flowers; though a Hampstead donkey-driver, whom Erskine found ill-treating his animal, had reason to remember little more of his lordship than his stick, which was laid on his back in righteous wrath. Burke came to see Erskine at Hampstead after a long estrangement, and said to him: "Come, Erskine, let us forget all. I shall soon quit this stage, and wish to die in peace with everybody, especially you." When, presently, they took a turn round the grounds, Burke could not resist a kindly sarcasm. As they emerged from the tunnel before mentioned, all the beauty of Ken Wood, Lord Mansfield's, and the distant country, burst upon him. "Oh," said Burke, "this is just the place for a reformer. All the beauties are beyond your reach. You cannot destroy them." It quite spoils the Erskine idyll to know that after the death of his wife, in 1805, he returned to London, lived in Pimlico, and married again.

Close by Erskine House, Collins's Farm, now called Tooley's Farm, lies in the hollow below the Sandy-road leading to North End. A choicer retreat for a writer or an artist did not exist sixty years ago, and the spot had even then associations of great interest. It was for successive summers the "sunshine holiday" home of the elder Linnell and his family, who perhaps never worked harder himself when here, and who, being here, drew around him a little company of his brother artists—amongst them Blake, Varley, Flaxman, and Morland. Nearer to our own time Dickens had lodgings here, and wrote, it is said, several chapters of Bleak House in this retirement. Lover is also said to have made it his summer quarters on one occasion. . . . It is easy to return from this point to the broad holly hedge opposite Lord Erskine's house. At the end of it is the site (until quite recently) of the most interesting relic that Hampstead retained of what may be called its classic days—the Nine Elms, whose boughs had shaded the favourite resting-place of Pope and Murray (the after owner of Ken Wood, Lord Mansfield).

It is natural that Mrs. White should feel little sympathy with the changes which have come over Hampstead in the last few years. Even the holiday carnivals, to which the Hampstead folk have been reconciled by many years of repetition, have lost some of their picturesqueness. The gipsies are hardly seen there now; and, moreover, in those far-away times gipsies . . . were not the only picturesque figures to be met with on the Heath. It was no unusual thing to meet with speculative lace-makers from Buckinghamshire, in their short red cloaks, frilled with black lace, and wonderful black bonnets, with cushion and pendent vari-coloured ribbons swinging from it, selling their thread lace to chance customers, and taking orders from others who had learned the value of their wares.

Those of us whose memories of Hampstead go back only fifteen years could name similar losses and regrets. On p. 163 of Mrs. White's book there is a photograph of North End, showing the little hamlet opposite the Bull and Bush inn. The cottage gardens are seen sloping down to the road; almost you catch the scent of their mignonette and sweet-williams. But those cottages are gone, their gardens are a grassy mound; gone are the tea-tables on which cut flowers were generously placed in jars, though they grew on every hand. It was a coign of vantage, whence could be seen all the small stir of the inn. To sit there, and be meditative; to finger a pocket Horace, and murmur, with the precocious melancholy of youth,

Achilles perished in his prime Tithon was worn away by time, or some other gnomic exclamation of the Sabine poet—all this hallowed a spot which no villa or grocer's shop or sky-climbing block of flats can hallow. But what are such memories and regrets; and why do we name them in the same page as Mrs. White's? Only that we may claim a place in the great company of those who have loved Hampstead for her best gifts.

Other New Books.

ROBERT BROWNING.

BY ARTHUR WAUGH.

The "Westminster" series of small biographies, of which this is the first volume, seems to be very well conceived. We have had new editions of standard works in neat pocket formats, but here we have original work presented as daintily as a classic that nobody reads. It seems particularly fortunate that the field chosen for this extension of a popular form of publishing is Biography, for there is no branch of literature that is more in need of fresh sap. We have again and again protested against the portentous size and artistic nullity of the memoir of commerce. The "Westminster" biographies should show that the biographical miniature is a very charming and efficient means of recording a man's traits and achievements.

Mr. Waugh's memoir contains, we should judge, about 25,000 words, and it is divided into eleven short chapters. His treatment of his subject is simple, picturesque, and marked by good taste and proportion. A short biography ought never to look like a big one painfully compressed, and here no such error has been made. Within the limits of a small book there is freedom and leisure. Nor does Mr. Waugh afflict us with advanced or "precious" views of Browning, Bostonian epithets, or fantastic Browning Society elucidations. Indeed, his service to Browning's genius consists partly in his quiet acceptance of him as a classic, not as a curiosity or riddle-making prophet. That is the only right attitude. This book meets Browning in that level highway of literature on which he walks in the footsteps of Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Shelley, Tennyson, Dickens, Arnold. In minor matters the book is well managed. Mr. Waugh furnishes a chronology, an adjunct which no biography should be without, and a bibliography which will satisfy all but the most exacting students. Browning's relations to others—to his wife, friends, critics—are carefully noted; and the hum of the literary world is allowed to steal in, as it were, through the poet's windows; so that we see him atmospherically and relatively.

In the following representative passage Mr. Waugh discusses the traditional "obscurity" of Browning in connexion with his traditional "message":

What, then, was the quality in which Browning lay outside the habits of his own time,—the quality which kept him for more than thirty years at work before he began to have anything like a considerable following? It would seem to have been almost entirely a question of method, and not a question of thought or "message" at all. Browning's "message" . . . is essentially simple and direct. It is concerned entirely with wide and open problems of life. It may be made to move hand in hand with orthodox religion. It contains nothing to repel or even astonish. It is a necessary part of any spiritual system whatever, of every conceivable school of philosophy which leads anywhere beyond the abyss of despair. But his method was another matter. It was new and disturbing, intricate and curious; and it was introduced into poetry at a time when literature, having just recovered from the fervours of the French Revolution, had settled down again into a natural calm, in the pursuit of beauty for its own sake. Now, although the pursuit of the spirit of beauty is implicit in all Browning's work, he had very little care for abstract principles apart from their direct relation to humanity. Mankind, and especially the individual man as the microcosm, was the entire concern of his poetry; and, in order to arrive at the truth of all general principles as they affected man, it was the essence of his method to analyse the emotions of the individual, to dissect the impulse, and from the isolated example to proceed to the generalisation. The method required complexity if it was to be in the least degree effectual; and the complexity demanded concentrated attention in the reader who was to follow it.

Excellent in itself, Mr. Waugh's book recommends the series which it inaugurates. (Kegan Paul.)

ALL ABOUT DOGS.

BY CHARLES HENRY LANE.

Mr. Lane is a well-known fancier, exhibitor, and judge of dogs. His work will be of great value to those interested in dogs with a pedigree. Of each breed he has a few remarks to make of his own, and in the generality of cases he adds thereto an authoritative list of points. The illustrations are pictures of well-known winners, capitally drawn by Mr. Moore. Indeed, his work in this book demonstrates the superiority of the pencil over the camera in delineating animals judged by points. It is seldom, indeed, that a photographer is also a good judge, and if he were it is impossible always to obtain a good picture and at the same time bring out the beauties that appeal to the connoisseur's heart. Mr. Lane has done his work well, but sportsmen should be warned that before all else he is a judge and exhibitor, and therefore does not always show as much attention to the history of a breed as is desirable. Retrievers, for instance, he divides into flat and curly without mentioning the circumstance that the former is a creation of the last forty years or so. Nor does he venture on any criticism of the standard set up by the Kennel Club. For instance, it is very certain that the continual exhibition of deerhounds is tending to make the breed much too fine—merely a greyhound with a rough coat. Here and there, in a country house, one may meet with someone who cultivates the original type of strong, rough dog with a jaw that would make prize-winning impossible—a dog of the mountain and forest; but the average owner, on the look-out for show-bench honours, deliberately breeds away from what used to be needed on heath and forest. We are sorry, too, that so good an authority has not seen fit to make any mention of the rough Scottish greyhound. The truffle-dogs used in Wiltshire are also omitted—we suppose, because they are not often shown; but they have been bred true to type since the days of the Spanish Armada, and quite deserved a place among poodles. If, instead of "All about Dogs," Mr. Lane had chosen for title "A Manual for Dog Exhibitors" little fault could have been found. (Lane.)

IN BIRD-LAND WITH FIELD GLASS AND CAMERA.

BY OLIVER G. PIKE.

Within the last five years the photography of birds' nests has grown into a popular pastime that is doing much to define and render exact a kind of knowledge that used formerly to be very vague and untrustworthy. Adopting the prevalent fashion, Mr. Pike has produced a pretty and enjoyable volume. His pictures, as might be expected, are not uniformly excellent. The majority are satisfactory—a few, such as the Garden Warbler that serves as frontispiece, are very fine indeed, but in one or two we are forcibly reminded of certain pictorial advertisements that used to adorn the hoardings with "Puzzle, find the Cat," inscribed beneath. "Find the Nightingale" might have been written under the cat on p. 14 and "Find the Duck" on p. 178. Probably the young ornithological student will sigh as he looks for coloured pictures. So many nests and eggs, particularly of small birds, resemble one another so closely that we doubt if specimens could be named from black and white illustrations. Mr. Pike's letterpress is clear and unpretentious. Most of his work has been done in those parts of Middlesex and Hertfordshire that are almost suburban in character, and it is extremely interesting to learn how many forms of wild life may be studied just outside the postal district. But he also describes one or two more distant journeys on his favourite quest, and that to the Norfolk Broads deserves special mention. He and three other naturalists sailed about in a yacht bearing the appropriate name of the Reed-Bird, and one result is an account of the Bearded Tit as full and satisfactory as any that we have previously met. But the whole tour is very charmingly described. In the course of the book Mr. Pike animadverts bitterly upon the inroads that "murderous millinery" is making on our fauna. "At one sale in London that came under my notice," he says, "nine hundred Kingfisher skins were offered besides 265,000 other gay-plumaged birds, and 49,600 ounces of Osprey feathers." Our annual importation of bird-skins amounts to 35,000,000. And, of course, most of them are killed in the breeding season, when plumage is at its best. A sufficient cause of protest, surely! (Unwin.)

Fiction.

Ursula. By K. Douglas King.
(Lane. 6s.)

Ursula is bright and unflagging, but it is none the less a literary mistake. It is one of those pseudo-Russian tales full of passion and treachery, in which one instinctively feels that the choice of locality was due to a convention. Given two pairs of cousins strongly resembling each other, and it is obvious that extraordinary things can happen to them in a Russia manufactured by an English novelist. Ursula tells the story herself, and soon strikes the note of fatalism by relating how, as a child, she was "transported" into "the unknown future" and saw "crimson stains" on white stones, and at her feet "a stretched-out figure, still as death." Later on we find that this tragedy is the result of a desperate fight on the premises of a villain distinguished by that eerie suavity which we have learned to associate with the pseudo-Russian of the English novel. Miss King's climax has dignity, for "the stretched-out figure" had laid down his life to save the man he hated for the sake of the woman he loved. Ursula was that woman, and, having three lovers and a very high temper, she proved a worthy ally of the melodramatic Norns. The pace of the story is exciting, and the incidents attending the detention of Ursula and her escort in the house of the doctor who proposes to murder them have the quality of genuine romance. We may add that Ursula discovered the trend of her affections, and that she makes her farewell to the reader from a veritable heaven of domesticity. It would be interesting to have Turgenev's opinion of the structure and characterisation of this novel.

To the Healing of the Sea. By Francis H. Hardy.
(Smith, Elder & Co. 6s.)

ODDLY enough Mr. Francis Hardy combines in his new novel the sincere but shallow religious sentiment evinced in The Mills of God with a brilliant narrative of stockbroking in extraordinary. His plot is of the simplest: a financial genius, Blabon, takes the place in Wall-street of a friend, Livingstone, who by reckless speculation lies under an imminent risk of bankruptcy and dishonour. Suffering as he is from nervous breakdown, Livingstone is persuaded to cross the Atlantic to England for the sake of "the healing of the sea." On the other hand, a beautiful brunette of charitable instincts is persuaded to regard the unfortunate stockbroker as a patient, and to endeavour to take him out of himself. The sentiment of love made him feel acutely the injury sustained by his self-respect during his financial adventures; and indeed a man seldom finds it pleasant to remember that he has appropriated to his own use money which he held in trust. Thereupon Mr. Hardy with questionable fitness vouchsafes him a vision of Him who walked the waves. Furthermore—and here the Optimist casts on him a tolerant eye—he allows his penitent stockbroker to save a life at the peril of his own. Meanwhile astounding juggleries go on in Wall-street, to the end that Livingstone becomes once more a millionaire. But at what cost!

The first ten minutes of that terrible "Blue Monday" had worked ruin to a quarter of a million gamblers, exposed the carefully concealed defalcations of a hundred trusted officials, driven a score of desperate men to suicide, swept into bankruptcy six Stock Exchange firms, and closed the doors of three large banks.

Let us hope Livingstone was worth it.

Nell Gwyn, Comedian. By Frankfort Moore.
(Pearson. 6s.)

IN this slight series of episodes Mr. Frankfort Moore has followed a prevailing fashion, and given us a highly idealised picture of Nell Gwyn. We watch the fortunes of the wayward and warm-hearted orange girl from her first appearance outside Drury Lane Theatre, jesting with Buckingham and Sedley, to the final scene, the only one of real human feeling, in which the lover she has mourned as dead returns to find that Nelly is "the King's." The following is a specimen of the badinage between orange girl and courtiers:

"Ay, but I'm no lady, only a bit of a woman," said Nell.

"If you're only a bit, I'll buy a score from the sample, Nelly."

"Ay, your Grace treats womankind as oranges—to be picked up by the score."

"And to be found deadly sour."

"Ay, and then flung into the gutter."

Her caprices and repentances are not rendered peculiarly convincing, yet she is by far the most vital figure in the book. Mr. Moore's Churchill is something of a puppet, though Nell's jesting prophecies concerning him are not without point.

"Lud, Nell, Jack hath no quality of the volatile shuttlecock about him."

"Oh, yes; if we live long enough, we shall see him exhibit the best quality of the shuttlecock—the quality of changing sides rapidly without falling between them."

As to Lady Castlemaine and Mme. de la Querovaille, it is difficult to conceive of these violent ladies, as here depicted, appealing to the fastidious, if whimsical, taste of Charles II. Historic accuracy is not to be expected in stories of this nature, and Mr. Moore has been at as little pains to impart historic atmosphere. The absence of these qualities, however, will probably not interfere with the popularity of these comedies with readers desirous of a half-hour's amusement, who will welcome their vivacity. (Pearson. 6s.)

The Sword of the King. By Ronald MacDonald.
(John Murray. 6s.)

THE plot of Mr. MacDonald's romance centres closely about the sword which gives it name. The "king" is William of Orange, and the story deals with a plan for his assassination and its thwarting by the heroine, Philippa Drayton. Her wild ride, disguised, to warn the Prince, and the service by which the seeming lad wins the gift of William's sword, with a promise to redeem it by any boon in his power, is told in stirring fashion. Philippa's brother, a Catholic and devoted adherent of King James, is endangered by her act, and through his escape Edward Royston, her lover, an officer of the Prince, is brought face to face with degradation and death. In this crisis Philippa claims the promise, and when William, sparing his follower's life, does not release him from disgrace. She restores the sword—broken.

"The greater half," he said; and in despite of himself he smiled.

Being by that smile much emboldened, I answered: "Then am I more generous than William, Prince of Orange. For life," I said, lifting from the floor the broken point of the sword, "is less than honour. Yet, like his Highness, I keep the point that kills."

The complicated situation is handled with force and clearness, though none of the incidents are markedly original. A promising first book.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE INCREASING PURPOSE.

BY JAMES LANE ALLEN.

The author of The Choir Invisible is coming to his own in England, and this novel, full of racial warmth and freshest human nature, will substantiate his claims. As in most of his other writings, Mr. Allen treats of Kentucky life and Kentucky ideals. The period is that at the close of the Civil War, about 1865. A wind of intellectual life, embodied in a university, is passing over the State, and hero and heroine alike respond to it. Intending to fit himself for the Christian ministry, the hero is caught by the Darwinian theory, and he finds in love the solace he had sought in religion. The book is redolent of the soil, from which David goes to his studies and to which he returns. Life is intense, richly coloured, and splendidly aspirant in these pages; yet the eternal note of sadness is brought in. (Macmillan. 6s.)

AS THE LIGHT LED.

BY JAMES NEWTON BASKETT.

In this novel also the period after the War of Secession is chosen; but here the effect of the war is not the broadening of intellectual life but the narrowing and hardening of religious life. The hero and heroine are divided by sect; we are among Methodists, "Disciples," and what not. (Macmillan. 6s.)

LITTLE INDABAS.

BY J. MAC.

Five documents of South African life. Such documents, too! The Kaffir, the Boer, the Englishman. As Mr. Edward Garnett says, these studies may not quite "fit in with what the newspapers say"; but there is no doubt that they are well written and that they reflect human nature. The first story, "The White-Patched Kaffir," ends thus: "When Thornton gives the history of his fortune he claims the credit of having made one black man carry out his moral obligations, which, he says, is more than Exeter Hall has done; he firmly believes that Providence specially decreed the white-patched Kaffir should fall into his hands to enable him to help himself, and he maintains that banging the black man's head with a Bible answers better than tenderly handing it to him limp and soppy with negrophile tears. As his wife, who entered these pages as Nell Marsden, has the costliest conservatory in Maritzburg, she agrees with him." (Unwin. 2s.)

MANY DAUGHTERS.

BY SARAH TYTLER.

Mrs. Tytler's present concern is with the woman movement, and her story deals with the inmates and interests of "The Woman's Institute and Emporium of Technical Knowledge and its Productions." The heroine's name is Delia, and she is "illustrious in combined cookery and mathematics." (Digby, Long. 6s.)

A HOSPITAL ROMANCE, AND OTHER STORIES.

BY ELEANOR HOLMES.

Five short stories of the improving type, with mild writing like this: "Those who have ever found themselves beneath the same roof with a pair of newly-engaged lovers will bear witness to the imperative necessity that exists for the constant observance of precaution in entering rooms." (Digby, Long. 6s.)

THE WONDERFUL CAREER OF EBENEZER LOBB.

EDITED BY ALLEN UPWARD.

"The world knows nothing of its greatest men." The title, and this motto, will suggest the nature of this book, which follows an old convention. Ebenezer Lobb is the all-round blunderer, whose adventures in sport, literature, politics, the Volunteers, and other spheres, provide what is known as merriment. The book also includes "Selections from the Prose and Poetry of Ebenezer Lobb." (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

The Canadian Muse.*

It was decidedly the time and the hour to put forth a collection—at any time interesting—of Canadian verse. Canada is to the fore in English minds, as her troops are to the fore in English battle. The editor of A Treasury of Canadian Verse dedicates his collection to “the Lamartine of Canada”—Louis Fréchette; but, oddly, we look in vain among the poets therein “sampled” for the said Mr. Louis Fréchette. Why veil from our pardonably irritated curiosity the Muse of the “Lamartine of Canada”? There is, as we saw the other day, an—nay, the Australian Swinburne; whom England knows not: now is there also the Canadian Lamartine, “an instant and no more” flashed before our eyes and straightway withdrawn. “Wherefore are these things hid?” as Sir Toby Belch says. “Why have these gifts a curtain before them? Are they like to take dust, like Mistress Moll’s picture?” Lowell, you may remember, observed that in every American family of decent size at least one member was sure to turn out to be some very great man all over again. But in all seriousness, let us say that we are not minded to treat this collection as such collections are mostly treated. It seems usually considered that Colonial poetry is much on a par with Colonial wine. If it give you a wry mouth you shall not publicly say so, lest you discourage Colonial industries. Both will mature, if you suffer them time. It appears to be thought rather a remarkable feat that the Colonies should grow their own poetry at all; as though this exotic were unsuited to the soil and must naturally be imported from the mother country. Therefore, Colonial poetry is met with a fatherly indulgence, a “You’ll soon be as big as papa!” air. Which is not good for Colonial poetry. It is not remarkable that our great colonies should produce poets: it is somewhat remarkable, perhaps, that they have not yet produced greater poetry. Therefore, we shall judge this book like an anthology of English poems; which is doing Canada much more honour than if we treated it with slovenly lenity.

No one who reflects will expect much novelty, that “national note” which is so thoughtlessly demanded from our Anglo-Saxon offspring across seas. They inherit the unbroken tradition of English poetry, and they are just English poets writing on a new soil. Such difference as climate may make will not be clamorous; it will show itself, if at all, in subtle, unobvious ways. Save for scenic distinctions, patriotic Canadian allusions, this volume is much like a collection of lesser English verse. It does not show that Canada is yet “going strong” in poetry. There is evidently much fertility, much fluency, but a conspicuous lack of condensation. The ballad, which Mr. Kipling has made the fashionable form in England, does not seem to flourish in Canada as in its sister-colony, Australia. There is nothing here, for example, like the ringing and swinging verses of the Australian Lawson. Nor yet is Canada eminent in meditative verse—sparse enough in England since Mr. Watson “cares not his idle bagpipe up to raise” (the expression is Spenser’s, not ours!) and Mr. A. C. Benson has fallen silent. Descriptive poetry, or lyrics chiming of external nature, and the joy—sometimes the melancholy—of life; these make up by far the bulk of this collection. Shelley—stripped of metaphysics and the flush of imagery fallen from him; Keats, without condensation of phrase and figure; such seem to be the dominant inspiration of Canada. Something, at times, of Tennyson one naturally finds; rarely of Matthew Arnold. Once only we find the trace of Edgar Poe: Emerson and the other American poets seem to be uninfuential.

That Canada, as represented here, has yet far to go is demonstrable from a single fact: the uncontested supremacy among all his fellows of Mr. Bliss Carman. We were prepared to find him in the front rank—nay, at the head; but not for such primacy as this. He stands head and shoulders above all the rest. This is the more striking because (apart from “Low Tide on Grand Pré”) he is far from being represented, we think, by his finest work. In him the Canadian fondness for external nature and the joie de vivre culminates, reaches fulfilment and distinction. Has he not, indeed, sung—and sung bravely—of “the outward eye,” as Wordsworth did of “the inward eye”? That was in the Songs from Vagabondia, where his work, indistinguishably mixed with Mr. Richard Hovey’s, naturally fails to obtain for him individual credit. But all his work is a song of the outward eye, full of manhood and the “shrill spirit” of the open wind, in which no morbidity can live. It is not always perfect poetry, it does not always “come off,” and he is not careful to bring it off when the shaping impulse fails; he is not, that is to say, eminently an artist; but it is good to walk with Mr. Carman on the road of life—and how many modern poets are good travel-comrades? Flashes, too, there are of deeper things, struck off with an adventurous individuality, hardy things which give you a pleased fillip of surprise. Of this poet Canada may with right be proud. Too long to quote is “Low Tide on Grand Pré”; but here is a verse:

Was it a year, or lives ago,
We took the grasses in our hands,
And caught the summer flying low
Over the waving meadow-lands,
And held it there between our hands?

A fine example, this, of his most polished manner. Of his more individual fancy, take “The Crimson House”—good, though better might have been chosen by Mr. Rand:

Love built a crimson house—
I know it well—
That he might have a home
Wherein to dwell.

Poor Love that roamed so far
And fared so ill,
Between the morning star
And the Hollow Hill,

Before he found the vale
Where he could bide,
With memory and oblivion
Side by side.

He took the silver dew
And the dun-red clay
And behold when he was through,
How fair were they!

The braces of the sky
Were in its girth,
That it should feel no jar
Of the swinging earth:

That sun and wind might bleach,
But not destroy,
The house that he had builded
For his joy.

* A Treasury of Canadian Verse. With Brief Biographical Notes. Selected and Edited by Theodore H. Rand. (J. M. Dent.)

"Here will I stay," he said,
 "And roam no more,
 And dust when I am dead
 Shall keep the door."

There trooping dreams by night
 Go by, go by,
 The walls are rosy white
 In the sun's eye.

The windows are more clear
 Than sky or sea;
 He made them after God's Transparency.

It is a dearer place
 Than kirk or inn;
 Such joy on joy as there
 Has never been.

Let the reader whom this book may stir to seek his poems not overlook the two Vagabondia volumes, where Mr. Carman finds a congenial partner in his American friend, Mr. Richard Hovey. Among the numerous other poets in the present collection, one of the best things is by a woman—Miss (or Mrs.) Isabella Valancy Crawford. It describes the Helot, intoxicated by his Spartan master, for the warning of the Spartan's son, Hermos.

Dropped the rose-flushed doves and hung
 On the fountain's murmuring brims;
 To the bronzed vine Hermos clung—
 Silver-like his naked limbs.

Flashed and flushed rich coppered leaves,
 Whitened by his ruddy hair;
 Pallid as the marble eaves,
 Awed he met the Helot's stare.

With fixed fingers, knotted, brown,
 Dumb, the Helot grasped his beard,

Heard the far pipes, mad and sweet,
 All the ruddy hazes thrill,
 Heard the loud beam crash and beat
 In the red vat on the hill.

Wide his nostrils as a stag's
 Drew the hot wind's fiery bliss;
 Red his lips as river-flags
 From the strong Cæcuban kiss.

On his swarthy temples grew
 Purple veins like clust-red grapes;
 Past his rolling pupils blew
 Wine-born, fierce, lascivious shapes.

"Lo," he said, "he maddens now!
 Flames divine do scathe the clod:
 Round his reeling Helot brow
 Stings the garland of the god."

It has a fine colour-sense, as will be seen from these extracts, and a classical condensation of diction not common in female work. Extremely spirited is her "Forging of the Sword"; and altogether she is one of the most notable of the band. Another woman—Margaret Gill Currie—has a fresh descriptive poem, "By the St. John."

With honeysuckles, meadow-sweets,
 And rue the banks are lined;
 O'er wide fields dance gay marguerites,
 To pipe of merry wind.
 By the tall tiger-lily's side
 Stands the rich golden-rod,
 A king's son wooing for his bride
 The daughter of a god.

The poem of which this is a specimen is favourably typical of a large quantity of Canadian work in this book. Such, again, is Sarah Anne Curzon's "Invocation to Rain." Of the poetry which owns Keats for master Mr.

John H. Duvar's "How Balthazar the King Went Down into Egypt" is a good representative:

Music was on the Nile boats: couch and horn,
 Flute answering flute, while zitter and lycorn
 Took up the keynote from the leading barge,
 And part and counterpart in measured strain,
 In gathering volume, rolled on to the marge,
 The while the swelling chorus grew amain
 And inland o'er the standing rice was borne.

Accomplished work, nowhere inspired. Lastly, for our space wanes, let us quote a really good sonnet by Mr. Charles Heavysege, on "Night":

'Tis solemn darkness; the sublime of shade;
 Night, by no stars or rising moon relieved;
 The awful blank of nothingness arrayed,
 O'er which my eyeballs roll in vain, deceived.
 Upward, around, and downward I explore,
 E'en to the frontiers of the ebon air,
 But cannot, though I strive, discover more
 Than what seems one huge cavern of despair.
 Oh, Night, art thou so grim, when, black and bare
 Of moonbeams, and no cloudlets to adorn,
 Like a nude Ethiop 'twixt two hours fair,
 Thou stand'st between the evening and the morn?
 I took thee for an angel, but have wooed
 A cacodæmon in mine ignorant mood.

This fine sonnet, it will be seen, is also descriptive. Nor does Canada excel in sonnetteering. On the whole, even from the chosen specimens we have quoted, it will be evident that there is much accomplishment revealed in this anthology, but a lack of the inevitability of high poetry. We note, by the way, what is too often a characteristic of female poets, strongly displayed here—namely, a tendency to display enthusiasm for natural objects by addressing them in diminutives and coaxing familiarities, with domesticities (so to speak) of affection. The lady, in fact, makes baby-eyes at nature. Sometimes pretty, always weak, it becomes irritating in mass.

A Pedigree of "Drudgery."

Lexicographer—A harmless drudge.—JOHNSON.

DR. JAMES A. H. MURRAY delivered the Romanes Lecture for this year in the Sheldonian Theatre on the 22nd, and the lecture has been printed and neatly published by Mr. Frowde within a few days. "The Evolution of Lexicography" was Dr. Murray's almost inevitable subject, and he treated it with a thoroughness and simplicity which make this little blue-paper-covered pamphlet well worth keeping. In effect we have here the pedigree of the Oxford English Dictionary, a veritable "long pedigree of toil." In skeleton (but Dr. Murray gives it flesh and blood) the pedigree is as follows:

In the seventh and eighth centuries, when Latin was the only language of books, the possessor of a good book frequently came across a difficult word which lay outside the Latin vocabulary. In such cases he often, as a help to himself and others, wrote the meaning over the word in the original text, in a smaller hand, sometimes in easier Latin, sometimes in English. Such an explanation written over a word of the text is a gloss. Latin MSS. of the Middle Ages are full of such glosses.

Later it occurred to someone to collect out of the MSS. to which he had access all the glosses they contained, and combine them in a list to be learned by heart, or consulted at need. Such a list constituted a Glossarium or Glossary. Simultaneously with the formation of such glossaries from the Latin vocabularies to the Latin were formed for teaching purposes. Vocabularies and glossaries were frequently combined.

When such lists of words became very long it was seen that their usefulness would be increased by an alphabetical arrangement of words and phrases. The various stages in alphabetisation may be seen in four of the most ancient glossaries of English origin that we possess, known (from the libraries to which they now belong) as the Leiden, the Epinal, the Erfurt, and the Corpus (Corpus Christi, Cambridge).

Onwards to the eleventh century many vocabularies were formed, all dealing with Latin words but all tending more and more to give the meanings of words in English, until the vocabularies of the tenth and eleventh centuries are truly Latin-English. "A new aim had gradually evolved itself; the object was no longer to explain difficult Latin words, but to give the English equivalents of as many words as possible, and thus practically to provide a Latin Dictionary for the use of Englishmen."

For three hundred years after the Conquest English lexicography stood still, but with the revival of English as a literary and legal tongue more Latin-English dictionaries, notably the Ortus Vocabulorum of Wynkyn de Worde, were produced. The next advance was the production of English-Latin as distinct from Latin-English vocabularies. The Promptorium Parvulorum, or Children's Repository (1440), is the famous example.

With the Renaissance came renewed activity, and in 1538 the first Latin vocabulary to be called a "dictionary" was published by Sir Thomas Elyot. It was followed, in 1554, by Withal's A Short Dictionarie for Young Beginners, ending with the words, "Thus endeth this Dictionarie very useful for Children."

Latin had been the essential element in all dictionaries. French and Italian were now taken account of in the fine French-English Dictionary of Randall Cotgrave, and the Italian-English Dictionary of John Florio, both published in 1611.

In 1604 Robert Cawdrey supplied the germ of the modern English Dictionary, in his Table Alphabeticall of Hard Words, and in 1616 came Dr. John Bullokar's English Expositor on the same lines.

In 1623 appeared the work which first assumed the title of The English Dictionarie, by Henry Cockeram. This is a curiosity and a mine of instruction. Its hard words include abrogate, "to lead out of the flock"; acrescomick, "one whose hair was never cut"; adcorporated, "married"; balbulcitate, "to cry like a cow-boy"; collocuplicate, "to enrich"; adecastick, "one who will do just whosoever."

In Cockeram's Dictionarie, blunder is given with the meaning, "to bestir oneself, and garble as the equivalent of 'to clense things from dust.'" The Second Part is intended to teach a learned style. The plain man may write a letter in his natural language, and then, by turning up the simple words in the dictionary, alter them into their learned equivalents. Thus "abound" may be altered into exuperate; "too great plenty" into uberty, "he and I are of one age" into we are coetaneous, "youthful babbling" into juvenile inaniloquence.

Blount's Glossographia took the field in 1656, and went through many editions to 1707. Many other dictionaries appeared, including that of Nathaniel Bailey, whose Universal Etymological English Dictionary appeared in 1721, and obtained such a hold that editions continued to appear long after Dr. Johnson's Dictionary. It contained diagrams and proverbs. According to Sir John Hawkins, Dr. Johnson used an interleaved copy of Bailey's Dictionary as the basis of his own work.

In 1731 Bailey marked the stress accent, a step in the direction of indicating pronunciation.

In 1755 appeared the Dictionary which had long been projected by the booksellers, and had at length been entrusted to Dr. Johnson. "Johnson's great work," says Dr. Murray, "raised English lexicography altogether to a higher level. In his hands it became a department of literature."

In 1791 John Walker—following Bailey, Dr. Kenrick, and others—systematised English orthoepy.

Only two independent contributions to the development of lexicography were made in the earlier half of the nineteenth century. These were the American dictionaries of Webster and Richardson, the former valuable for its definitions, but weak in its etymologies; the latter almost scorning definitions, but rich in illustrative quotations.

Dr. Trench's paper, read before the Philological Society about fifty years ago on "Some Deficiencies in Existing English Dictionaries," pointed out that all the dictionaries neglected the history of words, and omitted thousands of rare and obsolete words. He also insisted that a complete dictionary must be the work of many collaborators. From this impulse arose the movement which has culminated in the preparation of the Oxford English Dictionary. "It can be maintained," says Dr. Murray, "that in the Oxford Dictionary, permeated, as it is, through and through, with the scientific method of the century, lexicography has, for the present, reached its supreme development."

Things Seen.

The Sower.

It was near a haunt of Folly in the early afternoon that I happened on the Sower. Grizzled and slim, ill-suited in rusty black, he threaded the moving crowd, singling out one and another, saying a word and pausing for no reply. He spoke in the ear of a tall, showy man, screwed up a semitone above the pitch of fashion; pressed for an instant the clean hand of a defeated vendor of the Pall Mall Gazette; whispered to a loafing, vicious stripling, and to a meagre shopboy with a khaki tie. In his wake he left a track of surprised faces. The newsman looked mildly resentful; the loafing lad laughed hoarsely; the shopboy cackled with a fine show of contempt. It was all one to the Sower.

In a back street, whither an idle curiosity drew me after him, he saluted a costermonger. The fellow rested on his handles, and called over his shoulder. As I drew near, the Sower handed him from his breast-pocket a leaflet.

"Seek the Lord!" said he, as he turned.

"God 'elp me!" cried the other, and winked hideously at a pal upon the pavement.

The Sower passed on, dropping the seed right and left as he went. At a certain door he paused and knocked. I was almost level with him. I was curious—even a little flustered: what message should I receive from this queer evangelist—I, new from the altar this feast-day of Corpus Christi? Would he discern? He looked steadily at me from under his wry brows. His face a little relaxed.

"God bless you!" he said.

The Bill Distributor.

THE child—he could not have been more than five—stood but a stone's throw from the British Museum, handing to every passer-by a slip of paper. Information thus gratuitously distributed is often, in that neighbourhood, of a character eminently refusable; but his offering no one could refuse. He showed no favouritism, however, and it was a slip of paper I received. It was blank on both sides. His mission was none the less earnest for that. Two ladies were the next recipients of his bounty; I watched them staring. A moment later found him in a jeweller's shop, but he was careful of his opportunities; and he was out again directly. As he stood on the jeweller's threshold I bent down to him. "May I ask why you give people these pieces of paper?" I said. His blue eyes met mine widely, but vacantly; his smooth forehead was puckered. To ask was to puzzle him. He had not the key of his humour.

He met no resentment: how should he? For on his blank slips of paper all his beneficiaries read themselves back into their childhood—that state of dream when action is dear for its own sake, and to play at commerce with real customers is the Game of games.

"Mr. Punch": A Protest—An American View.

SIR,—Few things are more amusing to the stranger within your gates than the touching affection which the British public maintains for their—and our—old friend "Mr. Punch"; and, upon the whole, he has deserved it. But I must confess that I regret to see your excellent paper, in a critical article, joining in the praise of the latter-day "Mr. Punch," as though he remained beyond criticism, and as though the paper which we buy on the bookstalls to-day was the same paper which our parents and grandparents bought twenty—nay, ten—nay, five—years ago. Please understand that I am only a Yankee, whose humour may be "new," and whose tastes may be vulgar; but what I am, Punch has made me, for he has lain on my table since boyhood, and I would stand the test of examination with the bluest-blooded Britisher that ever laughed or wept with Leech or Keene (that magnificent artist!), or smiled ironically with George Du Maurier. And now, alas! when I study this preceptor of my youth at the end (or is it at the beginning?) of the century, I can only cry (quoting from my Bartlett), "What a falling off is here." The Punch repartee to the old lady who complained that Punch was not so good as it had been was, "Oh, it never has been." But that little spark of humour won't scintillate to-day. The decadence is of a material kind. Lovers of Punch do not complain that Keene is dead, that Tenniel has grown grey, that Phil May is parsimonious of his exquisite draughtsmanship; but an ugly sheet of advertisements has been stuck into the heart of the paper, and sometimes, lately (but this must be whispered), the illustration here has been the one bright spot in the number. The pages are no longer varied with small pictures, and the deadly pun, that microbe of diseased humour, lies everywhere. One shivering block per page is the allowance, and often that block stands as a tombstone to record a jest, long since dead, but which some irreverent jester will not allow to lie at rest. The events of the moment are ignored. Mr. Punch's History of His Own Times is ended, for Mr. Sambourne is a great artist to whom mundane affairs are a bore, and Sir John Tenniel is living in a glorious past which nothing—not even his present—can obscure.

But this—all this—is but the commonplace of the smoking-room and the street, and yet the "conspiracy of silence" in the newspapers chatters its unceasing praise and utters no word of criticism. How comes it that English journals, critical in all else, allow their old friend and comrade to stumble on blindly and never to warn him with so much as a hint? Well, sir, my explanation is this: all men, especially newspaper men, make jokes, and their hereditary desire to publish them in Punch stays their hands, lest he should die before their progeny is published. As I never detected you,* sir, in anything like a joke, I address my protest and appeal to the ACADEMY.—I am, &c.,

LEO M. DRAGE

"Drift."

SIR,—Mr. Beckles Willson's letter to you on the subject of "Drift" shows the imprudence of not consulting a modern dictionary. For while the word drift boasted fewer than half-a-dozen meanings according to the last-century lexicographers, its status as a noun is to-day established by at least nineteen, although I am unable to discover anywhere its application to floating weeds, flowers, and grasses. In this poetical sense Mr. Beckles Willson may, therefore, claim to be original; but his rival, Mr. Brown, might with propriety have used drift as implying (vide Century Dictionary) a drift of snow, of logs, of cattle, of swine, or of bullets. Whether this would have been poetical I shall not presume to decide.—I am, &c.,

Queen Anne's Mansions, S.W.:

Ernest Dowson.

SIR,—The discovery that the beautiful lyric by which the name of Ernest Dowson will be chiefly remembered was a mere Swinburnian rendering of a comic ballad of Mr. Burnand's is sufficiently astonishing. The critical insight your correspondent displays is amazing; perhaps, therefore, he will now indicate the source from which Mr. Burnand derived his fable. Whatever that may be, Dowson found the inspiration in his own life; had, probably, never heard of Mr. Burnand's version; and, in writing his own, was only giving the fullest expression to an emotion that has "thrilled dead bosoms." A little more of that astonishing smartness upon which many people pride themselves would have rendered this clear to your correspondent's perspicacity. The line he cites, moreover, is a misquotation; and the poetic formula he styles "Swinburnian" is one favoured in this country by Rossetti as well as Swinburne, and in France by scores of poets since Villon, by whom it was probably conceived.—I am, &c.,

HAROLD LUSH.

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

ESSAYS OF JOHN DRYDEN.

EDITED BY W. P. KER.

Mr. Ker is Professor of English Literature in University College, London, and this work has been anticipated with interest for some time. It is not a complete edition of Dryden's prose. The longer works and those unconnected with literature have been left out. The book contains a collection of Dryden's principal essays on literary subjects, with a short commentary, and an introduction intended to explain his position as a critic. There are also copious notes. Dryden's prose is neglected of the multitude, but its importance to thorough students has always been great, and this presentation of it is welcome. (Clarendon Press.)

THE ENGLISH CHURCH IN THE FOURTEENTH AND FIFTEENTH CENTURIES. By W. W. CAPES.

This is the third volume (issued in advance of the second, which is not yet ready) in the great History of the English Church, which is being edited by the Dean of Winchester, and which will be completed in seven volumes. (Macmillan. 7s. 6d.)

In addition to the foregoing, we have received :

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 40 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best "Thing Seen" in verse, not exceeding eight lines. This Competition has been popular, and has produced very varied results. We award the prize to Mr. J. M. Strachey, 69, Lancaster-gate, W., for the following :

Quick through the bars of his cage the monkey, with jubilant treble,
Seized the small parcel, unfolded the nut from the paper and ate
it,
Stretched forth his paw for another, when, lo! not a nut but a pebble
Lurked in the treacherous wrapper, grating his teeth as they met it.
What chatter and grinning of fury! what clutching for foes to belabour!
Till sudden he paused, there came over the foam of his wrath a transition;
He re-wrapped the stone in a hurry, and up overhead to his neighbour
Thrust it, then rolled on the floor of his cage in ecstatic derision.

Other replies are as follows :

ON THE TACK.

Close where the calm cliff fronts on the splash and the swell of the ocean,
She, in her strength and her height, paused with a shivering sigh;
Wildly the huge white sails flapped about with tumultuous motion,
Loose ropes rattled, and shouts rose to the infinite sky.
This for a moment; then she turned with a bang from the leeward;
Sails taut, deck on a slant, ropes that were rigid again,
And, with the course and the force of a hawk, swept splendidly seaward,
Buoyed by the great grey winds, over the mist of the main.
[G. L. S., London.]

AT CHORAL EUCCHARIST.

Cross and altar, choir and pictured window
Faded from our tear-dimmed mortal sight;
In its stead . . . Nay, who can paint that glory?
Could I find the words—I dare not write.
But I know a door in Heav'n was opened.
Lit the blood-stained way the Martyrs trod,
Till I saw the pathway of the lilies
White and golden, leading up to God.

[E. A., Suffolk.]

IN THE CEYLON TEA GARDEN, PARIS EXHIBITION, 1900.

Green shade and sward, and wicker chairs,
And tables set for tea;
Parisian talk, and British stares,
And sound of girlish glee.
In deft attendance on the crowd
Move dusky Cingalese—
Impassive, dignified, and proud—
Of Nature's gentry these.

[L. R., London.]

Workhouse folk in a sultry street,
Filing by with shuffling feet;
A painted woman dispensing doles,
Smiles, as they pass, on the grateful souls;
Smiles, then spits a wild-cat curse,
On one who scorns the ill-gained purse.
Human sinner, saint divine,
Mingle ever—myrrh and wine!

[T. B. D.]

I once did see a face that, gleaming, gazed
From out a halo of snow-whitened hair;
And lo, a hand stretched out, a sword praised,
That flashed in shining radiance thro' the air.
It seemed to cross a stream of rippling light,
And come towards me; and I screamed aloud,
And ran up to my mother in a fright,
Whom smiling at me, said "Tis but a cloud."

[M. I. C., London.]

LONDON.

Above, St. Paul's majestic pile,
The thronged street below,
The busy scene, now flushed awhile
In tender evening glow.

The age-worn spire across the way,
The mighty frosted dome,
The bridge beneath, all seem to say,
In London, here's my home!

[E. H. H., London.]

Competition No. 41 (New Series).

LAST week we received the following ingenuous letter, typical of many which reach this office :—

"DEAR SIR,—I am most anxious, as one having literary aspirations, to cultivate style. Would you favour me with a few hints, or tell me where I could get the hints?—Yours truly, —."

We offer a prize of One Guinea for the best letter to be sent in reply to the above.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, July 3. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We cannot consider anonymous answers.
